★ Protection against market fluctuations or losses.
★ Freedom from re-investment worries or managing funds.
★ Liberal tax deductions—savings on estate or inheritance tax.
★ Absolute Safety—Income never varies, never misses.
★ The inner satisfaction of investing in the Christian work of The Salvation Army.

For full information about Annuity Gifts, write for free booklet. Mail coupon today. No obligation.

THE SALVATION ARMY
120 West 14th St., New York 11, N. Y.
Gentlemen: Kindly send me without obligation your Free Booklet T914
Name
Address
City
Zone State
Date of Birth

Bad Breath due to Mucosity

Simple treatment clears away offending phlegm and mucous drip

Offensive bad breath that comes from mucosity, or excessive mucous discharge, is quickly removed with Glyco-Thymoline. The reason is this: sticky phlegm and mucous drip that lodge in nose and throat passages often become nasty-smelling, resulting in bad breath mucosity.

Glyco-Thymoline, formulated for this very condition, is soothing, alkaline. Because it speedily loosens and removes stubborn, sticky phlegm and mucous, Glyco-Thymoline literally rinses away bad breath mucosity... freshens mouth and taste instantly. Excellent also for smoker's and denture breath. 6 oz. or 15½ oz. bottles, all drug stores. Get the President, it is reasonable to assume that further street demonstrations will be indispensable to bring about the enactment of the proposals into laws, without emasculation.

Glyco-Thymoline
Treatment for Mucosity

IS MAIL-ORDER YOUR BUSINESS? Find out how advertising in The New York Times Magazine is good for your business. For details, write The New York Times Magazine, Mail-Order Advertising Department, Times Square, New York 36, N. Y.

Fourth, major emphasis should be placed upon building the unity of Negro leadership together with a coalition of the Negro, labor and church communities. This, of course, is the job of existing civil-rights organizations. No new movement is necessary.

The Birmingham tragedy—the wanton bombing of a church and the murder of four little girls—marked not only a breakdown of law and order but also has shaken and weakened the faith and confidence of Negroes and, no doubt, of numerous liberal-minded white people in constitutional government and our free, democratic, Christian society. It damages the image of the United States in Africa in particular, and the world of color in general.

IT is a matter of record that no white person or mob in the South responsible for the murder of a Negro has ever been brought to justice. However, Negroes, despite this unspeakable crime, must not forsake or abandon the nonviolent philosophy as a framework within which they should carry on their relentless struggle for the abolition of race bias.

We have no choice but to fight ceaselessly for civil-rights legislation. If it should be killed, joblessness will continue to worsen, and humiliation in places of accommodation will go on unabated. Then frustration—even desperation—may burst into fires of violent interracial conflict. Indeed, if the civil-rights revolution is aborted by a counter-revolution, symbolized by the filibuster, it may not only turn against white America but move to devour its own children.

MOURNERS—Members of the families of three of the four girls killed in the church bombing at Birmingham, Ala., are helped away after the funeral services. One has fainted.

'NEGROES WANT IN'

By ROY WILKINS

Executive Secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (N.A.A.C.P.)

NEGROES demand an end to the bestiality of Birmingham with its bombings and slaughter of innocent children. The spectacle of the Federal Government helpless in the face of such terror is incomprehensible to a people who have fought and died in its defense and who properly look to it for protection of their rights and lives. Failure to provide such protection increases frustration and seriously imperils continuance of the nonviolent character of the Negro protest. Prompt, effec-

(Continued on Following Page)

LEATHER

THE SADDLE, hand-crafted original. Heavy saddle leather, hand-stained, hand-rubbed. Olive, gold, mahogany, rust, black, walnut, natural, antique honey. Swivel base. $59 plus $1 packing charge. Express Collect. Sorry, No C.O.D.'s. Leathercrafter, T-7, 303 E. 51 St., NY 22 PLaza 9-1955. Send for Free Brochure.

CRAFTER

NATIONWIDE COVERAGE FOR MAIL-ORDER ADVERTISERS

You get it Sunday after Sunday in The New York Times Magazine. For full information about circulation, distribution, costs and closing time, write The New York Times, Mail-Order Advertising Department, Times Square, N. Y. 36, N. Y.

WHEN YOU VISIT Colonial Williamsburg

be sure you stay right in the historic area

The Williamsburg Inn, the Williamsburg Lodge, and nearly a hundred rooms in Colonial Houses, Inns and Taverns are actually right in the famous historic area. The Motor House is a short walk away. For free color booklet and information, write Box CN, Williamsburg, Virginia, or call New York Reservation Office, Telephone: CIrcle 6-6800.

design 63

We chose GLENN of California's bedroom group for purity of design, outstanding craftsmanship and price. In its class it is the best we have found in all America. Select walnut veneers hand-rubbed to a lustrous patina, solid wood edging and a delicately sculptured leg are among its marks of quality. Specially priced 30% lower during this event. Discover INTERNATIONAL—it's the only store of its kind.

HEAD BOARD AND NIGHT TABLES $210
SALE $147

DRESSER $260
SALE $182

CHEST $224
SALE $156

VANITY $178
SALE $124

International home furnishings

NEW YORK
LOS ANGELES
BOSTON

220 E 23 St · 6th fl ■ Daily & Sat 10-6 Mon & Thur to 8:30 · MU 9-2920

(Continued from Preceding Page)

tive action to end this terror is imperative.

The painfully slow pace of past desegregation can no longer be tolerated. To insist upon acceleration is neither radical nor extremist. It is rational and necessary.

Negroes want in in American society, and they want the ways opened now. They reject separation, whether advocated by the Black Muslims, the White Citizens Councils or the Communist party. They are committed to a pluralistic society with equal rights, opportunities and freedom for all.

EQUALLY clear are the indicated next steps. There is no likelihood of an abatement of the present upsurge of militancy among Negroes. What is required now more than ever is responsible militancy. Not demonstrations for demonstrations' sake. But demonstrations for specific purposes, pressed uncompromisingly, but conducted in an orderly fashion.

The presence of thousands of white persons in the Washington march revealed to Negroes and to the nation that colored citizens are not alone in this struggle for equal rights. A vast reservoir of goodwill exists in the white populace. This goodwill must be cultivated and mobilized for effective action in the struggle. The religious groups —Protestant, Catholic and Jewish—demonstrated by their participation in the march that they are prepared now to go beyond resolutions and to take an active role. Liberal elements in the labor movement reiterated the demand for an end to the color bar in employment.

THE church groups exert influence in areas where Negroes and other traditional civil - rights advocates are politically weak. With organized religion in support of the President's civil - rights bill, the chances for its enactment will be greatly enhanced. Senators from states where the issue of civil rights has not been regarded heretofore as urgent may be persuaded to vote for cloture to shut off a Senate filibuster.

The church groups can be an important factor in gaining support of both Republican and Democratic members of Congress in the nonindustrial states of the Midwest and Rocky Mountain regions. How they vote may well determine the outcome of the legislation.

Meanwhile, the civil-rights groups must redouble their efforts to increase the Negro vote in all regions, pursue a course of responsible militancy, conduct a vast program of public information, and enlist the active support of all possible elements within the American society.

MEMORIAL—Novelist James Baldwin addresses a rally in New York's Foley Square last Sunday in memory of the six children who were killed in Birmingham, Ala., a week before.

THE quality cook book for the home kitchen

The New York Times COOK BOOK

Edited by CRAIG CLAIBORNE

"One of the most comprehensive collections of great recipes in many years."— JAMES A. BEARD

1500 recipes. Illustrated in color and black and white. $8.95

HARPER & ROW Publishers

STOP WET-DAMP BASEMENT DAMAGE

By the Only Nationwide Waterproofing Firm

VULCAN

EXCLUSIVE PROCESS

For the past 15 years VULCAN has specialized in basement water-proofing. We have successfully waterproofed thousands of basements without costly excavation by using our patented pressure-pumping process.

no digging, no damage to lawn, driveway

Call For FREE ESTIMATE

VULCAN ®

N. Y. . . . . AX 1-0600
NASSAU . . . IV 5-2080
SUFFOLK . . AN 5-2211
WESTCHESTER GR 2-1222
NEW JERSEY . OR 6-6030

SEND FOR FREE BOOKLET

Vulcan Methods, Inc.
79-18 Parsons Blvd.
Flushing, N. Y.
T.M.

☐ Send FREE Vulcan waterproofing booklet
☐ WITHOUT OBLIGATION please have your local dealer give me a FREE survey and estimate for waterproofing my basement

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

GOLD LEAF

COGNAC

the best of the great French cognacs at the best price...

about 5.99 a fifth

Product of France · 80 Proof

CARILLON IMPORTERS LTD., NEW YORK, N. Y.

SCHOOLS and COLLEGES

CATALOGS & ADVICE to meet individual needs. No charge for all types of schools below college level.

BOARD OF PRIVATE SCHOOL EDUCATION
Paul H. Hornbeck, President
551 5th Ave., New York (45th St.) MU 2-8840

"BEYOND THE MELTING POT"

A NEW BOOK about the way people of various nationalities, races and religions have progressed in the "melting pot" of New York makes this point:

> Negroes, alone among the major population groups in the city, have not kept pace with other migrants over the years.

The book is "Beyond the Melting Pot: The Negroes, Puerto Ricans, Jews, Italians and Irish of New York City." It was written by Nathan Glazer and Daniel Patrick Moynihan, and is published by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology Press and Harvard University Press, of Cambridge, Mass.

The Negro community in New York, now numbering more than 1 million, has failed, say the authors, to produce a proportionate share of business and professional men, or leaders in education, politics and civic affairs.

This failure, the book states, cannot be blamed on discrimination alone. Other groups—Irish Catholics and Russian and Polish Jews, for example—faced discrimination, but many of their number rose to high positions in the community. The answer to the Negroes' lack of achievement is traced by the authors to a number of factors.

Lack of skills. At the outset, they say, the Negro immigrant arriving in New York from the South "has not had the good fortune of arriving with useful skills and strong institutions, nor has he found a prosperous, well-organized Negro community to help him."

The depression of the 1930s is described as "a disaster" for the Negroes in New York "that almost rivaled slavery." At one time in that period it was estimated that 60 per cent of the Negro population was on relief.

Harlem, described as once "one of the most beautiful and healthful sites in the whole city," became "frightfully overcrowded" as impoverished Negroes jammed into its borders.

The Negro worker of that era, when he worked, was paid only three fifths of what the white worker earned.

In 1940, the book reports, the Negro community of 450,000 "was in large part supported by the domestic labor of women, which was the single most important source of income." It adds:

"But perhaps most striking was the almost complete absence of a business class, and this is still true today."

Pinch on jobs. The failure of the Negroes to enter into small business and manufacturing, the authors report, was important because it meant that they had no jobs to give out to their own people, as did members of other groups. The result:

"Today Negro business is if anything less important than 50 years ago. The catering business, in which Negroes played a role of some significance in the late nineteenth century, has declined and fallen into other hands. The only important forms of Negro business are beauty parlors, barber shops, the preparation of special cosmetics and undertaking parlors."

Contrast this with the record of New York's 600,000 Puerto Ricans, who own over 4,000 businesses, say the authors, adding: "It suggests that one of the most widely accepted reasons for the low participation of Negroes in small business—discrimination in loans—probably is not of primary importance, for it is not likely that the Puerto Rican . . . impresses the banker or supplier any more than a Negro does."

—Black Star Photo

HARLEM. Study finds New York Negroes did not produce their share of leaders.

Thrift was almost unknown among the Negro immigrants, says the book, making this observation: "In the end, the most important factor is probably the failure of Negroes to develop a pattern of saving. The poor may have had nothing to save; but even those better off tend to turn earnings immediately into consumption."

A "striking difference" is noted between Negroes from the South and those from the West Indies who settled in New York. The West Indians applied themselves "to business, education, buying homes, and in general advancing themselves."

Strangers to skills. Other points made by the authors include these:

"Negro youths have little contact through family and friends with the skilled trades. They have little experience with apprenticeship, and do not always see the point in long training at low wages. Skilled labor of any kind does not have great prestige among Negroes."

Efforts to get Negroes in jobs where unions are involved "have brought small results. The employers blame the unions, the unions point to their rules on getting membership (which are generally very complicated), and both point to the Negroes—they do not come looking for the jobs."

The writers say that "there are today problems in finding enough colored Americans with the motivation, training and ability to fill the opportunities that are available."

"A poor outcome." Other immigrant groups—notably Japanese, Jews and Puerto Ricans—also have faced frustrations in breaking into U. S. labor market, but have managed to acquire higher educations and have been ready when opportunities opened, the authors comment, adding:

"The Negro situation is different. Negroes do place a high value on education . . . and yet the outcome is a poor one. There are not as many good Negro students coming out of the high schools as there are places in college to put them."

The authors express doubt that the artificial mixing of Negro and white children in public schools, by transporting the pupils across neighborhood boundaries, is an answer to the problem.

They ask: "Why were schools that were indifferent to the problems of the children of other groups, 40 and 50 years ago, adequate enough for them, but seem nevertheless inadequate for the present wave of children?"

The problems of the Negro community in New York will remain "for a long time to come," authors Glazer and Moynihan predict. "The Negro middle class contributes very little, in money, organization, or involvement, to the solution of Negro social problems." For the Negro to gain acceptance, they say, will mean "a higher degree of responsibility by the middle-class and well-to-do and educated Negroes for the others."

A & R Rel

Correspondence

September 1963

To Advance the American Revolution

25c

The Black Revolution

The revolution now going on in the United States is a Black Revolution, and in the next period is going to become more rather than less so. Negroes are not only going to be fighting for equality, but against those who have been and are still depriving them of it. In other words, they will be fighting to remove whites from the positions of economic privilege and political power which whites have gained at the expense of Negroes and from which they can still arrest, beat and shoot Negroes in the name of law and order.

Clashes between the races at all levels are going to become increasingly frequent and bitter. Political divisions between whites and Negroes are going to become sharper and deeper.

"CRUCIAL SUMMER"

On the surface this picture of growing race conflict seems to be contradicted by the big national news of what has been appropriately called "The Crucial Summer of 1963." The summer began with President Kennedy himself, on June 11, acknowledging the existence of the Negro revolution and calling upon "all citizens" to help in its completion. It continued with the history-making March on Washington where a Catholic priest, a Jewish rabbi, and a white Protestant minister, not to mention Walter Reuther, addressed the huge throng which included an estimated 20,000-50,000 whites — more whites than have ever before participated in a demonstration for Negro rights. And finally, on Labor Day, NBC televised an exciting three hour Special in which the Negro revolt was presented as "The American Revolution."

Below the surface, however, the summer has actually been a desperate tug-of-war between the American Establishment trying to integrate the Black Revolution into the American Way of Life, and the Negro movement struggling to free itself from its friends so that it could confront them as its enemies. The Washington March was a dramatic demonstration of this conflict. Opposed at first by official America, it was then made into a shining demonstration of American democracy's finest hour.

The March was undoubtedly an inspiring experience to the participants and to the millions who watched it over TV. But what few whites realized, and what the mass media (still controlled by whites) failed to say, was that a March of 250,000 had already taken place in a single city, Detroit, on June 23. Nor did it report that many rank and file Negroes refused to go to Washington because they could not accept a March for Freedom which from the outset placed restrictions upon the freedom of marchers to carry their own signs.

"A SOURCE OF POWER"

The fundamental conflict could not be completely suppressed. It was revealed in the controversy over the speech of John Lewis, Chairman of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, fresh from the battlefields of Georgia, Mississippi, and Alabama where white political power means the merciless beating and even murder of hundreds of Negroes and their white student allies simply for trying to register Negroes to vote. Lewis had intended to warn that "We will not wait for the President, the Justice Department, nor Congress, but we will take matters into our own hands and create a source of power outside of any national structure that could and would assure us a victory." The Archbishop, aided by Reuther and A. Phillip Randolph, made Lewis take this out of his speech. One can only wonder, if these gentlemen really believe that by taking these lines from Lewis' speech, they also deleted them from his mind or from the shape of things to come.

The coming reality was heralded in the formation, on the eve of the March, of the all-black FREEDOM NOW Party which has since been gaining the support of militant local leaders like Reverend Cleage of Detroit. Such a party, as Kennedy is well aware, (twice during the week of September 9 he told the press that a political division between whites and Negroes could be "fatal") can break up the Democratic Party. If the Democratic Party is broken up, then organized labor, already so dependent upon it for protection and cohesion, will become further demoralized.

REVOLUTIONS ARE COSTLY

Kennedy, Reuther & Co. claim (and may even believe) that the accumulated grievances of the Negroes can be redressed within the present system. Approaching the Black Revolution in America as they approach the revolutions in Latin America and Asia, they apparently believe that a revolution against misery and exploitation can be completed without loss or penalty to those who have benefited from this misery and exploitation. The Black Revolution in America is going to prove them as hopelessly wrong in this as they have already been proven hopelessly wrong in Cuba and Southeast Asia.

A revolution is against a system, but a system is not an abstraction. It is made up of those who maintain and support it because they have benefited from it. And in America these people are the American whites. So that the Black Revolution must and will take a race form. A revolution also means that someone loses. So that if the Negro revolution is successful, it is going to cost whites something in power and position. No one, Negro or white, can come to terms with this revolution unless he accepts these realities of revolution.

"UNFINISHED BUSINESS"

The chief theme running through most of the March on Washington speeches

(Concluded on Page 2)

THE BLACK REVOLUTION

(Concluded from Page 1)

was that the nation now has to finish the business that it left unfinished 100 years ago. But important business that has been left unfinished does not remain the same business.

If the freed Negroes had been integrated into the work force of a rising American capitalism 100 years ago, then today the main revolutionary force inside America would probably be a mass of vari-colored workers. Or if the Negro revolt had taken place even fifteen years ago after World War II, it might still be possible to talk about unfinished business. At that time automation had not yet made its inroads; jobs were still plentiful. At that time the solidarity of the working class had not yet been punctured by the red-baiting of the labor leaders or by the concentration on personal accumulation of material goods which now has the average worker in its grip, pitting employed against unemployed and skilled against unskilled. At that time also, the white workers had not yet run to the suburbs en masse, leaving behind them enormous concentrations of Negroes in the big city slums. And finally, at that time the two billion colored peoples of the have-not nations had not yet emerged as a world revolutionary force against the "have" nations, giving the American Negroes the conviction that they are part of a world majority.

But what might have been is not what is. The Negro revolt is reaching its present climax not in 1863 nor in 1948 but in 1963. And in 1963, beginning with Birmingham, it has spread from the South, where it has centered around the struggle for democracy, to the North, where it is centered around the harsh brute facts of economic life.

The Southern Negroes have not yet marshalled their numerical or physical power but have limited themselves mainly to symbolic non-violent actions whose chief aim has been to expose and compel the Federal Government to act. In the North, a mass of unemployed Negroes, concentrated in the cities, are going to use their economic and political power to prove that they have as much, if not more, right to jobs and to training for jobs as whites have. And it is already clear that white workers, believing that they have a property right to these jobs (much as the capitalist believes he has a property right to factories) are going to put up a bitter resistance to the Negro challenge.

---

—Cover photo by James Wilson

Vol. 7, No. 7 CORRESPONDENCE Sept., 1963
Published Monthly except July and August by Correspondence Publishing Co.
Second-class Postage Paid at Detroit, Mich.
EDITOR ..... GRACE C. LEE
MANAGING EDITOR .. REGINALD WILSON
ART DIRECTOR ..... CONRAD MALLETT
BUSINESS MANAGER.... DOLORES WILSON
7737 Mack Ave., Detroit 14, Mich.—WA. 1-6850
If no answer, call WA. 1-1236
In Los Angeles: 2331 Holgate Sq., CA. 2-9291
RATES: Single copy, 25c; One Year, 2.25
2 years, $4.00
We welcome articles, poems, photos and drawings.
All material submitted must be accompanied by the author's name and address. When specifically requested, this will not be printed.
Unless otherwise noted, any article may be reprinted from CORRESPONDENCE provided credit is given and a copy of the reprint sent to us.

editorials

"To Advance the American Revolution"

Ten years ago, in October 1953, the first issue of CORRESPONDENCE appeared. At that time McCarthy was running rampant, and Americans from the President down, terrified of being labelled "Communist", were reluctant to show any deviation from the official line that this country is the greatest and the freest in the world.

We refused to be intimidated. Confident that inside America, as inside every capitalist country, there existed revolutionary social forces created by the system itself, we set out to discover and encourage these revolutionary forces. A new society, we said, could be found in the struggles of rank and file workers against the union bureaucracy, of Negroes for equality, in the revolt of youth against middle-class values, and in the search of women for new, more human, relations with men.

Now, today, in the mounting and irreversible tide of Negro revolt, the American Revolution has begun. Meanwhile, although McCarthy himself is dead, his spirit lives on in the overwhelming majority of white Americans, who are more afraid than ever of offending the powers-that-be or even each other, for fear of losing the material comforts they have acquired and which they have come to identify with human freedom.

They will do what they will do. As for ourselves, with this issue and a new format, we rededicate ourselves to recording and advancing the American revolution.

Our allegiance is not to any individuals or groups or to any theories as to how revolutions should go — but only to the revolution. Without fear or fancy, we shall tell the truth about this revolution in whatever form or color it appears, conscious always that a revolution goes the way it goes, according to the real grievances and the brutal realities of a particular society — and not the way it is better for it to go.

If at times we appear extreme to some or even many of our readers, we remind them that every great revolution has always gone far beyond the wildest imagination of those with whom it began as well as of its most ardent supporters and theoreticians. Of one thing we are certain. No revolution in a country of America's unparalleled productivity, power and world position could be anything but a great revolution. Before this American revolution is over, all economic, social and political conditions in this society will have been fundamentally altered, all past prejudices as to what could or should be the appropriate relations between man and man, and between nation and nation, will have been shattered, and new foundations established.

●

To Our Readers:

With our new format we are raising our rates to 25c for a single copy, $2.25 for a year's subscription, and $4.00 for two years.

All present subscribers will continue to receive the number of issues that they subscribed for.

We urge our readers, when subcribing or renewing, to send in for two years whenever possible. This will mean less work for our already overworked staff. And it should bring closer the day when we can expand our coverage and increase the number of our pages.

Roses and Revolutions

By Dudley Randall

Musing on roses and revolutions,
I saw night close down on the earth like a great dark wing,
And the lighted cities were as tapers in the night,
And I heard the lamentations of a million hearts
Regretting life and crying for the grave,
And I saw the Negro lying in the swamp with his face blown off,
And in northern cities with his manhood maligned and felt the writhing
Of his viscera like that of the hare hunted down or the bear at bay,
And I saw men working and taking no joy in their work
And embracing the hard-eyed whore with joyless excitement
And lying with wives and virgins in impotence.

And as I groped in darkness
And felt the pain of millions,
Gradually, like day driving night across the continent,
I saw dawn upon them like the sun a vision
Of a time when all men walk proudly through the earth
And the bombs and missiles lie at the bottom of the ocean
Like the bones of dinosaurs buried under the shale of eras,
And men strive with each other not for power or the accumulation of paper
But in joy create for others the house, the poem, the game of athletic beauty.

Then washed in the brightness of this vision,
I saw how in its radiance would grow and be nourished and suddenly
Burst into terrible and splendid bloom
The blood-red flower of revolution.

—Dudley Randall's poems are included in AMERICAN NEGRO POETRY and BEYOND THE BLUES.

On a Journey to Farmville and Cambridge

Reginald Wilson

The winding road to Farmville, shire town of Prince Edward County, Virginia, is intermittently impaled with historical tablets marking the various stages of General Robert E. Lee's retreat, ending in ignominy at nearby Appomatox Courthouse. Mrs. Parsons, a gnarled, stolid Negro widow and longtime Farmville resident has wryly observed, "The white people of Virginia are waiting for General Lee to return, riding his big white horse, Traveler."

Apparently the patience of Virginia's white people is quite extensive. While waiting for General Lee, that portion of them in Prince Edward County has managed to keep its public schools closed since 1959 rather than integrate them. Private schools were set up for the white children. As for Negro children, despite emergency crash programs, despite summer training centers set up by sympathetic Northerners, four years of no education have caused irreparable damage which even Freedom NOW could not undo.

At night I walked the streets of Farmville: down Race Street; past Longwood College—a state-supported school for genteel, blue-eyed Southern women; down by 100 Madison Street, where I had spent the day interviewing ten-, eleven- and twelve-year-old children who did not know what to do with a pencil. I walked the streets of Farmville and began to fathom the depth of emotional intensity behind the recently begun demonstrations, boycotts, picket lines and jailings. Yet, the puzzling question that is always asked is, "Why have Prince Edward Negroes, after four long years, just begun to demonstrate?"

"WAY DOWN IN EGYPT LAND, LET MY PEOPLE GO"

Mrs. Parsons gives one answer. She says, "There is no leadership in Prince Edward County. The people have been ready to move but there was no one giving them a direction to go in." Rev. Williams, a fiery Farmville minister, mentions the lack of Negro voter registration and a moribund NAACP. Another answer may lie in the confusion among the Negro teenagers who ordinarily form the backbone of organized protests. The school closing undoubtedly threw them into a social as well as educational quandary. The first statistic that rose significantly after 1959 was the incidence of teenage pregnancies.

But then the 'Snick' kids (Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee) came in with their fervor and dedication and organizational acumen dearly-purchased in the crucibles of Birmingham, Savannah and Danville. And in gauging the Southern scene, it seems that the 'Snick' kids — those nonviolent, blue-jeaned battalions— are everywhere marshalling the Negro people through mundane and pragmatic methods to envision and, perhaps, accomplish revolutionary goals.

On my last night in Farmville I attended a protest rally in the Methodist church pastored by a Rev. Dixon. The children marched up the aisles clapping their hands and singing. That night the TV cameramen were filming their rally, part of which later appeared briefly on the three-hour NBC special, "The American Revolution." The song leader was an ungainly black girl with a good voice and lots of motion. However, the director of the TV crew asked a pretty, almost Caucasian-looking girl to stand and lead the singing during the filmed sequence. The kids somehow, good-humoredly, just ignore this bizarre behavior and the singing goes on.

These children, like the slaves of 1865, have just endured a four-year disaster and, despite its damage to their lives, turn their faces to the future and the new world they intend to make. Everything is new. The children sing, "I ain't gonna let nobody turn me 'round."

"OVER MY HEAD I SEE FREEDOM IN THE AIR"

Over 200 miles north of Farmville on the Eastern Shore of Maryland in the town of Cambridge, SNCC has also been impressively active. Cambridge is the kind of town that sends liberals into sieges of despair. Here is a city of "progress" that failed. There are Negroes on the City Council. There are Negroes on nearly every city commission. Negroes to the left of them; Negroes to the right of them. Negroes, Negroes everywhere, but not a one was free!

Entering Cambridge in the pre - dawn haze, one's automobile motor echoes in the nearly deserted streets. Except for a scurrying domestic hastening to prepare Miss Ann's breakfast, the only occupants of the streets are National Guardsmen cruising in jeeps and trucks. A Negro laborer calls them "Boy Scouts in hobnailed boots." They are vestiges of the recent period of partial military rule which controlled Cambridge following the demonstrations and Negro-white clashes. Splitting Cambridge in two, literally, is Race Street, site of the main business district. Here, after being rejected in their demands for "across the board desegregation in housing, education and public accommodations," the Negroes picketed the movie theater, the tax-supported skating rink, the stores and restaurants. They were jeered and abused by bystanders and manhandled by the police. On one particular day 43 demonstrators were thrown in jail. The situation became so explosive it was necessary to call in the National Guard and impose military rule. And still the Negroes threatened to demonstrate unless their demands were met. The City Fathers capitulated and a dramatic agreement was signed, drawing nation-wide attention, in Washington, D.C., under the unprecedented aegis of the Attorney-General of the United States. Present at the signing were Cambridge Mayor Moybray, Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy and Mrs. Gloria Richardson representing the Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee.

Mrs. Richardson, at first consideration, would not seem to be the likely person to lead a movement of the militancy of the Cambridge CNAC. Her family is one of the leading Negro families of Dorchester County. Her father was a councilman. She was educated at Howard University in nearby Washington, D. C. However, she may at one time have heard one of her former professors, the late E. Franklin Frazier, say something like this: " . . . The traditional spirit of independence and self-assertion of the Negro woman has not been lost . . . She will not be satisfied with mere acceptance by white America but will join with the women of the world in the revolution which is creating a new world which will be free of colonialism, racial discriminations and economic exploitation."

"DO YOU WANT YOUR FREEDOM?
CERTAINLY, LORD!"

Perhaps some such impetus inspired this slender, vivacious mother of two girls to assume a role unique in the Negro revolt. She is the first woman to lead a major protest movement in the South and to register such dramatic gains resulting from her movement's demonstrations. Not that the settlement is without fault; the misgivings of the youth as to its adequacy are vocal in some quarters. Nevertheless, Mrs. Richardson's accomplishments were important and she operated effectively under considerable pressure. She worked closely with Stanley Branch, field representative of the NAACP, and with SNCC (the Cambridge CNAC is now an affiliate and Mrs. Richardson was recently elected to SNCC's Executive Committee). She has welded the various leadership elements of

(Concluded on Page 4)

No Taxation Without Negro Representation

1868 McAllister St.,
San Francisco 15, Cal.
June 28, 1963

Director of Internal Revenue
Washington 25, D. C.:

This is to inform you that I have no intention of paying federal income tax nor of filing returns for 1962 or 1963.

The Congress of the United States is not entitled legally to collect taxes from me or any other citizen, because at least 25 members of the House of Representatives hold their seats and vote in violation of Section 2 of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution.

That section provides that "when the right to Vote at any election for the choice of Electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

If this provision were enforced in the case of Southern states which deny the vote to Negro citizens (as the NAACP is demanding in a current lawsuit), the 11 Southern states would lose at least 25 Representatives. The power of these 25 criminals is far greater than their number would indicate, for the racist oppression and political bossism which they practice has kept them in office so long that through seniority they control the most powerful committees in the House. Thus expenditures and legislation by the House do not represent the will of the people of the United States, nor are actions by such an illegally constituted and controlled House legally valid.

Furthermore, the voting right of all adult male citizens, white or black, voting or not, is "abridged" unconstitutionally in those states which require a poll tax of voters in violation of the foregoing section. Thus those states are legally entitled to NO representation in the House.

Finally, all states deny the vote on other unconstitutional grounds (length of residence, illiteracy, etc.) to citizens who are entitled to vote by discriminatory districting which gives more Congressional representation per person to rural areas. The amounts of representation which various states would lose if the Fourteenth Amendment were enforced in those cases is impossible for me to calculate.

The Congress of the United States does not obey the Constitution, does not represent the people of the United States, and does not want to. I refuse to submit to taxation without fair and universal representation. I invite my fellow citizens to join me.

Yours for the Constitution,

Jefferson Poland
Deputy Register of Voters
City and County of San Francisco

THE NEW SOCIETY

(Concluded from Page 3)

the community, including the ministers, into a strong, effective instrument. This alone is a significant accomplishment. Further, the CNAC headquarters is used as a remedial center for academically ill-prepared children and as a voter registration school.

Mrs. Richardson is quite cognizant of her leadership role as a woman. She spoke to me at length regarding the leadership potential of Negro women in the protest movement, in part due to their relative freedom from economic reprisal as compared to men. She is also aware of the potential problems resulting from the possibility of conflicts with the Negro man who has only recently been able to assert his masculinity in a primarily matriarchial Negro social structure.

Another question I raised with Mrs. Richardson revolved around my perception of her movement as a sort of middle ground between the pure nonviolence of Martin Luther King and the self-defense policies advocated by Robert Williams in Monroe, N. C. She emphatically affirmed her adherence to the philosophy of nonviolence but it was evident that she harbored some apprehensions concerning the movement's ability to contain the volatile emotions and justified outrage of the Negro community that have built up over the past years, and may explode again if during the present uneasy truce the referendum petition started by the whites to put on the ballot the question of continued segregation of public facilities is passed. The Negroes say, "Whites should never be allowed to vote on our rights." And there the situation rests.

An American in Greece

Detroiter Dan Georgakas, in Greece this summer, found that, although the ruins and the politics there are a long way from America, yet America intrudes at the most unexpected moments in the most unexpected places. He sent us these two vignettes.

I

About the time we drove into Pylos to see Nestor's Palace as described by Homer, the American 6th Fleet sailed into the harbor. Our first encounter occurred on a little island in the bay where we discovered officers drinking under a tent. They treated us and seemed delighted to see Americans in what they considered a desolate spot. They invited us to dinner on board ship that night and our entire party accepted. The food was excellent. The officers wore white and were white. The cooks and servants also wore white but weren't. Twelve were Negroes. Six were Orientals. Two were Puerto Ricans. There were no others. The American way of life had come to sandy Pylos.

II

The Negro spoke Greek better than I did. We were sitting at a cafe on the beach at Cape Sounion, the thermost tip of Attica.

"I understand it's getting better," he said.

"How long have you been over here?"

"Ten years." He pushed his sunglasses up on the bridge of his nose.

"It's better but not really different yet."

"I've been thinking of going back."

I sipped on the Greek coffee. I knew what the next question would be.

"Think I should go back?"

It was my turn to play with sunglasses. There was much I could have said but the decision had to be his own.

"I'm happy here."

"I don't doubt that at all."

"I feel here for the first time in my life. I feel human. If I went back it would be the struggle all over again. It would be a fantastic effort just to be seen. Life is much easier for me here. I'm happier than I'd ever be in America. The old man I rent from even wants me to marry his daughter."

I laughed. But in America it would not have been funny. When we returned to Attica though, he went to an airlines office. Everything he had said was true. But he was an American and to be free he had to be free in America first.

what it means

There's No Place Like Displace

James Boggs

Only a few years ago no white person ever really had to worry about a Negro taking his place because it was taken for granted that there was a white man's place and a Negro's place. A white teacher might have only a M.A. while a Negro teacher had a Ph.D. But the white teacher didn't have to worry about the Negro teacher taking her job. The Negro teacher could only teach in a Negro school or Negro neighborhood—or run an elevator. A white engineer didn't have to worry if he wasn't as smart as a Negro engineer. The Negro engineer could only go into a Negro business—or run an elevator. A white baseball player didn't have to worry about being too good. And though it was obviously false, a white reporter could think that he reported news of the Negro struggle as well as a Negro reporter—because whoever heard of a Negro journalist writing or broadcasting to an all-American audience?

Nowadays, however, every white person knows that somewhere there is a Negro training and itching to take his place. Today also there are a lot of corporations who want some visible Negroes around in order not to lose the Negro market which provides them with their margin of profit. This means that a lot of whites are in danger of being displaced by Negroes—and to give up his place is not easy for the white man. Finally, of course, all this is coming at a time when the number of jobs is itself being diminished by automation. The result is that the antagonism between the whites and Negroes which the country feels must stop is only just getting started. The fact that the Negro revolt is coming at the same time as automation means conflicts and clashes between Negroes and whites such as this country has never seen.

MANHOOD

There is no question that few Negroes, if any, are thinking that in demanding jobs equal to whites they are overthrowing the American economic system. But in this demand and in their struggle to achieve it, it is the same as if this were their intention. What makes it so clear is that for the first time the whites up North are beginning to feel their economic place threatened. There has always been a big difference between the South and the North on the question of work. In the South whites have usually been willing to let Negroes do all kinds of skilled work just as long as the white man was boss. The Negroes from slavery days have been carpenters, plumbers, brickmasons, and so forth. Only since 1950 with the runaway plants has an industrialized white working class begun to grow in the South. But in the North the whites have always done the skilled and industrial work which was at the heart of the country's economic strength. The majority of Negroes in the North have been left with only the menial and fringe jobs, as porters, domestics, janitors. So that in the North, much more than in the South, whites feel that not only their livelihood but their manhood is tied up with their work.

Now today the Negroes are saying that they want to be at the heart of the productive work of society, whatever it is. That is, they are demanding jobs in business and industry, schools and movies, newspapers and banks, and in every sphere of American life, as a price for continuing to support that way of life. This is threatening whites in the North as they have never felt threatened before. Whites in the North are not prejudiced in the sense that they don't like Negroes. Their prejudice goes much deeper. They just believe that Negroes should have their equal opportunity after the whites have had theirs. They just believe that Negroes should have equal opportunity but—at no cost to the whites. In other words, so long as the white doesn't become unemployed or so long as a white child doesn't have to be slowed down in his education to get ahead in the world, the Northern white is all for the Negroes being equal. But if there is any threat to the whites getting ahead, then the whites are going to resist whoever threatens this to the bitter end.

That is why the Negro struggle coming at this time is likely to be the biggest and fastest teacher of the American public that it has ever had, and the lesson it teaches will probably also be valid for every advanced country. The Negro who is suffering most from automation today, because the unskilled work he has been doing is the first to be automated, is likely to be the one to teach Americans most about what automation will have to mean to their society.

This country, like every capitalist country, has always lived by the philosophy that when a big technological transition takes place, those thrown out of work by it should be willing to suffer because the next generation will benefit so much by the productivity that the new technology makes possible. In the United States the ones who have been left to suffer as technology advanced were mainly and always the Negroes. Every other group, including the immigrants, was always educated up to the new technological stage. Only the Negroes were left behind. But now the Negroes have made it clear that they do not intend to suffer just because we are moving into an age of automation. They want whatever jobs remain and what's more, they want the best of these jobs. And if there is education necessary for these jobs, then they want whatever education is necessary. This is one of the main things that the revolution is about. This is what many Negroes were thinking of when they watched or participated in the Washington March for Jobs and Freedom. And that is why this revolution is going to bring about such a vicious clash with whites, not only in the long run but immediately. Because today in the United States the main work that is still not automated is in construction and in the skilled trades associated with construction. This work is completely dominated by whites—and not just by whites in general. The whites in construction work do not have the self-control that comes from work in a factory. They have not been disciplined by the union and the company as mass production workers have been because of the seniority and fringe benefits that are tied up with union membership in the mass production industries. They are individualistic, protecting their own jobs and jobs for their in-laws and relatives with the vigilance and ferocity almost of tribesmen.

BIG QUESTION

I believe that through this showdown that is coming between Negro and white workers, America will have to find a solution to the question of how people should live in an age when there is not enough work for everybody to do. Eventually the right to live will have to be divorced from the necessity to work. Thus because of this conflict, America is going to have to create new values and a new conception of manhood which goes far beyond the idea that a human being is a laboring animal. These new values are necessary if humanity is going to progress, but a society doesn't change its old values simply because some people have theoretically examined it and found that a change in values is necessary. A society changes its values because a struggle and conflict take place inside that society, and the Negroes are the social force now creating that struggle and conflict inside this society.

If there were no Negroes inside the United States, this country would still eventually have to face the same fundamental question: whether it should destroy all the technological advances and stop man from thinking creatively at all just in order to keep him working; or whether it should encourage and promote technology and let man begin to enjoy the benefits of it and find new ways of expressing his humanity. However, the big question is how many bitter and bloody clashes there must be between white and Negro workers before Americans realize that the work which they have thought was such a necessity to their livelihood and their manhood is no longer such a dire necessity.

James Boggs is the author of the recently-published American Revolution: Pages from a Negro Worker's Notebook (Monthly Review Press, New York) which has already gone into a second printing.

" . . . the new party will be the natural voice of fraternity with the oppressed of Africa, Asia, and Latin America who are also striving to end racism, exploitation and colonialism."

"The Natural Voice of Fraternity"

an interview with Conrad P. Lynn, acting chairman, Freedom Now Party

Q. Mr. Lynn, why do you think this is the time to organize a Negro political party?

A. The March on Washington was the last great effort of the standard civil rights organizations and their white friends to achieve some advance toward liberty for the black man by the method of petition and protest. The newspapers sang their paeans of praise about the orderly behavior of the Negroes in Washington. But within a few days the ordinary white people gave their answer in Folcroft, Penna., in Chicago and in Birmingham. Our final instrument is organized independent political action.

Q. Why cannot the major parties be utilized to achieve the objective of Freedom Now for the Negro?

A. Because the major parties are committed to the traditional order. That order presupposes the black man as a marginal worker and the chief constituent of the pool unemployed. American capitalism is inconceivable without the black man at its base. In the South, particularly, unions are crippled in their effectiveness by the appeal to race prejudice. Even in the North as we can see by the example of the construction workers' Jim Crow unions in New York and Chicago and the longshoremans' union in Portland, Ore., the black people are shut out of any essential place in the economy by the extreme development of hostility by the white workers.

Q. Would not the organization of a black party feed this prejudice?

A. On the contrary, political organization is an expression of power. The white people are quick to recognize the meaning of such power. Therefore, we will be able to deal with them more nearly on a plane of equality when we have our own political instrument.

Q. Why can't we join the parties of the left?

A. Because of the bitter experience of the Negroes with such parties. In the thirties the Communist Party gained great influence when it took the Scottsboro case. But it caused great disillusionment over its exploitation of the case for narrow party ends. Furthermore, when the Communist Party denounced the campaign among Negroes against segregation in the U. S. armed forces, many Negroes became convinced that to the Communists the cause of the Negro was distinctly secondary. The Socialists have always had the line that the uplifting of the workers would automatically result in the Liberation of the Negro. In other words they have never had a program that fitted American realities. Some of the newer left groups are aware that at this time the Negroes are determined to undertake independent political action and they will cooperate with us.

Q. Why do you feel the American Negroes will make common cause with the Afro-Asian peoples who are throwing off the yoke of imperialism?

A. The struggle for freedom in Asia and Africa since World War II has been a great inspiration to the Negroes in America. When Ghana took its seat in the United Nations and quickly won respect for the voice of new Africa, it immediately became evident to many Negroes in America that they, too, had an independent role to play. In crucial areas we are a colonial people. Our task in winning freedom is more difficult than the people in an ordinary colony since we live in the heart of the metropolitan country. Always the white liberal or his beneficiary among the Negroes has spoken for us. When indignant black Americans broke into the United Nations to protest the dastardly murder of the great Lumumba, the world was put on notice that we meant to be heard.

> "We are making a demonstration here this afternoon not so much for Cuba as for America. There will be no peaceful solution to America's problems if we are going to have repression of expression."
>
> CONRAD LYNN, speaking as Panel Moderator at the Town Hall Rally of the American Students who saw Cuba for themselves.

It pained me to read in the New York Times that Bayard Rustin on the eve of the March on Washington had said that Negroes did not want any foreign interest or influence brought to bear on their problem. That was the Master's voice speaking. Had it not been for the interest and common cause made by foreign countries in our plight there never would have been a March on Washington. Furthermore, within a few days after he had made that statement a group of African visitors was badly mauled and tortured by a group of white supremacists in Alabama. The world is too small now to talk of isolation. The electric torture pole brought to its most deadly horrible use on the body of a pregnant black woman in Plaquemines, La., is eagerly adopted by the police in Durban, South Africa.

Q. What are the immediate prospects?

A. In New Haven, Conn., the black candidate for Mayor, endorsed by us, has just won a place on the ballot. In San Francisco our candidate for Mayor may surprise all the world. These are just the fall campaigns. Our larger effort is to spread the discussion of what our move means to the whole Negro community. We believe that by 1964 our ideology and program will be clear and effective. Our immediate need is for funds for printing our publications and paying for their distribution.

Q. What about the presidential campaign of 1964?

A. We will have our founding convention in Easter week of that year, probably in a midwestern city or city of the upper South. Our most difficult and necessary task is organization in the deep South. You can hardly expect Negroes to risk their lives to make a choice between Barnett and Eastland. But if they have their own candidate they will register even if it means taking their rifles with them to the polls. At our founding convention we will make the decision whether to run a candidate for president or not.

For more information about the new party, write Conrad Lynn, 81 E. 125 St., New York, N. Y. 10035.

A Bill of Rights?

In his column "Before Pleasure Comes Paine" in the June issue of CORRESPONDENCE, Lyman Paine sets up a challenge that, in this reader's opinion, is long overdue. He calls for a realistic approach to the search for practical solutions of the American Negro's problems.

Too much valuable time, too much precious energy, are being given to merely stating the problem. "The Negro wants Freedom" we say. But "freedom" is such a nebulous term, subject to as many interpretations as there are whims of the mind. And in the final analysis, the Negro, along with every other living soul on this earth, already has the only real freedom there is — the God-given freedom to think, and to commune with his maker.

But there are goals the Negro desperately wants and needs to achieve. They should be listed, spelled out in plain words, and set forth in a "Bill of Rights and Aims" which will become the banner and the doctrine of all demonstrations, all movements, all discussions of American Negro problems.

To draw up such a guiding document will take all the talent, patience, tolerance and knowledge of the country's leaders, both colored and white. But a start must be made, and promptly. And the initiative should be furnished by the Negroes themselves. Right now, every Negro in the United States — and as many white friends as he or she can enlist — should be thinking seriously about exactly what "rights and aims" he or she personally desires. And when these are clearly in mind, they should be communicated to the leader in whom he or she has the greatest confidence, along with a plea that they be included in the "Bill of Rights and Aims."

Achievement of all the goals the Negro will set for his people will take time. Not all those who help to shape the pattern of the new order will live to see the design completely worked out — but their children will. And the sufferings of the twelve generations of the colored, since the first slaves were brought to the shores of America, will be vindicated.

What equipment do the colored have with which to organize their objectives and their search for solutions to their problems? Leaders — yes, they do have dedicated and able leaders. But not nearly enough. More leaders are a prime need for the achievement of the "rights and aims". Where will they come from? Out of the rank and file of Negroes; those who are willing to undergo the training and acquire the knowledge essential to leadership. And where will such people find this training and knowledge? In school, in college; in the lecture hall, in the public library. That is why one of the first and most important "rights and aims" sought by every Negro should be "FREEDOM OF ACCESS TO ALL SOURCES OF EDUCATION, ENLIGHTENMENT AND KNOWLEDGE." If all the current activities in quest for a better life produced no more than this one 'right", the Negro would have achieved a giant-size step forward. But today's movement will achieve this and much more, if each individual will put his shoulder to the wheel mentally as well as physically.

Mark Wells
San Pedro, Calif.

Lyman Paine is on vacation. His column will return in the next issue.

A Dream

By James Randall, Jr.

I want to love as much as the next man,
To find in those great hours of the soul
The incessant inward bickering that forces
Saying into the loud giant.

Yet it will not be easy.
Driven into the world
On childhood's sled, confused
By real and chimerical explosions, the linguistic Demons and dragons, badgered on every side
By a society of pompous appliances
Whose credo is more appliances for everyone,
It will not be easy to distinguish between the puffing
Metaphor of the sun
And the inward flame.

Hardened by nonsensical patter, ragged
Nails over the large brow of the earth,
There will arise, though ridiculed and pummelled,
A strong voice, to greet
The age with undecorated blessing.

—James Randall, Jr., is a major Hopwood Award winner.

facts in brief

The White Monopoly of the Building Trades

Those who want to understand the growing race conflict in the construction industries have only to examine the following facts and figures regarding the Apprentice Training Program operated by the Detroit Board of Education as a service to the construction trades.

| Trade | Present No. of Negro Apprentices | |
|---|---|---|
| Electrical Construction | 0 | |
| Glazing | 0 | |
| Iron Working | 0 | |
| Pattern - Making | 0 | |
| Plastering | 3 | (out of 13) |
| Plumbing | 2 | (out of 162) |
| Printing | 1 | (out of 132) |
| Sheet Metal | 1 | (out of 22) |
| Sprinkler Fitting | 0 | |
| Steam Fitting | 2 | (out of 118) |

Carpentry, Painting and Resilient Floor Decorating reported "several" apprentices; Bricklaying said it "has always been open" and Metal Lathing said it has "integrated practices." But none of them backed up their statement with figures.

In 1962 the Committee on Equal Educational Opportunity condemned the Apprentice Training Program as "obviously discriminatory," and recommended that unless there were changes the Board of Education should terminate or suspend the program. Nevertheless decisions as to who enters the program remain to this day completely under the control of the notoriously discriminatory unions. Thus:

1. All applicants are screened by the unions' executive boards and by the Joint Apprenticeship Committee representing management and the unions.

2. No one can enter the Apprentice Training School unless he is already employed as an apprentice in his trade.

3. The teachers and counselors at the Apprentice Training School, to whom applicants are to apply, are employed by the Board of Education, but selected from a list submitted by the union.

In the Wind . . .

"Tomorrow will not tell the tale. Nor the day after tomorrow. But the answers, as the song says, are blowing in the wind. And the wind, it looks like, is coming close to home."

Editorial
York Gazette

* * *

The representatives of the new FREEDOM NOW Party, led by William Worthy planned a sit-in in J. Edgar Hoover's office but were flanked by being immediately invited in and given over an hour's time in the Presence. TV and newsmen were excluded. Could the conversation have gone something like this?

Hoover: Well, what do you want?

Worthy: Freedom now!

Hoover: The Constitution guarantees freedom, justice and equality to all citizens, but you have to earn these rights.

Worthy: We're tired of waiting. We plan to demonstrate, sit-in, and form an independent political party.

Hoover: What are you, some kind of Communists?

Worthy: Bobby Kennedy says a black man can be President in 40 years.

Hoover: Well, I've got a dossier on him, too.

●

"I'm not an entertainer first, nor am I an American first. First, above all else, I'm a Negro."

Dick Gregory
From Chicago's
Bridewell Jail

"I'm primarily an entertainer, not a demonstrator. But the fact that I am a life member of the NAACP indicates where I stand."

Nat "King" Cole

●

"In Los Angeles we held a march at the same time as the Washington one. It was the best this city has had — the largest number was Negro. Some people came straight from work. At City Hall the speakers had to forget their prepared talks because of the jeering from the crowd. It was more than "Get rid of Parker!" (the Police Commissioner). The crowd was really on its toes. Every time a speaker said something, it came in with some fitting jeer which was then taken up as a slogan.

"When I got back to work I moved the office radio (saved for such great events as ball games) next to my desk and listened all day. The fact of the matter is that whites were scared. You could tell from the jokes — 'Are you going out on the streets?' — 'Be careful, take a gun for protection.' You can imagine what a ball I had when the reports came of the four arrests — all whites looking for trouble and trigger-happy.

"The next day I was the feature. People came over to look at me as though they had never seen me before, so much so that I asked them did they know we were taking over the government and they had better be very nice to me, because I am at least a little insurance for their skins."

Letter From F. Paine
Los Angeles, Cal.

CORRESPONDENCE • 7737 Mack • Detroit 14

Please send me CORRESPONDENCE for

☐ 2 yrs. (20 issues) at $4.00 ☐ Renewal
☐ 1 yr. (10 issues) at $2.25 ☐ New subscription

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... Zone... State.....

Please send CORRESPONDENCE for one year as my gift at the special rate of $2.00 to

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... Zone... State.....

I am enclosing $..... as a contribution to CORRESPONDENCE

(In England send 12s for one year to Arthur Moyse, 39 Minford Gardens, London W. 14)

GUS AND GREASY By Wilson and Mallett

"Same old thing—white folks talking and colored folks singing."

"The list of organizations and groups who are promising to march (on Washington) makes the whole thing a mirage. One illustration will suffice. I work in a factory. There was there a cannibal foreman—Jewish—under him a Negro foreman, kind and soft-spoken, and with interest in the workers and their work. It pleased God to remove a Cain from life. This made the Negro the head foreman and the question was to hire an assistant to him. A Jew was hired, but the management was not satisfied with just a statement; he had to present a certificate of his birth as a Jew. He was made the head foreman, and the Negro remained as an ass-istant (sic!). The same management participates in the March on Washington. Is that clear?

Letter from David Berkingoff
New York, N. Y.

●

". . . And Charlotte said no child of ours will turn sour so long as a man like you is around. And I hugged her and said you're my little girl. Then I picked up my bat and I said I'd best be on my way. I'm late as it is.

Hit one for me, Charlotte yelled. And for me too, Daddy, Billie-Boy yelled, and I yelled back don't you worry about me. I'll do fine.

And then I drove downtown to the civil rights demonstration."

Jules Feiffer
From a cartoon in the Village Voice

●

"What amazed me was the restraint of the Negroes on the job the day after the Birmingham bombing — the way they talked with whites as if nothing had happened. They almost seemed more a part of the Northern working class than Negroes. I usually sit and have coffee with some white guys when I go into work. But Monday I just couldn't. I couldn't tell what I might do if one of them passed one of his prejudiced remarks. The night before I had waked up in a cold sweat after dreaming that I had gone next door to the head of the local homeowners association and dismembered one of his little kids."

E. L. Chrysler Worker

●

On the Monday after the bombing nobody in the plant, white or Negro, was talking about race. This could mean something and it could mean nothing. In "The Valley", on the other hand, the Negroes were talking bigger and badder than I have ever heard them talk. That also could mean something and it could mean nothing. Once a revolution begins boiling the way this one is boiling, it can go any way.

Just Jim Detroit, Mich.

●

"If Africa joins forces in the United Nations with all the rest of the underdeveloped world and the Communist countries to support an emancipation movement for American Negroes, President Kennedy could find himself in a very delicate position."

From COMBAT
Paris, France

R&R Rel.
Fortune
September, 1963

It matters...

When the Negroes revolt

The Negro Revolution—1963—has been reported in depth and with courage by the Post, because the editors believe it matters. It is among the most profound social upheavals in our history. Beyond the bloodshed and violence, its impact has been felt in less dramatic, but no less important, ways: in living habits and working conditions, manufacturing and marketing concepts, in the education of our children. It may be the overriding issue in the 1964 presidential campaign. Post editors were aware of the now flaming Negro militancy before it reached tinder point. Well in advance of the fury, the Post pinpointed the key battlefronts, then moved behind the scenes to reveal the battle plan and review the shock troops who would execute it: zealous youth groups; Martin Luther King; the fanatical Black Muslims and their chief, Malcolm X. When trouble started, the Post explained it with vivid, but judicious, articles by gifted writers who stressed the historical perspective, rather than the sporadic unfolding of news events. The Post added thrust to these articles with a series of tough-minded editorials urging light, not heat: understanding and moderation, rather than revolution and violence. The Post will continue to shed light on this social upheaval. Because it matters.

POST

300 Park Ave., New York 22, N. Y.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

Atlanta, Boston, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, Los Angeles, Minneapolis, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, San Francisco.

In the second quarter oil and rubber companies recorded increases of about one-fifth over a year ago, chemical and drug companies, textiles, and printing about one-tenth, and food and tobacco up 6 to 7 percent. Only the paper industry had a 3 percent decline. Among nonmanufacturing industries, railroads reported a profit rise of about two-thirds, mining, trucking, and trade companies gains of some 10 percent over a year ago, and communications and utilities half that.

The main reason why profits rose sharply in the second quarter was the unprecedented rise in margins, which is continuing. According to the First National City Bank figures, manufacturing margins were 8 percent higher than a year earlier. Industrial list prices have drifted off by .5 percent from the spring of 1962, but during the second quarter of 1963 they rose month by month, and actual market prices may have improved even more. Meanwhile, unit labor costs in industry have been declining steadily. The ratio of price to unit of labor cost last quarter was nearly 1 percent higher than in the winter or a year ago, and margins appear to be widening again in the current quarter. Unit labor costs have been falling, in part because productivity has been rising faster than average during the past two years.

Pressure moves margins

The trend of industrial profit margins has been closely correlated with the relation of over-all demand to supply as measured by FORTUNE's index of industrial pressure (see Roundup, June, 1963), and this relationship helps to explain why margins are still improving at this stage of the business cycle. In the past, additions to inventory or capacity or both have tended to outstrip the rise in demand, and so the index of industrial pressure fell. Thus both profit margins and the pressure index declined after 1955 and again after 1959. But since capacity and inventory additions in the current business expansion have been so small, the index of pressure continued firm all during last year and rose sharply in the spring. Moreover, it appears to be up again this quarter.

The marked improvement in profits after taxes is coming on top of a good showing last year, which occurred irrespective of government corporate tax changes. These changes liberalized depreciation rules and also granted an investment tax credit for business spending on capital equipment. As a result of the first, corporations took $2.4 billion more in depreciation on their 1962 income-tax returns than they otherwise would have done, according to a survey of the Commerce Department. This of course reduced their pretax incomes by an equal amount, half of which showed up in lower tax liabilities and half in lower net after taxes. The reduction in net, however, was offset by the investment tax credit, and so on a post-tax basis the changes in the government rules made almost no difference for all corporations taken together. For individual companies the tax changes may have made a difference, but most corporations are apparently not reflecting these changes in their reports to shareholders.

The contribution of the 1962 tax changes was not in terms of profits but in raising corporate cash flow by well over $2 billion. This extra cash flow, however, did not enter into corporate investment decisions until the end of last year, when the new rules were finally promulgated and various uncertainties were resolved. Then the "bonus" from the tax changes proved to be extremely important. For it now turns out that on Commerce's latest revised estimates corporations were not quite so affluent in cash as had been indicated by initial statistics. In 1961 and 1962 they had about $2 billion less to invest than was originally indicated. With the tax "bonus" the new figure for 1962 is $36.5 billion of internal funds from depreciation and profits after dividends.

Corporations now have the funds to pursue a stronger investment policy. In 1962 their investment in fixed assets, plant and equipment and inventories, exceeded internal funds by less than $1 billion, whereas in 1956–57 the excess of investment over internal funds was more than $8 billion and in 1959–60 more than $3.5 billion. Meanwhile, corporations raised outside funds in the form of security issues, mortgages, and bank loans averaging about $13 billion per year in all three periods, including 1962. But whereas in previous periods much of this financing went into plant and equipment, it has been used in recent years for net receivables (and so to spur sales) and, directly and indirectly, for building apartments, hotels, etc. Now the picture is changing. While in the second quarter corporate spending for plant and inventory exceeded internal funds by a rate of only $1 billion, the figure should rise to $5 billion in the fourth quarter on Roundup's projections of inventory and plant and equipment spending. This will still be moderate, but outside borrowing will increase and will be differently used. The renewed rise in profits is providing incentive as well as wherewithal for an increase in investment, an essential ingredient for further expansion of the economy.

Farm Prosperity Levels Off

Farm marketings will increase at least 2 percent this year but prices will be off a bit (chart below). So cash receipts will increase only 1 percent or a little more (charted right); with farm expenses increasing too, farmers will again register little or no change in their net income. Nevertheless they are again increasing outlays on equipment by 10 percent (chart lower right), and so obviously squeezing savings.

The Affluent Farmer

Farm cash receipts, which rose by $3 billion in the past two years, will be up by another half billion in 1963 to a total of over $38 billion. Purchases of farm equipment, which have also been rising, will hit an all-time peak. This upsurge in farm prosperity is, however, tending to level off. Owing to steadily rising expenses (taxes, feed, etc.), net farm income will do well to match last year's $12.6 billion. Federal payments to farmers are already starting to stabilize, and the future is clouded by uncertainties about crop legislation and prices, and export prospects to the Common Market.

This year's big cash receipts are benefiting from a further rise in farm marketings, centering in livestock products. Dairy output will be off a bit, but chickens and eggs are

continued page 50

Drama in Birmingham. Police officials blasted this girl demonstrator with fire hose to stem civil-rights march.

R&R Rel.

WHEN NEGROES AND WHITES INTERMARRY—THE PROBLEMS

Laws forbidding racial intermarriage are starting to get attention in all the clamor over equal rights.

A checkup shows mixed marriages are still illegal in many places in the U. S.—and they're not all in the South.

The case of a Negro soldier who married a white woman has stirred new interest in the laws on racially mixed marriages in this country.

The soldier's military unit is being transferred from Germany to Georgia. He wrote to the attorney general of Georgia to find out what would be the legal status of his marriage in that segregated Southern State.

Answer: In Georgia, it is "unlawful for a white person to marry anyone except a white person." Georgia law also says that "any marriage in violation of this section shall be void."

In such cases, it is the custom of the U. S. Army to permit Negro soldiers to transfer to some other unit assigned to a State where their mixed marriages are permitted by law.

Where can they go?

A varied picture. The map on this page gives you the answer. It shows that there are 31 States where mixed marriages are legal.

In 19 States, marriage between a Negro and a white person is forbidden by law. Most of these States are in the Deep South—but not all. The list includes Wyoming, Indiana, West Virginia, Delaware, Maryland, Oklahoma, Missouri and Kentucky in addition to the 11 States of the Civil War Confederacy.

Some of the States also bar marriages of whites with other races.

The recent trend outside the South has been toward the elimination of laws against racial intermarriage. As the map shows, 12 States have repealed such laws since World War II.

What happens if a Negro-white couple marries in a State which permits mixed marriage, then takes up residence in a State which forbids it?

Most authorities agree: The mixed marriage would not be recognized inside the State to which they moved—and criminal penalties might be invoked against the man and woman if living together.

In most of the States where intermarriage is banned, such a marriage is considered automatically void.

Problems galore. The voiding of a mixed marriage can lead to many difficulties. Courts have held children of interracial unions to be illegitimate. Spouses as well as children can lose rights of inheritance. In some States it is a crime for a minister knowingly to perform a mixed-marriage ceremony.

Several States impose a stiffer penalty for sexual relations outside of marriage when members of different races are involved than when both offenders are of the same race.

The whole subject of mixed marriages has become increasingly controversial as the Negro battle over civil rights has grown in intensity. Miscegenation is a word heard with increasing frequency. The word is defined as "racial interbreeding."

Advocates of racial segregation predict that miscegenation will become more common as integration spreads.

The recent case of Charlayne Hunter is cited. She was the first Negro coed admitted to the University of Georgia. On September 3 it was disclosed that she had secretly married a white student.

Are mixed marriages actually increasing in number?

Complete statistics are lacking. But one 1956 survey indicated that, in the States where interracial marriage is legal, fewer than 5 per cent of married Negroes have non-Negro spouses and fewer than one half of 1 per cent of all marriages involve Negroes and whites.

One place where mixed marriages have increased is among Negro soldiers stationed overseas. Many of them have brought back white brides.

What about the constitutionality of State laws against mixed marriage?

The U. S. Supreme Court has ruled repeatedly against various forms of racial segregation.

In several States—including California and Nevada—State laws against miscegenation have been struck down by State courts.

Yet the Supreme Court of the United States has never ruled directly on the question of whether laws barring mixed marriages violate the U. S. Constitution.

Court: No hurry? Some lawyers have observed that the Supreme Court has not appeared anxious to make a ruling.

Twice in recent years cases involving mixed-marriage bans have been appealed to the Supreme Court. But each time the Court disposed of the case on technical grounds, without deciding the constitutional issue.

Now a new case—involving a Florida couple—is on its way to the Supreme Court, and many people across the country are watching closely to see if it will produce a direct ruling on this increasingly controversial issue.

Copyright © 1963, U.S.News & World Report, Inc.

Received 10-17-63 LWD

From the desk of: Harold Kilpatrick

Texas Council of Churches
1400 Guadalupe
Austin 1, Texas

For your information

— H.C.K.

reply & order
full report
ordered complete poll
10-21-63 MA

FELIX SHUFORD PRINTING CO. - AUSTIN

R & R Pol.

Texas Poll

Whites Oppose Mixing

By JOE BELDEN
Director, The Texas Poll

True equality for the American Negro can come only to the degree that white public opinion, on a local level, accepts the mixing of the races. How well prepared are Texans to accept the Negro citizen in the social situations the current Negro "revolt" demands be integrated now, not later?

Mounting pressure from racial leaders and the Kennedy administration makes it important to be able to gauge where and how much resistance exists if violence is to be averted. The Texas Poll in recent weeks has probed deeply into white attitudes on 11 subjects dealing with integration.

The import of this research is that white Texans are far from ready, personally, to accept the Negro on equal terms. In some areas of social contract there is fierce, if dormant, hostility in this state, so far missed by the racial upheavals that have plagued other parts of the South.

A cross section of white adults has been interviewed, distributed in proportion to population density over the entire state. The results, however, omit Mexican - Americans, since they usually favor integration measures overwhelmingly. The questions were posed in terms of personal acceptance or rejection rather than of civil rights.

Working side by side with a Negro is the only situation acceptable to a clear majority. And there is slightly more acceptance than rejection in riding in the same sections of trains and buses, which is already in practice in most places.

"How about Negroes riding in the same section of trains and buses with you?"

| | Per cent |
|---|---|
| Accept | 49 |
| Reject | 47 |
| No answer | 4 |

"Eating in the same restaurants with you?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 40 |
| Reject | 57 |
| No answer | 3 |

"Staying in the same hotels with you?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 36 |
| Reject | 60 |
| No answer | 4 |

"Sending your children to the same schools?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 41 |
| Reject | 55 |
| No answer | 4 |

"Attending your church?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 41 |
| Reject | 50 |
| No answer | 4 |

"Using the same public swimming pools with you?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 19 |
| Reject | 77 |
| No answer | 4 |

"Working side by side with you in the same kind of job?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 56 |
| Reject | 40 |
| No answer | 4 |

"Attending the same social gathering outside of your home?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 23 |
| Reject | 73 |
| No answer | 4 |

"Attending a social gathering in your home?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 13 |
| Reject | 83 |
| No answer | 4 |

"Living next door to you?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 23 |
| Reject | 74 |
| No answer | 3 |

"Having as roommate for your son or daughter at college?"

| | |
|---|---|
| Accept | 8 |
| Reject | 88 |
| No answer | 4 |

These questions were asked in the order in which they appear above.

In another study published last week covering the President's proposed civil rights legislation now in Congress, the Texas Poll found majority acceptance among white of only one of his proposals; that to provide government poll watchers to insure that Negroes are allowed to vote.

voting rights
+ C R legislation

In asking the questions above, people expressed intensity of feeling by the use of a scale that allowed them to select one of five degrees of acceptance or five degress of rejection. The significant finding from this analysis is that those opposed are considerably more vehement about their feelings than those who accept integration in one form or another. On each of the issues, the greatest number of both proponents and opponents placed themselves in the most extreme positions on the scale — an indication of the wide distance that exists, even among whites, when they happen to differ on the racial problem.

College graduates in the state accept the Negro more readily than people with less education; majorities of college graduates accept them in restaurants, hotels, trains and buses, schools, and churches, but reject them in swimming pools, social gatherings, living next door, and as roommates for their children in college.

San Antonio Integration A Fact But Kept Mum

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — A Negro airman and his girl dance to soft music in a night club. All others on the floor are white.

Eight Negroes, civilians by their dress, eat a late dinner in a Mexican restaurant. They get the same service as whites.

This happened last week in San Antonio — a Southern city by geography, a military city by history and an integrated city by choice.

It happens every day.

And because these things happen in San Antonio, the city expects to feel no effects from a controversial directive from its biggest spender, the Defense Department.

The directive orders base commanders to require that all men in uniform, regardless of race, get equal treatment off the base.

•

Some congressmen attacked the directive as a weapon to force integration of cities near military bases.

Yet the directive is hardly discussed here — one of the largest military-oriented cities in the nation.

"Don't quote me, but we don't expect any problems at all," the commander of one of San Antonio's five military bases said. "I haven't heard of a single instance of a man in uniform being discriminated against in San Antonio."

Businessmen say they have lost no white patrons because they serve Negroes.

San Antonio, a city of almost 700,000, was founded by the Spanish as a military and religious outpost. Its oldest buildings are church-forts.

Now there are about 57,000 servicemen stationed here.

Someone figured there are 418,693 persons — more than the population of Fort Worth, Texas' fourth largest city — who get all or part of their income from the military in San Antonio.

The city's economy is estimated at $1.2 billion a year. About one-third of this, $329 million, comes from defense payrolls. The manufacturing payroll is about $100 million annually.

A Negro serviceman can spend his pay just about any place he wants in San Antonio and ride at the front of the bus getting there.

He can rent or buy a home in several predominantly white sections although some neighborhoods — especially those in suburban towns — still resist Negroes.

His children attend integrated public or private schools. He worships in integrated churches. His wife can try on dresses in the best shops and lunch in the best restaurants.

Yet there is a reluctance on the Negro's part, and on his commander's part, to discuss the Defense Department directive for publication. Even young Negro recruits stopped at random on a street corner asked that their names not be used.

"An airman basic has enough problems now. Why ask for more?" one said.

"In the four years I've been stationed here I have never been confronted with the problem of segregation on or off the base," a Negro at Kelly Air Force base said. "I can't comment on the subject either way."

San Antonio, in 1955, became one of the first cities in the South to integrate its public schools. Since then, every public-owned facility has been opened to all races.

Yet not all Negroes say San Antonio is integrated.

"I don't think San Antonio is integated yet, and it won't be as long as we have to depend on voluntary desegregation," said the Rev. C. W. Black Jr., a Baptist minister.

He is one of the Negro leaders who has asked that the city council pass an anti-discrimination ordinance. The council has refused, saying businessmen must decide whether they wish to serve all races.

The council this spring appointed a committee to seek voluntary integration of all privately owned businesses that serve the public.

•

The council said on July 4 that it held integration pledges from most of the 656 public businesses in the city limits.

But Mrs. Sharon West, a Negro who spoke at a council meeting the day of the civil rights march in Washington, D. C., said some businessmen have gone back on their pledges.

Joe Scott, a Negro teacher, disagrees.

"San Antonio is integrated," he said. "Voluntary desegregation is working. I don't know of any serviceman being refused service."

An informal bi-racial committee laid the groundwork for desegregation beginning three years ago, long before the city council committee was named.

There still are some holdouts. Few private clubs or country clubs will admit Negroes even as guests.

Rev. Dan Douglas of the S.A. Council of Churches reports that 98± % of establishments serving the public are integrated. (Oct.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

edy is to arrange beforehand for a simple, decent burial (or cremation) through a nonprofit memorial society. The results, in any other field, could only be termed hilarious. Some undertakers have suggested that criticism of Cadillac-style funerals is a Communist plot. Others say that it is only fitting that status should be exemplified in death as in life. "People are just buying more," says an eminent San Francisco mortician. "Normal starting prices for funerals in this area are pretty much unchanged from the $500 or so we were getting ten years ago. But standards of dying, like standards of living, are higher. In lots of places not only air-conditioned mortuaries but air-conditioned limousines are demanded."

Soon the corpses will demand air-conditioned hearses. All this costs money, of course, and takes a bit of selling. Gordon tells of a four-day "merchandising symposium" for funeral directors which wound up with a talk titled: "As Ye Price, So Shall Ye Reap," a beautiful religious sentiment which the clergy will appreciate. The clergy are, in fact, something of a problem to the morticians who, Gordon asserts, almost invariably try to keep them out of the casket selection room, lest they interfere with "trading up." The good will of the clergy is sought by various devices, mostly psychological, but an interesting gimmick is an "earth dispenser" which is distributed to build clerical "good will." Instead of dirtying his hands sprinkling earth on the coffin as he says, "Dust unto dust," the compliant clergyman uses the dispenser and thinks of the funeral director who furnished him with this indispensable tool.

The Sovereign Remedy

Nuisance-makers take a more tranquil view of their handiwork if it occurs far from their homes. In the pre-test-ban period, this country and Britain were inclined to minimize the fallout that fell on the peoples of the Pacific. France now would like to shift its tests from the Sahara to the Pacific where the protests, it was hoped, would be fewer and milder. New Zealand and Australia are of course indignant. But protests seldom bring nuisance-makers to their senses. The remedy has always been to compel them to confine their activities to their own back yards. For example, this country finds itself having to conduct nuclear tests underground, on its own territory, and so from Nevada come reports that underground tests are now thought to involve serious health hazards. Peril is seen in "ventings" which permit radioactive debris to break to the surface. Latest data suggest that some children in Utah and nearby states may have drunk dangerously contaminated milk. It is also beginning to be suggested that radioative debris thrown into the air above Nevada might be wafted across the border into Canada. This sounds as though some government agencies, and quite a number of residents of the affected states, were now anxious to halt underground tests. And now that we have decided to test supersonic missiles in Utah and New Mexico, an extensive "educational" campaign had to be launched to convince residents that the tests are safe. Doubtless the enthusiasm of these hardy Western types for such testing will abate now that tests are to take place over their heads.

R&R Rel. The Nation 10/19/63

Class, Color and Prejudice . . . Bruno Bettelheim

The tragedies, big and small, which occur daily on the streets of our big cities; the deep emotions roused by the murder of children attending Sunday school; our concern that such things must not be permitted to happen; all this and much more tend to make us see in them a unique American problem. Worse, we now accept as a racial problem what in my opinion is a problem of modern industrial society, neither uniquely American, nor confined to the relations between white and Negro. To use an example from an area where there is presently much controversy: all over the world, wherever and as far back as an organized school system existed, the children of the poor, and of the less privileged classes, had only inadequate access to good education, could gain it only against heavy odds, and because of this, their occupational opportunities were severely limited. This is true even where in theory education is equally accessible to all. It was and is true even in all those countries where all children are of the same skin color.

Perhaps the great "American Dilemma," viewed at a distance, permits seeing more clearly what are the essentials of the conflict, and what the accidentals of time, place and skin color. To me, a Jewish boy who grew up in the intensely anti-Semitic Vienna of Lueger—which incidentally formed Hitler's anti-Semitism too—the American dilemma does not seem peculiarly American at all, but merely a local variation of a universal problem. Having once experienced discrimination and persecution as bad as any Negro's, and this from persons whose skin was like mine, I feel that differences in color fail to explain problems which often are ascribed to them.

These thoughts came to my mind when recently reading a sensitive story of a Jewish boy's encounter with the Negro problem in Brooklyn, a story that found wide attention and evoked some controversy. I refer to Norman Podhoretz's article, "My Negro Problem—and Ours," which appeared in the February issue of Commentary, and the exchange of letters in the following issues of that magazine. He describes his experiences as he grew up in an environment where Jews and Negroes lived in close proximity, but where soon a deep gap separated them, a gap which he feels had to do with the difference in racial background. This I find hard to accept, because I can match practically every incident of his story with one out of my childhood; and this goes, I venture to guess, for many Jewish boys of my generation. In Vienna there was a "Carl" with whom I walked to school every day, who was my friend, and who nevertheless suddenly hit me one day, announcing that we were quits from now on because my people had killed Jesus. There were the boys who extorted money: who beat us if we handed it over because we were dirty cowards, and who beat us if we didn't, because we were miserly Jews. During the years of the First World War came the added charges that we were draft dodgers or black marketeers. And all this without the presence of any color difference or—as far as I was concerned—any racial difference (though the gentiles insisted we belonged to a different race).

Bruno Bettelheim is Rowley Professor of Education at the University of Chicago. Of his several books The Informed Heart (Free Press of Glencoe) is most pertinent to this article.

Nobody considered any of this the consequence of a Viennese, German or Central European dilemma. It was the natural fate of the Jew. Or so it seemed to me in the earlier days of my childhood. Therefore it was quite an eye opener for me when I entered the Gymnasium and the picture changed. No longer were the Jews singled out. The frequent name calling and verbal threats, the occasional attacks and small extortions, all these happened to gentile students, too, though less often and less violently so. They too had become targets of the hostility of former friends, boys who were now continuing their education in the free public schools. Though only yesterday they had been friends, they were now strangers or open foes. It was always open season for war on us Gymnasium students, Jew or gentile, as far as the public-school boys were concerned.

In the public schools, too, the bond of common aspirations and class position made itself felt. Now that it was one class against the other, the few Jewish boys in the public school made common cause with the vast majority of their gentile classmates against all Gymnasium boys. And with us it was the same. Jew and gentile closed ranks against public-school boys. And this though the war between Jew and gentile continued inside the Gymnasium.

Again, as we outgrew childhood and became adolescents, the picture changed. Our antagonists had left school by then and become apprentices in shops and factories, while we continued our studies. The gulf widened. Except for gang fights or for rare individual acts of violence, we were now too separated by an icy hostility on their part, and a thinly veiled anxiety on ours—yes, and guilt because we were the more fortunate ones—for even verbal invectives. They felt they had never had a chance, and that we had deprived them.

Now our two worlds—the world of those who pursued their higher education, and of those who were already workers — had nothing in common, not even our fighting each other. But within the world of the Gymnasium, the old fight between Jews and gentiles continued. Given the social amenities binding those who aspired to become upper-middle class, there was no longer open violence, not to mention extortion. These were replaced by social ostracism of a more subtle nature.

This taught me then, at an early age, that what in previous generations had been the persecution of the Jews and still looked like it, had essentially become a special aspect of the universal warfare between rich and poor; even between those who were actually poor at the moment but aspired to better their social and economic positions, and those others who accepted that it was hopeless to try to better their lot. Later, in Hitler's concentration camps, I made similar observations. There, too, behind the "racial" warfare one could clearly detect the class structure that underlay and overlapped the group hostilities. The violence of the lower-class S.S. guards vented itself much more formidably against upper-class persons, Jewish or not. By comparison, the lower-class Jew had an easier time of it if he knew how to appeal to the common lower-class background he shared with the S.S. Even in the concentration camps, and until the extermination policy began, class alignment often won out over racial policies in the eyes of the German guards. Interestingly enough, the concentration camp's own "class" system erased old class lines and instituted its own distinctions between the haves as against the have-nots (the prisoner foreman against the ordinary prisoner, for example). So, despite their sympathies with their fellow Jews, when the chips were down the Jewish prisoner aristocracy more often than not sided with the gentile prisoner aristocracy against Jewish and gentile ordinary prisoners.

One further parallel: from childhood on I had heard stories of the rich gentile man who could have sexual fun only with the poor Jewish girl, a fairy tale recently retold in the play Two for the Seesaw. And of the rich Jewish boy who found his sex pleasures only with the poor gentile servant girl. I also heard much about the guilt suffered by the gentleman for seducing the poor girl, and how he was hated, or feared to be hated, by the girl's family. In fact, precious few poor girls were seduced, and none to speak of were raped by the gentleman class. They did not need to be. The more usual course of events was that the poor girl, both because of her psychological and economic needs, seduced the rich young gentleman and enjoyed herself considerably in the process. Nor did her relatives hate the so-called seducer, but tried to gain some advantage for themselves. All this was mainly a class phenomenon, and existed in a wholly white society. It had nothing to do with race, because there were no racial differences. There was no Central European dilemma.

An entire mythology has been woven around the supposed guilt of the white man and the innocence of the Negro. Only last week a Negro cab driver in Chicago told me reassuringly that not all Negroes hate all white men; that white men, like me, only think it because of our guilt at having abused poor Negro girls. (I did not quite dare tell him that I never had any close relations to a Negro female, nor any sexual relations with one, because I feared he would have taken it to mean that I deliberately shun them, which I do not. It has come to pass that whatever a white man does is wrong: if he has intimate relations with Negroes, he takes advantage of them; if he abstains, it only proves his white arrogance.) When I assured him, however, that I had never seduced a Negro girl and therefore did not feel guilty, he told me that this made no difference. I felt guilty and I feared Negro hatred because my ancestors had enslaved Negroes and abused Negro females. Such small considerations as that my ancestors lived in East European ghettos at the time of Negro slavery were not allowed to interfere with the myth.

Having fought the doctrine of guilt by association when McCarthy used it against liberals, it is amazing to witness the readiness with which the same liberals accept his doctrine when it states that all white men are guilty because white people actually took advantage of Negroes long before they were born. These liberals seem to feel that McCarthy was right, after all, and that there is such a thing as guilt by association. Not even McCarthy hoped to establish guilt by association with the deeds of one's great-grandfather.

Yet there is a guilt, both in my native Vienna and in Chicago where I live. It is the guilt of the man who is not his brother's keeper, of the man who lives in comfort when others live in squalor. It is a guilt if he is sensitive, and a fear whether he is sensitive or not; it is also the origin of the hatred in those who hate him because he has it better. Only it has nothing to do with the "peculiar institution" which is a matter of the past, or with an "American Dilemma." It has to do with the plain fact that the rich live in comfort, and the poor do not.

The attitudes of white and Negro to each other are largely conditioned by the fact that the vast majority of whites are considerably better off than the vast majority of Negroes. If we were all aware of the findings on personality attitudes among the poor, we would recognize that what makes us uneasy in our relations to the Negro is exactly what makes us uneasy in our relations to the poor, and has precious little to do with skin color. When a nearly all-white population was studied, the investigating psychiatrists found that, by and large, the poor (whites) are "suspicious . . . prone to depression, show lack of trust in others," exactly the attitudes most whites feel when confronted by chance meeting with an anonymous group of Negroes. They are exactly the attitudes I encountered in a poor district of Vienna when I, a middle-class person, was confronted with a basically distrustful, if not outright hostile, group of anonymous workers.

The class basis of color prejudice is further indicated by a fact that is sometimes mistakenly viewed as negating it: namely, that lower-class whites are often more prejudiced than upper-middle-class persons. This again has to do with class position. A group insecure in its social position is most afraid and resentful of the group just below, particularly when the lower group is trying to advance itself. Similarly, every class is most jealous of the group just above it, although on a rational basis the classes way ahead would seem to be much more logical targets. So each class is most jealous of the class just above, and most afraid of and angry at the class just below—despite the fact that on a rational level these are the groups with whom they should make common cause. To compound matters, this is not only a social phenomenon. As Freud pointed out, there are also deep psychological causes for the violent hostility existing between groups that are separated by only small differences, while these feelings become much more moderate as social distance between groups increases.

If we are serious about the Negro problem, we will have to free ourselves of the myth that this is basically a classless society, or that the upper classes and the poor can live together peaceably. In the United States, the existence of color differences permitted this myth to persist, because what are conflicts between classes could be ascribed to differences in skin color.

The confusion about the American white-Negro relations comes from an unwillingness to separate a class problem from a race problem, if there is one. We are going to have to face the fact that in present-day America, a much larger percentage of the Negro group is lower class than their total number warrants, though a white lower class is by no means absent. How much all this is a class problem is reflected in the fact that there is no seduction of middle-class Negro girls by middle-class white boys, but quite an incidence of seduction of middle-class white girls by middle-class or even lower-class Negro boys. This parallels the phenomenon described earlier, of my native Austria. The heiress or the count's daughter who ran off with the chauffeur or the groom provides an easy parallel, and for the same psychological reasons. They have precious little to do with race, but a great deal to do with class position, and with what one class believes in regard to the sexual freedom or prowess of the other. D. H. Lawrence, leaving nothing to chance, made Clifford Chatterley impotent, in a wheel chair, whence his wife fled to the lower classes for erotic fulfillment.

If James Baldwin concluded his recent statement on the race problem with the threat, "the fire next time," this too has a familiar ring. The class-conscious white workers of Vienna, and their Marxist leaders, threatened the white upper classes with destruction in nearly the same words and with the same accusations: because they had robbed the lower class of its human dignity, did not recognize its members as individuals, viewed them as faceless.

All this suggests it is high time we began to bring clarity into our complex white-Negro relations by recognizing what belongs to class conflict as such, irrespective of history or skin color. This is not to deny that the color difference has indeed greatly complicated matters by now. Intolerance has always been due to anxiety and frustration, and served as an outlet for hostility. But intolerance of a specific minority can never be viewed in isolation but must always be analyzed within its societal context. Minorities have been used for the displacement of internal conflicts (the pull of unacceptable instinctual desires, for example) if their position in society makes it "logical" to displace such tendencies (sex libertinism, dirtiness, laziness) onto them.

Moreover, it would seem that when several minority groups are available and they differ in physical characteristics, such as skin color, the minority showing greater physical difference is used for projecting anxieties associated with dirt and sex desires. The minority whose physical characteristics are more similar to those of the majority tend then to become a symbol for anxieties concerning overpowering control. In Germany, the whole list of stereotypes was applied to the Jews, which in the United States was divided between Jews and Negroes. In German anti-Semitic propaganda, Jewish dirtiness and sexual immorality were greatly emphasized. (If I discuss these things all too sketchily here, it is because to say more would only repeat what others and I have discussed extensively elsewhere — for example, in Dynamics of Prejudice and The Informed Heart.)

Thus the problem arises neither because of poverty alone, nor because of the deep psychological roots of intolerance alone. As Podhoretz says, he was poor, too, like the Negroes who beat him up. And not even all Negroes are born into or remain in the lower strata. What counts just as much is how deprived one feels, and how much one feels one can alter the conditions of one's life. Neither the individual's life history alone nor social conditions alone account for race hatred. Unfortunately, in the case of the Negro, the actual social realities of this moment militate against a hopeful outlook. He is born with a fence around him, and he feels the fence even more impregnable than it actually is.

Which again accounts for the extremity of Baldwin's position, and for the appeal of the Black Muslim slogans to those who rage at a vista without hope. The degree of the Negro's hopelessness has its counterpart in the degree of his violence. Podhoretz is correct. He fears the Negro in the dark whose predominant feeling is hate and despair. "If I have nothing to lose, here goes nothing." What the true situation really is becomes immediately apparent if we ask ourselves: Would Podhoretz or would I tremble if we met James Baldwin on a dark street? Certainly not; we would be delighted to meet him because, despite the color difference, he is one of us.

To be freed of the class issue, or to accept as class issue what is class issue, might at least permit lower-class whites and Negroes, and middle-class whites and Negroes, to live quite successfully together. As long as radical class differentiations exist, it is to expect the millenium to believe that lower-class Negroes will not hate middle-class or upwardly mobile whites, or that middle-class whites will not fear lower-class Negroes and whites.

Expecting the millenium in this world has always led to avoidance of doing in the here and now what can be done to relieve a social ill. The existence of the color line has permitted both white and Negro Americans to overlook the class problem by pointing to the color problem. Being afraid of the Negro robber and rapist has permitted all too many white people to forget about the white robber and rapist. Above all, it obscures the fact that precious few well-to-do people rob or rape. And it has permitted the Negro to blame on the color line hardships that grow out of the contradictions in our social and economic system.

All this is said not to belittle the seriousness of the Negro problem for both whites and Negroes. But, to blame all our difficulties on color is to take skin color much too seriously, and of such an over-evaluation of color (or "racial") differences I do not wish to be guilty.

The New Frontier and Europe

MOMENT FOR CHOICE . . . . . Fred Warner Neal

The major problem of United States foreign policy has long been a cold-war immobilisme that arose in the Truman administrations. Some few statesmen have perceived—however dimly—the need for change, but have been inhibited from action by a public rigidity which, if it were not itself created by administration policies, was molded by them. Only intelligent and courageous Presidential leadership can break such an impasse. With the exception of a brief attempt by President Eisenhower after Dulles, that leadership, up until now, has not materialized.

One does not have to endorse all President Kennedy's positions to recognize that he seems now to have taken some steps toward breaking out of the strait jacket, and to applaud him for it. But the task is an incredibly difficult one and no brief essay on his part will suffice. The central question, therefore, is whether the changed mood implied by New Frontier foreign policy is ephemeral, or whether it reflects new basic thinking and thus may presage new policy.

The evidence is ambiguous. The most important indication that more than a passing mood may be involved is the President's American University speech of last June. There he went to the heart of the matter by calling for a re-examination of American attitudes toward the Soviet Union. That such a statement was long overdue does not detract from the fact that it was probably the best and most realistic statement on foreign policy made by an American President since the end of World War II.

Another clue to Presidential thinking may be Mr. Kennedy's inadequately reported statement at an

Fred Warner Neal, former State Department consultant on Russian Affairs and author of War and Peace and Germany, teaches international relations at the Claremont Graduate School (Claremont, Calif.).

Saturday Review
October 19, 1963

R+R Rel.

By Joseph P. Lyford

PROPOSAL FOR A REVOLUTION—PART 1

Negroes, Education, and the Two-Edged Sword

IN THE course of his struggle, the Negro has presented Americans with a basic education about themselves. He has demonstrated that the majority of white Americans, in the South and out of it, are in varying degrees violently or silently opposed to the universal application of the Bill of Rights. By interposing his own body he has shown, beyond any reasonable doubt, the inability of the government of the people to guarantee the freedom of all the people or even protect the safety of their persons if they happen to be of an unusual color. The Negro has made it fairly clear that the Protestant churches in America have countenanced the subversion of fundamental Christian principles about as often as they have advanced the idea of human brotherhood.

But the Negro has done a great deal more than expose the contradictions between the actual and professed beliefs of the American citizen. His battle for freedom has established the fact that the Negro cannot win equality of opportunity until American society as a whole develops some way of dealing with the rise of mass unemployment and the growing ineffectiveness of our political and educational system. What we call the "Negro revolution" is a preview of a much bigger crisis to come; it is forcing us to take a closer look at certain extremely unpleasant developments that are going to transform or destroy the traditional institutions and habits of all of us, black and white. If we fully understand the significance of the Negro's present experience, we will realize how great a stake we have in his success. Given the recent past, however, it seems more likely that we will react by building "monstrosities," as Arnold Toynbee calls them. A "monstrosity" is an ugly construction set up by a society to deal with the effects of a problem it is unwilling to solve, current examples being our public welfare program and the proliferation of mental hospitals.

Paradoxically, some Negro leaders do not seem to be fully aware of what they are up against—at least they have not broadened their attack on the problems of the Negro. They continue to concentrate almost entirely on desegregation, the right to vote, fair employment practices, and the breaking down of all types of racial discrimination. The means of reaching these objectives still seem to be mainly a matter of picketing, protest, pressure, and litigation. Perhaps this is all the civil rights groups are able to do. If so, the Negro badly needs a new type of organization that will work on his more general problems. Negro leaders and their white allies may win battle after battle for Constitutional rights only to find that these rights have little practical meaning for the majority of American Negroes under present conditions. The entry of a pair of Negro children into an all-white Birmingham school is an important victory for a fundamental principle, but it carries no immediate hope for Negro children, who will continue to starve to death educationally in the still-segregated schools of the South and hundreds of thousands more who are overcrowding classrooms in the slum-area schools of the North.

---

"Revolutions never go backward," said the abolitionist Wendell Phillips in 1861. The ensuing century, and particularly the last few years, have so completely confirmed his prophecy that almost every day brings dramatic changes in the struggle for Negro equality. In this issue, therefore, SR surveys the present state of that struggle from several points of view, in an effort to describe exactly what point the Negro has reached in his journey toward the full life of the American citizen. Beginning on this page, Joseph P. Lyford, an executive of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, suggests a program for the next step in the revolution. On page 22 Elinor Richey, a writer specializing in problems of integration, describes an effort to thwart integration in housing. Two editorials, on pages 28 and 49, discuss issues arising out of the changing status of the Negro. Finally, on page 56, a child psychiatrist discusses the impact on children of the swift changes in the nation's racial patterns. Taken together, the various parts of this survey suggest that, despite the obstacles remaining, Americans have good reason to regard the hope expressed in the Negro chant, "We Shall Overcome," not as a vague prediction but as a simple statement of fact. The only question now is how fast the revolution will go forward.

---

Forcing open a Jim Crow construction union in New York City to a handful of Negro apprentices is a step forward for decency, yet it has almost no bearing on the employment prospects of hundreds of thousands of teen-agers and millions of adults—white and Negro—who are sinking to the bottom of a society that may very well have 14,000,000 unemployed by 1970. A clean sweep of housing discrimination will not wipe out a single slum or ghetto. The Negro who cries "now" is having to face these facts.

The white man has to face these facts, too. If he thinks very much about joblessness and the state of our educational system, it must occur to him that the Negro is struggling against forces that are undermining white society as well. The Negro has begun to react before anyone else because, being economically in the most exposed position, he is far more sensitive to the shock signals that are traveling through the country. But there should be no assumption on anybody's part that his fate can be divided from the rest of America's. If the Negro does not prevail over the forces that are driving him downward, the white American will go down with him. The issue is the survival of an entire people whose basic educational, political, and economic arrangements are on the verge of breaking down.

IT IS now just about official that mass unemployment can be added to death and taxes as an inevitable part of the American way of life. Like most inevitable things, they are also totally mysterious. Ed Lahey, an irreverent Washington reporter who has spent most of his time poking into economic riddles, says that there are only three people—he declines to name them—who can understand our tax laws. There is almost as much confusion about unemployment and what it is about to do to us. Our ignorance is becoming more and more apparent at the very moment automation is wiping out 200,000 jobs annually in factories alone and we are trying to figure out what to do about the demands of the Negro for fair and adequate employment.

The most ominous fact about our attitude on unemployment is not that we have failed to discover a solution. It is tha twe have been unable to come to any sort of agreement in Congress, industry, or labor about what we are dealing with. We have not made the essential connection between unemployment and the breakdown of our system of public education. We have not accepted the fact that the Negro cannot become a part of American society until we find some answer to unemployment. We have not even decided whether 5,000,000 unemployed and 35,000,000 more underemployed are the result of gross economic mismanagement or whether mass idleness is an integral part of a new economic system based on a technological revolution.

Our reaction to the spread of unemployment bears some resemblance to the psychological paralysis that attacks us when we consider the threat of war. In both situations we face problems that have been with us so long they seem permanent, and permanent problems easily become incurable diseases. So, as Jerome Frank has said, we pretend that the diseases don't exist and transfer our attention to such matters as moon shots and the decline of British morality.

WHILE we have postponed a persistent and scientific examination of unemployment, our ignorance has increased as the crisis has worsened. An investigation into the various devices we use to measure unemployment reveals that we have only a cloudy notion of how many people are out of work. Generally accepted estimates tend to understate the problem, partly because unemployment figures are a political issue filtered through governmental agencies and partly because we have no psychological tests to use on people to find out whether they can work, want to work, and have looked for work. Our detection devices are also unreliable: there are thousands of drifting, anonymous people who have become so isolated from American society that they are invisible even to the census-taker. We have only the sketchiest impressions about the attitudes of the unemployed—Negro and white, young and old—toward their situation and a society that finds no practical use for their services. Yet these attitudes may very well cause a major political upheaval if they continue to ferment.

We are also in the dark about the capacities and potentialities of our unemployed and the many millions of others who inhabit the impoverished "other America" described by Michael Harrington. For example, last year the President's Council of Economic Advisers reported that racial bias has prevented us from utilizing the existing or potential skills of the Negro and that the annual loss to the country is between $13 and $17 billion per year. But discrimination is only one cause of our failure to use manpower efficiently. A random sample of the relatively few job-training programs now in effect indicates that we do not know how to find out what people can do, regardless of what color they are, or how to train them or what to train them for.

Without necessarily saying so, we generally assume that when a man is out of work it is because he is lazy or because there is nothing useful he can do. We feel that because the Negro has always been at the bottom of the educational ladder (69 per cent of the Negroes in New York City have not finished high school), it is natural for him to end up on welfare and spend the rest of his life looking for odd jobs. At the same time we ignore the fact that 61.6 per cent of whites in the same city also do not have a high school diploma but are twice as successful in earning a living. Our thinking about the unemployed is largely speculation; and in all of our speculation there is the more or less subconscious conclusion that the middle-aged Negro, the Kentucky miner in the Cumberlands, the aging migrant worker are, economically speaking, multiple amputees who will have to be written off or absorbed into some sort of relief program. We then turn our attention to the children and hold sporadic discussions about saving them from their parents' fate, thereby entering a new realm of misconceptions about a new generation. Our approach to all the above-mentioned matters is fitful, disorganized, and superficial.

Certainly there is little evidence that our political and governmental officials, our labor unions, management, or individual economists have done much more than throw up their hands, blame automation for reducing us to a state of inactivity, and say, "That's life. It's the price of progress." We accept the inevitability of mass unemployment and propose five-hour weeks and salaries for everybody, or we make a few experimental doodles with retraining programs we know are either unworkable or prohibitively expensive and tinker with our educational system in the hope it will get around to producing repairmen for a world of pushbuttons, electronic brains, and dial systems. Beyond this, there is almost nothing. Since glaciers are not melted by cigarette lighters, the freezing process continues.

We cannot afford to resign ourselves to the situation, and there is no need to. We have been given an opportunity by our improved technology to concentrate fully on some of the really important business of living for the first time in our history. In order to get at this business, we need to recognize that it is legitimate and important even though it pays no profits to stockholders or management. We are going to have to junk traditional attitudes about what constitutes the proper business of government before anything of importance happens in the attack on unemployment. We have to redefine the meaning of urgent and necessary work to include jobs that promote the general welfare even to the exclusion of private profit. We are going to have to get rid of political, business, and labor leadership that says—although it doesn't believe what it says—that government has no role to play in the economic sphere except to act as an umpire for private quarrels and create regulatory bodies that regulate nothing but the critics. Unemployment is a massive problem, with massive effects on our future and it will not yield to anything but a massive attack. The direction of this attack, since it has not and cannot be assumed by labor and business, should be undertaken by government.

Out of work, Michigan worker (above) collects $46 unemployment check. Lining up for relief food are unemployed miners and families (right) in Western Pennsylvania.

—Photos from Wide World.

The private areas of our economy should be cooperating partners in the attack, if not voluntarily then under duress. It has always been fashionable to protest against government compulsion, but there will be compulsion from somewhere even if it does not come from government. We already have had innumerable demonstrations of such compulsion; the government's intervention in the rail situation, with the support of U. S. industry, is only the most recent example. If unemployment continues to grow, there will be other, far more explosive pressures compelling us to act. The discontent of those people for whom our republic indicates it has no use will be more than economic. Robert Weaver writes that, for the first time in our history, we now have "class" unemployment. The discontent will be class discontent, and circulating through it will be the inflammable antagonisms between the Negro who finds himself the most expendable part of the system we still refer to as free, private enterprise, and the unemployed white with whom he is competing for dwindling job opportunities.

WHAT is the important business of America that remains to be done, now that we have buttons and levers handling the garbage and ready to make automobiles? The first order of business is education. This is a process in which every American can participate, whether as a teacher, a student, a bricklayer, a parent, or a taxpayer. It is a business which up to now has been regarded chiefly as an annoying and expensive sacrifice of public funds. When one compares the magnitude of the need for a broadened program of public education with the size of our commitment, it is fair to say that we are still living in the pre-education phase of American history. Walter Lippmann has pointed out that in 1900 the U. S. government spent $1 for education to every $2 for other purposes, while more than fifty years later we are spending $1 out of every $6, despite the fact that the importance and complexity of education are greater today than ever before.

The old squabbles over infinitesimal financial increases in our educational commitment and the eventual adoption of some token federal aid to education and a few $5-a-week raises for teachers have no relevance any more. We will have to expand our educational coverage to the point at which every educable person will receive a high school diploma. This means raising the limit for compulsory school attendance from sixteen to eighteen. At the same time we have to intensify the educational experience of the individual pupil, not to the point at which all our class sizes are below thirty children, but to the point at which the ratio of teachers to pupils is one to fifteen, or even less, and where special services are available to children who start their education with severe economic, psychological, or cultural handicaps. A revolutionary expansion of our public education program to three or four times its present level can be financed once we have accepted its necessity. We have been able to mobilize far greater amounts for the construction of weapons and the subsidy of weapon makers and their shareholders. At this point, more and better education is more important to our national security than bigger and cleaner bombs. An uneducated, unemployable population is becoming the greatest threat to our national equilibrium. Education must become one of America's major occupations in the years ahead.

Underlying any expansion of our educational system must be a philosophy of education that meets the need of the people in it to achieve an independent position in adult life and to distinguish between sentimental fairy tales about America and current realities. Such an educational philosophy would enable us to produce people who could read, write, understand arithmetic, have ideas, and who would be emancipated from the sort of tribal attitudes that have turned Birmingham, Alabama, into a fratricidal society. It would also help produce a nation that can improve itself and anticipate change instead of simply starting violently whenever something jolts the status quo. It would help generate a social and political atmosphere in which people consider technological and social and political changes as promises or opportunities instead of "menaces," "threats," and "impending catastrophes." We would gradually condition ourselves to the point where we would shed our old skins as soon as they ceased to fit, instead of enduring them until the itching drove us crazy.

We might recognize more generally the fact that the misuse or disuse of human beings is caused by miscalculations and poor education and not by immutable economic "laws." If we wish to write off the Negro "problem," as it is called, as insoluble because we think Negroes are generally disqualified by lack of education and the attendant lack of incentive, we also have a responsibility to provide an educational system that is able, among other things, to deal with the causes of these misfortunes. If, in contrast, we consider that racial discrimination against Negroes is responsible for a great deal of their joblessness, an educational system should be able to handle that situation, too. If we view somebody without a job as a casualty of a mindless technology, we can set about the task of putting a mind back into the technology.

Apparently the only way of getting Americans to think seriously about education is to frighten them into it. This should not be difficult in the atmosphere of today's Negro discontent. There is no question that racial tensions are eventually going to make life impossible for all of us unless we develop an educational program that enables the Negro to enter our society and the white man to place a high value on his entry. It should be fairly obvious that education is the only method by which we can overcome our institutionalized system of cheating Negroes, halt the growth of a public welfare community, and slow down the emergence of a new group of aliens, the teen-age school dropouts. We are either going to broaden the boundaries of America to include the exiles, or most of us are going to be joining them.

Keeping the Outsiders Out

By ELINOR RICHEY

YOU CAN be evicted from your apartment for hanging new drapes. Or for throwing out too much wastepaper. Or for typing manuscripts. Or for failing to draw your shades at a uniform level. Or for any of a number of similarly momentous transgressions.

Especially if, among your friends, there is a Negro.

This has been the carefully documented and verified experience of residents in the Hyde Park neighborhood of Chicago, an area that illustrates, perhaps as clearly as any, the ingenuity of those who are opposed to integration and are in a position to back their opposition with power. Many of the same subterfuges are used elsewhere, but Hyde Park is a laboratory that offers the student of social reactionism a particularly clear view of his subject.

Lying in the shadow of the University of Chicago, Hyde Park is a neighborhood of academicians and professionals, many of whom live in rental apartments and row housing. When Negroes spilled over Hyde Park's western border during the postwar decade, many whites fled for suburbia. But those who stayed declared themselves, through their organizations and churches, in favor of forming a genuine interracial neighborhood. On this premise, the community obtained nearly $40-,000,000 in federal and city money to underwrite a nondiscriminatory urban renewal project.

Even though it was the citizens who opted for interracial urban renewal, it was the real estate interests that usurped direction of it. Under the program, 19,000 people were ultimately evicted, three-fourths of them Negro, and the cleared land was sold at low cost to private speculator-developers. It is eight years now since clearance began, and the acres of modern housing that replaced it are mellowed and fringed with trees and shrubbery. Yet, to date, only about 100 Negro families have replaced the 14,000 Negroes whom bulldozers evicted. Furthermore, Hyde Park's residual Negro ghetto continues to shrink via a "rehabilitation program" in which integrated and all-Negro apartment buildings are emptied, renovated, and reopened to white occupancy. Chicago Negroes say that Hyde Park urban renewal has been Negro removal.

But Hyde Park real estate policy not only systematically ejects Negroes; it appears equally dedicated to ridding the neighborhood of integration-minded whites. An ingenious form of discrimination is being directed against whites who mingle socially with Negroes. Apartment building owners and their agents are cooperating in highly complicated procedures, including spying and intimidation, to screen out whites who have Negro friends and to evict those who slip through their nets. This rental policy blankets the eastern side of the community and includes a high percentage of housing in western Hyde Park. Procedures are amazingly quiet and unobtrusive, designed to avoid a direct confrontation on the racial issue, which hangs in the air of this liberal community like an explosive gas.

Screening starts the moment you begin filling out one of the exhaustively inquisitive registration forms at a real estate office. If your address is an integrated building anywhere in Chicago (agents carry lists of these in their busy heads) you can be eliminated at once. Some agents are also familiar with integrated areas of other cities; anyone fresh from New York's Greenwich Village or Philadelphia's Concord Park is suspect. So are employees of large companies known to have integrated their staffs. So are artists, entertainers, and social workers. The registration form asks for your previous address, landlord's name, building owner's name, your last job, your bank account number, your mother's maiden name, and so on. Finished with that, you begin listing your references and giving a rundown on them. And watch your chatter; conversation that seems idle may be working full steam. You have flunked your test if at the end of the interview you are informed that the agency has "nothing at present," words pronounced in a tone that says the future promises nothing, either.

Should you survive this initial probing, however, the agency moves ahead with the screening process. A telephone call is made to one of a network of contacts that agencies maintain across the city. The contact nearest your present address may or may not know your social habits, but he may know somebody who knows somebody who does. If not, there are the sources you provided on the registration form. The process of checking you may be involved and prolonged. Or it may not be. One applicant, whom an agency had instructed to return in several hours to view an apartment, returned an hour later to amend his requirements and found the agency ready with the brush-off.

Even if all this yields nothing conclusive, there are still references to be checked out. Because agents are wary of putting touchy racial questions to references, they try to frame them as delicately as possible. But let the reference try to parry the question, and he will be asked point-blank: Does this applicant associate with Negroes and entertain them in his home? Some references resent this line of questioning and vent a tongue-lashing on the agent, who invariably accepts it placidly and marks it down as a dead giveaway of the culpability of the applicant.

National publicity about its interracial urban renewal program has given Hyde Park the image of a glistening haven of racial harmony, and it is an image that draws many Chicago newcomers. But a newcomer may get into trouble. Since his references and associations are out of town, and since agents hesitate to put racial queries in writing, the newcomer presents a sticky screening problem. An "undesirable" may slip through undetected. But if the agent has strong suspicions, he may ask the applicant if he would object to living in an integrated building. Integrated housing being scarce, the agent rarely can supply any, but the applicant's answer is sure to drop him in the proper slot.

An English scholar helpfully volunteered his slot in the initial interview, thereby making his Hyde Park sojourn unforgettable. He had thought he was widening his opportunities when he assured the agency he had no objection to integrated housing. Offered no housing whatever, he sought another agency, restating his adaptability, then another and another. Finally, desperate, he found lodging by covering the area on foot, seeking out "For Rent" shingles. Eventually he found far from elegant quarters, and promptly upset his landlady by entertaining at dinner a fellow scholar who was a Negro. "The other tenants will complain," she said. Before inviting his friend again, he took the precaution of asking all of the other tenants if they objected. Assured that they did not, he invited his associate to dine from time to time—until his landlady asked him to vacate. The baffled man checked into a hotel for the remainder of his stay.

The landlady's forthright complaint was exceptional, so much so that it brands her an amateur. The more sophisticated method is to substitute for the real eviction reason another one—a proxy reason that obscures the racial issue. One owner was so anxious to camouflage his objection to a tenant who gave interracial parties that he served eviction notices on every tenant in his building, feigning plans to redecorate.

USUALLY, however, the lease supplies the smoke screen. With the lease, the landlord stacks the game so that he can nearly always pick up the marbles. In two pages of fine-printed verbiage, convoluted with "to wits" and "whereases," the Hyde Park rental contract defies lay comprehension. The tenant who invites Negroes into his home is inviting an exegesis of his lease, or at any rate a clause or more of it that he has unwittingly breached. Before closing in on a tenant, some landlords take the preliminary step of warning him against "bringing those people in.") The tenant who proves to be a fraternizer will be served notice that his lease will not be renewed. When the tenant inquires "Why not?" he learns he has violated his lease.

He may have brought his groceries in through the front entrance, played his hi-fi after 11 P.M., played his radio before 8 A.M., parked a baby carriage in a passageway, kept a pet, mounted a television antenna on the roof without permission, or hung new drapes without getting them approved. It matters not how truthfully the tenant protests that other tenants bring their groceries in the front way or enjoy pets ranging from hamsters to gibbons. He learns of another lease provision that states that "a waiver of any breach of covenant shall not be construed as a waiver of any other breach of such covenant." In point of fact, judges are inclined to rule that contract provisions that have been generally flouted are unenforceable. But tenants, being unaware of this, give in and order packing boxes.

A graduate student who invited Negroes to her apartment was ordered out on grounds that she had used her apartment "for purposes of business or trade": she had been earning tuition money by typing manuscripts. In the case of another tenant, a bicycle served as proxy for her Negro guests. Because of frequent thefts from the basement of her building, she had taken the cue of other tenants in storing her bike in her apartment during winter months, thereby breaching her lease

When sleuthing for lease violations proves fruitless, other indiscretions are made to serve. A dietitian with Negro friends received a series of letters from her landlord complaining that she had violated her laundry room schedule, had entertained guests after midnight, had bundled her garbage improperly, and did not draw her shades at a uniform level. None of this constituted lease violation, but it all sounded so official that she docilely complied with a notice to vacate. This lie of censure is calculated to humiliate, thereby discouraging discussion with other tenants. A fraternizing male teacher was harried out with complaints that he slammed doors, tuned his television too loud, and deposited "an excessive amount of wastepaper" in his trash basket. The tenant knew these were not lease violations, but he so resented the snooping in his trash basket that he gave in and moved.

Children sometimes serve as proxys. A married couple who entertained Negro guests, but who conducted themselves irreproachably otherwise, found their children being harassed by the building manager. He commanded them to keep their voices down, to keep off the grass, to walk more quietly or more slowly, and so on. When the parents discovered their children using the rear entrance to escape abuse, they moved at once.

A lady novelist's elderly poodle was a less successful proxy. Her lease permitted pets, but when she ignored an order to vacate, her landlord sued to evict on grounds that her dog was especially objectionable. Delayed for nearly a year due to a court backlog, the case finally came to trial, with the landlord testifying to the poodle's vociferous bark. The lady blasted his charge with testimony that her poodle had been dead for seven months and that the real objection was her frequent Negro dinner guest, a Pulitzer prize-winning poetess.

Since to go to court is to risk such a confrontation, landlords prefer to avoid it. Most pry out the balky tenant with a rent hike. A notice that his rent has been raised by $65 can take the fight out of a tenant. But some tenants will stay and pay. A man and his wife who have resided in several world capitals were outraged when their building manager rebuked their son for bringing home a Negro classmate. They encouraged their son to bring his friend home whenever he liked. When the landlord served notice to vacate, the father declared he would fight eviction legally. The landlord then gave notice the rent had been raised $45. After investigating other rentals and learning they couldn't escape the issue by moving, the couple paid the increase.

While these cases rarely reach court, they are tried nonetheless—by public opinion. Hyde Park cocktail and dinner parties buzz with the latest discrimination scandals, some of which have involved international celebrities and prominent clergymen with integrated congregations. The neighborhood newspaper, the Hyde Park Herald, editorializes against these discriminatory practices, and its readers roast them in letters to the editor. Some denounce the real estate interests for sabotaging race relations, while others impugn the violation of personal liberty. Their combined censure adds up to condemnation of an intensity usually reserved for slum operators.

ONE case involved the executive director of a national welfare organization, who was denied housing by an agency that had learned of his Negro friends by questioning his references. First denied an apartment of his selection, he then was denied any assistance in locating housing for his family. Indignant residents of the neighborhood in which the denied apartment was located conducted a poll in which 74 per cent of those queried expressed opposition to the discrimination and to racial discrimination generally. The agency had claimed it was reflecting the attitude of the residential area in barring tenants who associate with Negroes.

These bizarre real estate practices have provoked reactions other than indignation and anger. Certain apartment buildings owned by Negroes have instituted house rules forbidding tenants to entertain white guests or to receive service or business calls by whites. A Negro seamstress who lives in a building owned by a Black Muslim was assaulted for admitting a white client. Meanwhile, the white Bohemian set has turned discrimination to its own uses. A tenant who finds a more desirable apartment and wishes to break his lease avails himself of a notice to vacate by throwing an interracial party.

Plainly, to segregate integration is to poison it. Community patterns of prejudice breed and teach prejudice. When a tenant submits to real estate policy that determines whom he may invite into his home, he learns prejudice through participation and habit. Tragically, the transition of the human mind from submission to acceptance is frequently both swift and unconscious.

Why do real estate people go to such lengths to preserve segregation? Partly because the industry is conservative, committed to what is entrenched. The white supremacy myth is no longer credited, but Piltdown thinking preserves it long after it has been exposed, and perpetuates it through a dual housing market that is deeply institutionalized in our society. The integrated neighborhod upsets the intricate workings of this market.

But there is also evidence that segregation is perpetuated for reasons of avarice. The larger real estate firms and property owners deal in both white and Negro housing, and they find segregation profitable. When Negro housing is kept in short supply by means of restrictions on white housing, Negroes can be made to pay higher prices than whites will pay. A study by the Chicago Commission on Human Relations found brokers hiking prices on homes sold to Negroes by as much as 115 per cent. For rental housing, Chicago Negroes pay a "color tax" that averages $15 a month, according to a University of Chicago study. A survey of one neighborhood showed that rents rose an average 25 per cent when its population shifted from white to Negro. Edwin Berry, director of the Chicago Urban League, has charged that Negro Chicagoans, whose wages are 30 per cent lower than white wages, "are being cheated out of $75,000,000 a year in rent overpayments alone."

Bigotry by proxy is a last-ditch effort to protect these profits in the areas where they are threatened with extinction.

IS RACE A PROBLEM ALL OVER THE U.S.?

Racial demonstrations . . . protests . . . lawsuits . . . arguments in Congress over equal rights for Negroes—

Is there any place in America where people can get away from the race problem?

Tour through the areas that have little or no Negro population—in the Far West, in Mid-America, in New England—and you discover some surprising answers to that question.

Nearly everywhere, the race issue is on people's minds. Even where it isn't a problem, it's a worry for both Negroes and whites. Here is what a team of "U. S. News & World Report" staff members found as they roved the U. S.

In vast areas of the United States, race problems of the kind that plague the South and most big cities of the North are only something to read about.

These problems do not exist for broad regions in the West, the Middle West and New England. There, a traveler finds thriving communities where Negroes are almost a curiosity, and racial violence seems as far away as the war in Vietnam.

No sit-ins, marches or demonstrations disturb the even tenor of business and social life. Schools are not under attack. The few Negroes are long-time residents, or servicemen from nearby military bases. All facilities, public and private, are officially integrated. On the surface, racial calm prevails.

To individuals and businesses caught in the center of rising racial tension elsewhere, these areas of racial peace pose some questions.

Is there widespread sympathy for Negroes and their cause in such regions? Would people be willing to have Negroes from troubled areas move into their communities to help ease the pressure elsewhere? Are they willing to accept more Negroes if that is a condition for getting more federal contracts? Can they virtually guarantee no racial problems to industries seeking new locations? What has been the local reaction when Negroes have moved in?

To sample the attitudes of people outside of the racially divided areas, "U. S. News & World Report" sent reporters into many towns and smaller cities across the northern half of the nation. Their findings, in brief:

- Almost everywhere in the U.S., people are deeply worried about racial tension today. Even where no Negroes live, it's a major topic of conversation and concern.
- Negroes would be welcomed, a few families at a time, in many communities, if required for new industry. But reporters found no community that would welcome Negroes in "large numbers."
- Fear of intermarriage between whites and Negroes was brought up voluntarily by many of those interviewed, and cited as a basic problem.
- Racial tolerance is greatest in areas where the fewest Negroes reside—but even in those areas, some people object to the idea of any change in the status quo.
- Where Negroes are few, integration usually is accepted without question in schools, but "equal rights" in jobs and housing often are resisted in one way or another.
- Feelings against Negroes are strongest in areas with above-average unemployment. Sympathy with the Negroes' drive for civil rights is greatest in prosperous college towns.

Area by area, this is what the survey discloses—

IN THE WEST:

"We want to be very selective"

Traveling through the widely scattered towns of Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Colorado and northern California, you rarely see a Negro. Nowhere do Negroes form more than a small minority. There is no school segregation. And there have been no local demonstrations or riots. Yet there is much speculation now about growing racial troubles, little talk of welcoming more Negroes to the region.

This comment from a college student in Oregon is fairly typical: "People in the West like it the way it is—smaller places, fewer people and problems. We understand the Negroes' problems, but we don't want them."

"I bet within a year we'll have demonstrations here," speculates another student, near Portland.

An airline official in Idaho points out this effect of growing racial strife elsewhere:

"We are concerned and talk about the situation. We're going through a transition here. The old guard wanted Idaho to remain the last frontier. They did not care if industry didn't come, if that would avoid the racial problem. Now many of us think that in promoting for industry we want to be very selective, to get just the right kind so that it means not many Negroes."

An executive in Boise says: "We have no Negroes at this time among our 1,250 employes. We would not welcome Negroes en masse in Idaho, but I can't see us opposing some hospital or industry that might employ them."

At a lumber mill in Oregon which now employs no Negroes, you hear comments like these—

From the personnel officer: "We don't have any Negroes at the mill, although the company does have some Negroes working in the woods crews. But one day I'm going to hire some Negroes, and I'm going to treat them just like anyone else. I don't feel indebted to Negroes at all. I don't hire with my heart. I hire to run the mill. And I'm sure there's a good bit of ability available in Negroes."

From a carloader at the same mill: "We'd quit if they hire a colored man at the mill. The colored don't get into a sawmill. They won't work. That's why I'm here. I lived in Cheyenne, but there are too many blacks there. We just want to get away from 'em. How'd you feel if your sister or daughter went with a black man?"

A minister in Caldwell, Ida., has this to say:

"We're not immune to what happens. We've been reading a good deal about the racial problem. . . . One of my people told me, 'I'm for the Negroes having their own rights, but I don't want to live near them.' "

Common fear: mixed marriages. Most people in the West hasten to say they favor "equal rights" for Negroes. But there is reluctance to have more Negroes in their community, for a number of reasons. Many mention a fear of intermarriage.

"Negroes here don't intermarry yet," a retired planing-mill worker in Oregon explains, "but you can see what will happen. It's come through with the Indians. There aren't many full-blooded Indians any more. This will come with the Negroes too. This is the only solution—that we'll all be mixed up so there won't be any difference. I'd object to my daughter marrying a Negro, or an Indian."

The basic concern is put this way by a Lutheran minister: "Many people here have the view that the Negro in America has not pulled his load sufficiently; he's not determined enough to better himself. Most worry about this marriage angle. They are strongly opposed to intermarriage."

How do the Negroes themselves feel, in an area where the ratio of black to white may be 1 to 1,000?

A Negro truck driver in Idaho says this: "Some places we are accepted here, some we are not." A bar had refused him entry. "Sometimes I feel I'm bypassed by the union when my name's at the top. They say: 'You can't handle the gears on this truck.' I can handle any truck, with three to 32 gears. But I'm lots happier here than I'd be in Chicago or a big city down South."

A Negro harvest worker near Ontario, Oreg., reports: "There's more work here, and folks treat you a mite better. But Louisiana is where my family is, so I'm going back there in December. I wouldn't move up here."

A Negro minister in a Nevada town: "In many instances, it's pleasanter here than in Mississippi. You know how to cope with it here and avoid difficulties. Here, if you do your work, tend to what you're supposed to do, and help the other fellow, then you're accepted. We could do much better if we worked together, we colored people."

But a Negro garage helper in the same town, where there are only 90 Negroes in a population of 6,928, makes this observation: "So far as work's concerned, it's real rough. They tell you that you can't do the job and then hire any white man that comes along. . . ."

"I know it's wrong, but . . ." In the nearly all-white towns across the Northwest, you hear comments like these concerning Negroes:

"The Negro really needs help all right. But they are capable of just so much, and they'll take advantage of you," says a filling-station manager in Oregon.

"No, I would not hire a Negro here. I know it's wrong, but we don't want the problem here. We're glad we don't have here what we read about or see on TV," says a garage owner in southern Idaho.

"I've never been around Negroes. They're human and all that, but I'd rather have them stay put," an office worker with a Western telephone company remarks.

A small-town Idaho physician says: "I really don't know if we would welcome a lot of Negroes or not."

And a skilled mechanic comments: "I know it's wrong. I know they're just as good as I, but I don't want one marrying my daughter. I don't want to have one sit next to

(continued on next page)

JOBS. Opposition to Negroes seems to be strongest where there is high unemployment, competition for jobs.

HOUSING. Even where integration of schools is peaceful, a Negro's "right to live anywhere" may be resisted.

ON CAMPUS. Negroes are widely accepted as college students in the North and West.

[continued from preceding page]

RACE: PROBLEM ALL OVER U.S.?

me. And I don't want one living next to me. My conscience bothers me because I know at heart I'm a segregationist, but I can't help it."

Mayor Willard Fraser of Billings, Mont., tells of this reaction on the part of some:

"A rumor started the other day that some contractor was going to build 60 houses in Billings for Negroes. The next morning, my phone rang off the hook. One person after another wanted me to stop the construction of those homes."

A Billings newspaper executive adds: "I suppose you would have to say that we do discriminate against them here, but not openly. There are no Negroes in professional jobs. They certainly are not accepted socially."

In Colorado Springs, a businessman complains—

"If a white man applies for a job and is turned down because he isn't qualified, there usually are no questions asked. But if a Negro applies out here and is turned down because he isn't qualified, it immediately becomes discrimination."

Another businessman in Limon, Colo.: "No, I don't think this community would be happy to see Negroes move into the town in any great numbers. We might be able to handle, say, five families, but if they shipped in 50, they'd starve to death. There just wouldn't be jobs for them."

Yet there is support for the Negro and his cause in the West. A store manager in Billings is typical of many, when he says, "I've never heard a word said against colored folks here. Here they go about their normal lives and nobody pays any attention. They are accepted as individuals."

"Whites will have to adjust." This comment is from an industrial consultant—

"I hope the Negroes keep up a determined push for education, because that's the only thing that will help them in the long run. The whites will just have to adjust. But fighting for equal use of lavatories, hotels, buses is transitory. It can't solve anything."

A highway engineer in eastern Oregon makes this observation: "There are just as many nice Negroes as whites. But the color of their skin makes it difficult for them."

And a truck driver in Albany, Oreg., says this: "I would like to help the Negroes if I knew how. But I don't know what I could do. I see no reason why I shouldn't sell my house to a Negro. I'm not ashamed to be with Negroes. There are whites who are just as bad as we say many Negroes are."

A municipal judge in Nevada, in turn, provides this clue to attitudes there:

"We have a Western attitude toward Negroes—live and let live. In the sparse West, here in Nevada, we do not mix socially with Negroes. We do have a Negro in high school. He's accepted as an athlete, but you don't find Negroes in white homes. We have more Indians—Piutes—than anything else. They would be accepted in my home."

A highway-construction worker, on Interstate Route 80, sums it up in this way: "Most people out here have nothing against Negroes, but they just don't want them too close."

IN THE MIDWEST:

"I'm not prejudiced, but . . ."

There are more Negroes in the Midwest than in the Northwest, but most are concentrated in the big cities. In small towns, from Michigan to Kansas, they are rare. Yet the "race problem" is a principal topic of conversation, with feeling sometimes running high. Lately, there have been scattered incidents of racial clashes.

Mayor Gerald Stover of Colby, Kans., reports this attitude, widely held in the Midwest, toward growing racial strife:

"It enters into our conversation here daily. Since we don't have the problem, we just talk about it. I would say the predominant opinion is that integration has been pushed a little ahead of its time, although most people seem to feel that eventually it has to happen."

A farmer near Salina, Kans., tells of this change in the way many Midwesterners view the problem elsewhere—

"At first, I was all for giving the Negro more of a chance. But it's got all out of hand. What I can't understand is this business of carting Negroes across the city just to put them in school with white kids. If they're going to be that foolish, I think it's time we stopped and had another look at what's going on."

Drive up to La Crosse, Wis., where there has been only one Negro family in town, and you hear comments such as these:

"Would I welcome more Negroes here? Look, I moved out of Milwaukee because I was surrounded by Negroes," says a retired auto worker.

"I think there would be local resentment in La Crosse if Negroes were brought in here at a time when we have 5 per cent of our people unemployed. We say we've been lucky not to have Negroes; we have enough problems without that," says a State employment officer.

"We have no Negro problem here, thank goodness. That would really make us move out," comments a restaurant cashier.

"I think the Negro should get ahead, but maybe we're doing it too fast. Things like this take time," says a local businessman.

In Minnesota: a fiery cross. Racial incidents are rare in the Midwest. But they do happen. One of the few occurred recently in Rochester, Minn., a prosperous town of 50,000, including fewer than 100 Negroes. Following a "civil rights" march of 23 whites and 15 Negroes, a large wooden cross was ignited and thrown outside a small hotel that caters to Negroes.

MORE NEGROES? Where Negroes now are scarce, whites often would welcome "a few" more, but resent "an influx."

Verne Manning, Negro proprietor of the hotel, says: "I've lived here for 19 years without trouble, and now I'm scared." Neither he nor his wife took part in the march.

A businessman in Rochester offers this comment:

"Do we want more Negroes in Rochester? We don't solicit problems. But we want the community to grow, and growth is bound to bring in more Negroes—there are enough of them around, certainly. I would rather have growth and Negroes than no growth and no Negroes."

But another businessman says: "I don't want Rochester to get any larger, with or without Negroes."

Elsewhere, concern over an influx of Negroes takes a variety of forms. For example—

A city official in Winona, Minn., says: "I'm not prejudiced against Negroes. I grew up with them in Tennessee. But I wouldn't want to see my daughter marry one."

A restaurant owner in Martinsville, Ind.: "I just want peace and quiet. Negroes bring trouble for everybody by pushing too hard."

A Nebraska farmer: "There are hardly any Negroes out here. I guess I'm just as happy to have it that way."

College towns in the Midwest often appear to be more tolerant of Negroes. But reactions are mixed even in those places. Take the case of Bloomington, Ind., with a population of 33,000, plus 18,000 students of Indiana University. Here there are 450 Negroes in the town, 600 on campus.

"Generally, color makes no difference on the I. U. campus," one professor explains. "There have even been several mixed marriages among students in the past few years, with hardly a stir on campus. Negro students are as welcome as anyone."

A Negro girl, in fact, was chosen as "Miss Indiana University" a few years ago, in 1959, and represented the campus in the "Miss Indiana" contest that year.

Another I. U. professor makes this qualification:

"Most people here are against Governor Wallace [of Alabama]—but, for many of them, not to the point where they especially want Negroes next door. It's an arm's-length proposition for all except the most liberal ones."

In the town of Bloomington, however, a member of the mayor's commission on human relations says: "On jobs, the situation here is worse than in the Deep South. Even though there are relatively few Negroes, they are not accepted on an equal basis—particularly for jobs and housing."

"You find prejudice ever present, at least off the campus," a local newsman adds. "You don't find an attitude of, 'Let's invite them in.' Instead, the more typical attitude is, 'Keep them in their place.'"

In nearby Martinsville, Ind., there are no Negroes at all, in a population of 8,750.

Says Robert S. Kendall, editor of the Martinsville "Reporter":

"People here think it's great for the South to integrate, but they don't think much of the idea in their own back yards.

"If Negroes moved into Martinsville now, there would be bloody riots. During the war, one company brought in Jamaicans as laborers. The townspeople threw them out."

This editor reports that many residents have moved here from Indianapolis "to get away from Negro troubles." Indianapolis has about 25 per cent Negroes.

Negroes passing through Martinsville and stopping in the town's public park are quietly told that the park is for residents only. "The park people don't throw them out, but the Negroes get the idea," says Mr. Kendall.

Personally, he adds, "I'd hire a Negro reporter if I could find one qualified—and one who had the guts to take what he would have to take to do his job in this town."

Concern for the future. In town after town where no race problem exists now, you hear concern over possible future demonstrations or civil-rights test cases. As examples—

La Salle, Ill., has no Negro residents whatever. But a newspaper editor there has this to say:

"People here, most of them, think the Negro is asking for too much, is moving too fast. . . . There is no question about it—people here have a distaste for Negroes. Most have seen very little of them. Negroes shop in town, but they are discouraged from coming in. I wouldn't be surprised to see the NAACP, or CORE, or some other group try to make a test case here some day."

A La Salle merchant: "Some day the NAACP will bring in a colored family. What will happen? I'd say, let them come in. They won't stay. One or two colored families in this town would not stay. They wouldn't be happy here."

Mayor Dan Riordan of Ottawa, Ill.—with a population of 20,000 whites and 150 Negroes—says: "The vast majority of our people here feel that all these problems are just the concern of the South and the other cities where they are having troubles. We don't have such problems here. But yet, some of our people say we had better watch out, and be prepared for trouble soon, right here."

The president of a bank in this same town adds:

"We have no racial problem here; we have so few Negroes. . . . For myself, I think the Negroes are pushing too fast. I wouldn't be surprised to see outsiders make some kind of civil-rights test here."

A newspaper editor here reports this: "The truth is, we have plenty of problems. Small ones. Our civil-rights commission is getting active again. They are getting complaints from Negroes about discrimination in hiring, about being unable to buy homes where they want them, about not being able to get a haircut in town. There is a lot of fear that the NAACP will come in here some day and give trouble."

In Iowa, a large-scale poll was conducted recently by

(continued on next page)

NEGRO GI's. In the North, Negro servicemen say racial incidents are rare, but complain of subtle discrimination.

[continued from preceding page]

RACE: PROBLEM ALL OVER U. S.?

"Wallaces Farmer" on the matter of what Iowa farm people, "as bystanders," think about Negro pressure now being applied to change things.

Results of that poll showed that 62 per cent believe integration is being pushed too hard. Only 10 per cent believe Negroes "should do everything short of violence." About 12 per cent are undecided.

Growing awareness. Even as far north as Marquette, Mich., where Negroes are a rarity, the Rev. Norbert W. Smith reports that there has been a rapidly rising interest in racial problems recently, "especially since the march on Washington and the bombings in Birmingham."

Here, as in many Midwestern localities, Negroes have been brought into an almost all-white area by the opening of a military installation nearby—in this case, Sawyer Air Force Base, with 11,500 airmen and dependents, a tenth of them colored.

Problems have been minimal, but Negro airmen interviewed report difficulties in finding any entertainment off the base, and housing for married men off base.

Ministers in Marquette have distributed an "open-housing covenant" in an effort to turn up housing for Negro troops, and about 10 per cent of these covenants have brought offers of housing.

But throughout the Midwest you often hear comments like this one from a store manager in central Illinois—

"We have some high-grade Negroes in our little Negro community. One highly educated Negro woman is a member of the women's clubs and is frequently asked to give book reviews. We have a Negro chiropodist, who is president of our Holy Name Society. All of his patients are white. If we had an influx of Negroes here, and they were like these two, there would be no problem."

IN NEW ENGLAND:

"Subtle discrimination is still here"

In the smaller cities and rural areas of Northeastern U. S., there seems to be little overt antagonism toward Negroes, or racial friction of any kind. But the fear of competition from Negroes for jobs shows up frequently in this region.

In Portland, Me., for example, there are just 371 Negroes in a population of 72,566. Would whites accept more?

"Frankly, I wouldn't want any more Negroes here," says an engineer with offices in Portland.

"Recent events all over the country have convinced me that the presence of Negroes brings problems and troubles," comments the manager of a wholesale firm.

"I think it is hard for Negroes to get good jobs here. A Negro porter at the airport brought up a family of children who became doctors, a college professor, and an optometrist. But all of them left Portland to make good." So reports a lawyer.

"People say they would welcome Negroes in Portland. Privately, they wouldn't," insists a businessman.

"I wouldn't mind seeing more Negroes in reasonable limits," a railroad man says.

But, in the opinion of a local insurance man, "Portland doesn't need an additional pool of unskilled labor."

"I would welcome skilled Negroes." Jobs are often considered the key factor. A city official says: "My answer would be 'no,' not only for Negroes but for any other group who would be unemployed most of the time. I would welcome skilled and self-sufficient Negroes, though. My answer would be based not on race but on the quality of the individual."

A store clerk puts it this way: "If we got more Negroes to come in, how many jobs would there be for whites?"

Says a minister: "I'm not foolish enough to advocate Negroes' migrating to Portland."

A securities salesman: "Even the most liberal advocates of Negro civil rights wouldn't want Negroes to come in here."

A lawyer: "I don't think anyone honestly can say they would welcome Negroes. . . . We would have trouble if we had a large increase in the Negro population."

What about the few Negroes in Portland now? You hear this—

From an advertising man:

"We are not conscious of a local problem. Negroes here are not pushing for their rights. Birmingham seems as far away as Vietnam."

A Portland minister: "I would say that as far as we here in Maine are concerned, we get disturbed and upset about what is happening in the South. But it's a missionary problem with us. As long as it stays in the South, we're happy. When it moves up here, we will not show the true Christian spirit. Subtle discrimination is still here."

When you swing over to Watertown, N. Y., with just 113 Negroes in a total population of 33,306, the attitude changes somewhat, but not a great deal.

A businessman says this: "Negroes are welcome to move to Watertown as long as jobs could be found for them. But I wouldn't want a large proportion of the population to be colored. And I wouldn't care to have a Negro move next door to me, as that would force real estate prices down."

"I'd hate to think how we would react if we had a large number of Negroes here," adds a newspaper editor.

An executive who has lived in many other cities gives this assessment: "There is less discrimination here than I found when I lived in Detroit, Rochester, Windsor, Tulsa or Evansville, Ind. But the lesser discrimination may be caused by the fact that the people here don't have the problem. . . . Here you have the additional factors of greater neighborliness and a greater inclination to treat people as individuals regardless of color."

Yet a Watertown housewife says: "Negroes whom I know and have talked with here say they find discrimination more of a problem than in the South, because they never know how they stand here."

"I would move out of town." Little incidents stand out in people's minds, here as elsewhere. Another Watertown resident reports: "We had several busloads of Negroes come into town on a tour last summer—300 or so got off the buses. If those people ever lived here, I would move out of town. Others said the same thing."

In the opinion of a highway engineer—

"The problem is primarily a moral one. Negroes deserve special consideration beyond that given other minority groups. The reason is that they are the only race that came to this nation in chains. We brought them here and we're responsible for their plight today."

Across Vermont and New Hampshire, this comment by a newspaperman in Burlington is fairly typical:

"If a family had somewhat similar background in intelligence, experience and earning power, no one would argue if such a family lived next door. This is a place that is not terribly rich or poor. Everyone up here is judged on what he can do. It's not the color of the skin that's important, but what a person can do." [END]

R&R Rel -
Newsweek 10/21/63

OUTLOOK: THE HOPE FOR PEACE

The ultimate question before white America and Negro America is this: can the two resolve their differences over civil rights without some kind of bloody collision between races?

Given the prejudice of the one and the resentment of the other, it might seem impossible. Divided as the two races are, however, the NEWSWEEK Poll shows that white and Negro America do share a common objective: both will settle for reforming the system; they don't want to wreck it.

Thus, the promise of a peaceful solution to the Negro revolution does exist, and it springs from the American character. In their struggle the Negroes have no greater weapon than white America's sense of fair play. The biggest asset that white Americans have is Negro patience.

Yet this promise does not mean progress across the board—nor a predictable timetable. Some major stumbling blocks remain, and they are dangerous. Among them:

▶Southern resistance: Such cities as Birmingham, Jackson, and Albany, Ga., are still hard-core centers of opposition to minimal Negro demands. Mississippi's schools hold out even against token desegregation. As long as Southern politicians try to "out-seg" each other at the polls, race riots—or the threat of riots—will plague the South.

▶Private housing integration: A direct conflict threatens. Sixty-six per cent of Negroes want to live—or have the right to live—in integrated neighborhoods; more than 50 per cent of white Americans object to sharing their neighborhoods with Negroes.

These two areas, like many others, are enormously difficult: neither is likely to be truly resolved for years. Yet the NEWSWEEK Poll also uncovered grounds for optimism.

For one thing, white Americans reveal that their attitudes toward Negroes are subject to change—and have indeed changed already. Compared with twenty years ago, they were asked, do you feel Negroes have changed as individuals or not? Across the nation, 62 per cent—and even in the South, 65 per cent—replied yes, and made it clear they thought Negroes had changed for the better, thanks mainly to steadily improving education.

Wide Margin: More significant is how whites believe Negroes will be faring five years from now. Will there be more Negro and white children in school together? Yes, say 65 per cent of white Southerners; yes, say 83 per cent of whites across the country. Will Negroes be living in white neighborhoods? Even the white South says yes, by a majority of 84 per cent, and white Americans everywhere agree—a total of 91 per cent. Will Negroes have better jobs? Will they have better housing? Yes again, say North and South alike.

What is impressive about these expectations is that many who hold them currently resist them and freely admit to prejudice against the Negro. They may be reluctant, grudging, and merely resigned to a sense of inevitability—but they do see the shape of things to come. Such signs from those who now oppose the Negro drive are no less encouraging than the testimony of whites who are already adjusting to it:

▶Young white Americans are turning out to be significantly less prejudiced than their grandfathers.

▶The more white Americans get to know Negroes, the better they get along together. Whites who have social contact with Negroes consistently responded more favorably to the Negro and his cause.

In the largest sense, two deeply rooted strains in the American psyche hold out the greatest hope for racial peace. One is the practical streak. As a people, Americans usually do not come to grips with a problem until it reaches crisis proportions; then, rather than have it linger and fester, they prefer to resolve it—and they have a genius for adaptation and accommodation. The other American trait, contrasting and yet complementary, is a sense of idealism. And the Negro revolution not only goes to the heart of the democratic concept but, as white Americans recognize by 2 to 1, it poses a clear moral issue—a choice between right and wrong

Newsweek—Bresnan

R + R Rel.

NEW YORK CHAPTER
THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

NEGRO PRESS DIGEST
October 28, 1963

Contents

| | |
|---|---|
| ARMED FORCES | P. 1 |
| BIRMINGHAM | P. 1 |
| BLAIK AND ROYALL | P. 2 |
| BOYCOTTS | P. 3 |
| CIVIL RIGHTS BILL | P. 3 |
| DIVIDED OPINION | P. 4 |
| HOUSING | P. 5 |
| INTERNATIONAL | P. 6 |
| INTERRACIAL MARRIAGE | P. 7 |
| NEGRO ATTITUDES | P. 9 |
| OTHER MINORITIES | P. 11 |
| POLICE | P. 11 |
| POLITICS | P. 12 |
| SKILLS AND TRAINING | P. 13 |
| SPORTS AND ENTERTAINMENT | P. 14 |
| UNIONS AND EMPLOYMENT | P. 15 |
| USE AND ABUSE OF LAW | P. 16 |
| VOTING AND REGISTRATION | P. 17 |
| MISCELLANEOUS | P. 17 |

published by
The Community Information Committee
Robert L. Pelz, Chairman

Co-Editors
Mrs. M. J. Kleinfeld  Mrs. Louise Levinson

NEGRO PRESS DIGEST

Statement of Purpose

The Negro Press Digest is published for the purpose of providing its readers with news and views of Negro newspapers and news magazines circulated in New York City. The Digest is not intended to present a cross-section of the content of the publications it reviews but focuses upon articles dealing with such matters as civil rights, civil liberties and intergroup relations. Emphasis is given to articles of local interest and national consequence.

News that has been adequately treated, in the judgment of the editors, in the daily press or on the broadcasting media is not duplicated in the Digest unless the Negro press reports such news from a distinctly different point of view.

The New York Chapter of The American Jewish Committee hopes that this publication will help fill an important need in intergroup relations, which is: improved communications bringing fuller knowledge of the problems, aspirations and frustrations of the Negro community as expressed in their press. This periodical, therefore, is designed to foster greater understanding and thereby further the development of truly effective human relations efforts.

-- Robert L. Pelz, Chairman
Community Information Committee
New York Chapter
The American Jewish Committee

ARMED FORCES

RACE PROBLEMS KEEP AMERICA FROM BEING "COMBAT-READY"

New York Courier (September 7)

A faculty moderator of the National War College and one of the top reservists of the U.S. Armed Forces, Major John D. Silvera, called upon all reservists for leadership in resolving the racial unrest which he termed "a major cold-war problem" and "a genuine revolution".. the coming together of men of goodwill from both races.. Major Silvera emphasized that no section of American can afford a holier than thou attitude on what is a national concern and a threat to our security and maintenance of world leadership.

EQUAL TREATMENT

Chicago Daily Defender - Editorial (September 26)

Defense Secretary McNamara's ruling placing off-limits to servicemen off-base establishments that discriminate against Negro servicemen, has aroused the ire of Rep. Vinson (D-Ga.). "He wants Congress to court-martial the Defense Department...Left to him the armed forces would still be basking in the deep shadows of segregation. Because of their pathological hostility to the Negro, because of their inability to discharge with impartiality their legislative responsibility, men like Vinson should never be permitted to reach the chairmanship of important Congressional committees."

BIRMINGHAM

NOTHING HAS CHANGED IN BULL CONNOR'S TOWN

Amsterdam News - By-line by James L. Hicks (September 21)

If you thought the racial situation was going to improve around Birmingham's City Hall when they kicked out Bull Connor last spring, you can forget it. I don't know what changes Albert Boutwell has made in the racial set-up but I do know that as I went into and out of his office my eyes feasted on the cleanest and shiniest silver sign above a drinking fountain. This sign was not just attached.. it was recessed into the thick marble wall so that anyone trying to remove it would have to use a crowbar or one of those sticks of dynamite for which the city is famous. The sign reads: C O L O R E D.

BIRMINGHAM, THE UNREPENTENT

New York Courier (September 28) Editorial

Six Birmingham children have been sent to eternity. Indignation over these atrocities has swept the world, but not Birmingham... We get the impression that a large majority of the white people of the area were secretly pleased. Doubtless their churches were full blast Sunday and resounded with the pious platitudes of their preachers. If there were any shame in these people there might be some hope for the future, but when has Birmingham or Alabama shown any shame over sins against the Negro?

I PREDICT NOTHING WILL BE DONE - (October 5)

AFTER THE PROCESSION....WHAT? - (October 12)

New York Courier - Both the above from Benjamin E. Mays' Column: "MY VIEW"

The bombing and deaths in Birmingham are tragic, but it is equally deplorable that in all probability nothing will be done. There are ways and ways to obstruct justice and if a way can be found, Alabama will find it. They say 100 white Birmingham ministers marched in the funeral procession for the four dead girls. Now that they have wept in sackcloth and ashes, what next? I am sure they will go on walking in the paths of tradition. They will continue to be segregationists. When it comes to leadership in the community, too many white ministers exert little or no influence.

BLAIK AND ROYALL

TWO-MAN COMMITTEE - Chicago Daily Defender: Editorial (September 25)

WHAT WHITES DON'T KNOW - Amsterdam News: Column, White-on-White by Gertrude Wilson (October 5)

President Kennedy's two-man committee which will direct its efforts toward easing racial tensions in Birmingham, may not yield the results anticipated by the White House. Even if lines between the two races are opened, feelings of suspicion and distrust will linger as long as Negro-hater Wallace is Governor in Montgomery. No sermon on Christian brotherhood will ease the deep wounds left by the bombing which killed four innocent Negro children. Mr. Kenneth Royall, one of the members chosen by the White House, handled ticklish situations before and was one of the defense lawyers for four Negroes seeking to enter the University of North Carolina but Alabama's diehard segregationists are not reasonable men with a moral conscience. Earl Blaik on the committee does not help. His West Point football experience is not in the area of human relations. Besides, they are not Negroes and cannot understand the Negro's problems completely. It is conceivable that no white man realizes the depth of the Negro's conviction, nor his determination to succeed at any cost.

JFK'S B'HAM TRUCE TEAM NOT NOTED FOR HELPING NEGROES

Jet (October 10)

Former Army Secretary Kenneth Royall, one of the two named by President Kennedy to find a solution to Birmingham's racial woes, is a known segregationist who steadfastly held to a segregationist line and has close friendships with many Dixie lawmakers. As Army Secretary under President Truman in 1948-9 he fought the issuance of a desegregation order for the military.. was quoted in testimony before a committee probing Army bias as saying "That the Army was not an instrument for social evolution" and "two wars showed Negro troops to be less qualified than whites for service in combat". During the battle over Truman's executive order (to end segregation in the Services) Royall was the only topflight secretary of an armed service to oppose the order. As for ex-football coach Earl Blaik, he never had a Negro on his team during 18 years as coach for Army.

BOYCOTTS

XMAS BOYCOTT ON DEATHBED, SANTA CLAUS MIGHT RIDE AGAIN!

Chicago Daily Defender -(October 7)

SEVEN MORE MAJOR CIVIL RIGHTS GROUPS CONDEMN CHRISTMAS BOYCOTT

New York Courier (October 12)

The proposed nationwide boycott to memorialize the children killed in Birmingham failed to muster the support of the major civil rights groups. Instead they urged all Americans who believe in civil rights "to make some special sacrifice this Christmas" in memory of the children. NAACP's Roy Wilkins doubted that a general consumer buying strike would have an effect on the Birmingham situation, but civil rights leaders did agree that local selective buying strikes be continued.

THE BOYCOTT FASCINATION

New York Courier - Editorial (October 12)

An increasing number of prominent Negroes seem to be fascinated by the prospects of victory through boycott. A boycott against a store in a Negro neighborhood can be narrowly successful; but when it is widespread, it seldom gets far. It would be a different story if Negroes had stores of their own in communities where they are conducting boycotts. We are a buying people, not a selling people, and as long as this is true we will not make speedy economic progress.

CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

NO SURPRISE - Column by P. L. Prattis in N. Y. Courier (Sept. 14)

PUSH OR PULL - Column: Up Front..Down South by Daddy Mention -Courier (Sept. 28)

Columnist Prattis says that the filibuster would be no stumbling block to civil rights legislation if white Northerners had widespread interest in it. Members of Congress read their mail and respond to the people's thinking. Northern Democrats and Republicans would speedily pass strong legislation if the people demanded it. It was noted in white papers that the Great March was orderly and dignified.. a strange recognition by white writers that not all Negroes are hewers of wood and drawers of water with inferior brains. Perhaps the Negro has found a way to induce more whites to become concerned about his problems which have become THEIR BIG PROBLEM. Speaking of the "conscientious" bigots of the Southern contingent on Capitol Hill and a host of other reactionaries who persist in putting alleged property rights before human rights, columnist Mention advises the Negro to fight for his existing right to enter public places without waiting for superfluous laws. It is society, says he, which has an absolute right to regulate who shall do business within it, and to prescribe conditions in the public interest.

MARCH ON WASHINGTON RESULTS

Amsterdam News - Column: Along This Way by Roy Wilkins (October 5)

A subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee reported out tentatively a draft of a civil rights bill that was much stronger than the package proposed by President Kennedy on June 19th.. which means that some Congressmen got the message of the Evers murder, the March, and the unspeakable Birmingham murders of four little girls. Things have changed since June and what might have seemed to some people to have been a good program then, is not nearly good enough in late September. The subcommittee deserves credit for recognizing this and daring to strengthen the bill.

DIVIDED OPINION

"DO IT YOURSELF!" DR. JACKSON - Amsterdam News (September 14)
FREEDOM MAY BE HARMFUL SAYS JACKSON - Chicago Daily Defender (9/9)
POOR 'UNCLE TOM' - Amsterdam News - Column: Horizon by P. L. Prattis (September 21)
CORE PICKETS DR. JACKSON - Jet (October 3)

Re-elected to his 11th term as president of the National Baptist Convention, U.S.A., Inc., Dr. J. H. Jackson stated that political rights without economic power won't help Negroes any more than eating in an integrated restaurant without money to pay for the fare. He said Negroes must pool their economic and financial resources and build their own businesses. Dr. Jackson proposed a Civil Rights Commission to set up a lobby in Washington which would advise local communities in civil rights matters, beautify Negro neighborhoods and encourage churches to help find jobs for Negroes. CORE pickets, meanwhile, paraded outside the meeting hall in criticism of Dr. Jackson's "move slowly" policy. Dr. Jackson further stated that it might be dangerous if pressure by protest should suddenly remove all barriers for the Negro. Dr. Jackson, who was called an "Uncle Tom" by CORE, was defended by columnist Prattis who defined the term as erroneously applied when used to denote a Negro who does not wish to go as far and as fast as others do. The real Uncle Tom was a staunch man who told his tormentors they could beat his body but not his soul. He thinks Dr. Jackson is sturdy and uncompromising.. a real Uncle Tom.

BIRMINGHAM NEGROES DIVIDED ON TACTICS - by Lloyd General (9/23)
SPLITTING NEGRO LEADERSHIP IN BIRMINGHAM, GOAL OF RACISTS - by Audrey Weaver (October 2)

Both the above articles appeared in the Chicago Daily Defender

The embattled Negroes of Birmingham have no real leadership and will not accept "outside agitators" like Martin Luther King. They are a house divided against itself. Birmingham's Muslim leader pointed out that nothing tangible has been gained through the non-violent method there. Rev. King's assistant, Fred Shuttlesworth, is seldom in Birmingham and the non-violent movement is losing ground. Many Negroes want to fight but are held in check because they have no weapons and because older people restrain them. Most citizens blame the leadership for the lack of progress in race relations. One day soon they intend to do something about it. The goal of white officials is to divide the Negro leadership, confuse the Negro citizens and thus prevent integration and further demands for rights, according to Rev. J. L. Ware who has been in the thick of the fight. Whenever a Negro church, home or motel is bombed, the police rush to the area and immediately intimidate the Negroes who gathered to view the ruins, instead of attempting to seek out the white culprits, Rev. Ware said.

DIVIDED LEADERSHIP

Chicago Daily Defender - Editorial (October 3)

The report of a split in Birmingham's Negro leadership is disquieting. If we are to succeed we must have unity. What is causing much anguish is the discovery of Uncle Toms in the ranks of the activists. Their retreat is made under the plea of no interference from outsiders. Governor Wallace and other racists know that they can beat the local folk into submission by threats and police brutality. The Negro people in Birmingham should turn down any proposal that is not in keeping with their demands for social justice.

AMERICAN NEGRO TRAGEDY

New York Courier - Editorial (October 5)

The Rev. Wesley E. Wharton, president of the East St. Louis, Ill., NAACP branch, is threatened with ouster from his job because he favors civil rights moderation. He is symbolic of a growing split in the Negro rights campaign between moderates and extremists, although all are eager for civil equality. This inclination to shut off the other fellow and denounce him because his views are different is a growing tragedy and a dangerous one. It is a mark of high intellectual development when there are wide differences of opinion, and augers well for the upward progress of any group.

MISLEADERSHIP IN CAMBRIDGE

New York Courier - Editorial (October 12)

Cambridge, Md. paid the price of Negro misleadership last week when a referendum was held to determine whether an amendment to local laws barring segregation should or should not be passed. The measure lost because only 48% of registered Negro voters turned out at the polls. If 275 more Negro voters had voted "Yes", the measure would have passed. The local NAACP leaders waited until the last minute to try to overcome the vote boycott, led by Mrs. Gloria Richardson. Elsewhere in the nation sensible Negro voters would have been delighted to vote on this issue.

HOUSING

RACISM AND THE CHA - by Sherwood Ross (September 9)
HOUSING POLICY UNDER FIRE - by Ernestine Cofield (September 12)
NAACP BLASTS CHA NEIGHBORHOOD PLAN - (September 18)
All the above from the Chicago Daily Defender

The Chicago Housing Authority (CHA) is headed for trouble over its "neighborhood" policy for housing the elderly. CHA selects elderly tenants from among persons in the immediate vicinity of its projects. It expects to build 14 sites in Chicago at a cost of $30 million, mostly on the North Side in all-white communities. City Council members who deny the CHA public housing in their wards will accept projects for the elderly because those will not be integrated. Four organizations (NAACP, Urban League and 2 others) are against this "neighborhood" policy, and urge the CHA to rescind this action which gives "priority to proximity". The NAACP is flatly against public housing which establishes a policy that conforms to already existing patterns of segregated housing and urges the establishment of a "first come, first served" basis for public housing.

CITY COUNCIL PASSES HOUSING BILL, 30-16 (September 12)

DALEY RIPS GOP AS OPPONENT OF RIGHTS (September 16)

FREEDOM OF RESIDENCE - Editorial (September 23)

CONFETTI - Column by Lillian Calhoun (September 24)

All the above from the Chicago Daily Defender

CHICAGO VOTES FAIR HOUSING LAW OVER WHITE PROTESTS - Jet (Sept. 26)

In the face of 5000 protesting white home owners Chicago's City Council under Mayor Daley's firm guidance passed a fair housing bill September 11. The Mayor later blasted the Republican Party Chairman, Hayes Robertson, and GOP councilmen, saying they are out of contact with the principles enacted in the U.S. Constitution, and make it a policy to fight civil rights. The real estate board is already planning to force a referendum to repeal the measure. Nevertheless it is the consensus that passage of the measure is a necessary first step in the right direction. We are tired of being huddled like cattle into an unfit corral. The new housing ordinance provides that a broker can sue a home owner, refusing to sell to a Negro, for his commission. If he doesn't, the prospective Negro buyer can sue and thus jeopardize the broker's license.

BLAMES STATUS SYMBOLS FOR JIM-CROW HOUSING

Chicago Daily Defender (October 10)

Housing is the most rigid segregation barrier because many whites "feel they must acquire status symbols which are inaccessible to members of minority groups"... This is why resistance to equality in America is making its last stand in the field of housing. Housing remains the only commodity which cannot be purchased freely on the open market by all qualified buyers," said James A. Tillman Jr., director of the Greater Minneapolis Interfaith Fair Housing Program.

INTERNATIONAL

WHAT PRICE CBS VIRTUE -- Column: Poppy's Notes by Poppy Cannon White

LIFE TELLS IT LIKE IT IS -Column: Home Plate by Jackie Robinson

Both the above appeared in the Amsterdam News on September 14.

Columbia Broadcasting has sold Amos and Andy films to Africa against the vain protests of the NAACP. C.B.S. will rake in millions while the vulgar stereotypes of American Negroes will be perpetuated in Kenya and Western Nigeria. The U.S. Information Service, whose job is to help provide and maintain a proper image of the American abroad, has declined to comment. Coincidentally, Jackie Robinson who had flown out to the Coast on a LIFE Magazine assignment, praised that publication for honest reporting and a fearless attitude regarding possible loss of Southern subscriptions.

WHITE AMERICAN DEPORTED FROM NEWLY INDEPENDENT JAMAICA, W.I.

New York Courier (September 14)

Die-hard segregationist Senator Richard Russell of Georgia has refused to intervene in any way in behalf of one of his white constituents who was deported from the island of Jamaica, West Indies, by Prime Minister Sir Alexander Bustamante, for calling a colored native a "black n.....etc. etc." Byron LaBeach, a star of the 1952 Olympics was the object of the insults by Hayne Nalley, a white Georgian employed on the island. The Prime Minister said that while the island caters to both white and colored tourist trade, "we are not prepared to permit Americans to export Jim Crowism to the Island".

FILM LACKING NEGRO STEREOTYPE BANNED IN S. AFRICA (Jet, Sept. 19)

The British film "Heavens Above" was banned by the South African government because of scenes depicting white men and Negroes on equal terms.

SAFE IN AFRICA - Column: Poppy's Notes by Poppy Cannon White

UAW OFFICIAL SAYS AFRICANS LOOK TO US

Both the above appeared in the Amsterdam News on September 28.

On my return from Abijan, the capital of the Ivory Coast Republic, Africa, I was asked how things were there. They had just gone through what their President called a "vast inquietude". Nevertheless, in the so-called wilds of darkest Africa, little girls of whatever complexion were quite safe studying their Sunday school lessons. Small boys could ride along the streets on their bicycles without fear of murder... Nelson J. Edwards, Negro official of the United Auto Workers union who has just returned from Europe, said Africans are looking to American Negroes to help narrow the gap of two centuries.. to enlighten and instruct them in the use of machinery. He though aid of this sort would change the image of the American Negro held by Africans.. and would temper the image of racial strife in this country.

INTERRACIAL MARRIAGE

HISTORY SHOWS - N.Y. Courier, Column by J. A. Rogers (September 7)

THE PEOPLE SPEAK - Letter to the Editor on INTERMARRIAGE IN THE RACE REVOLT by Anthony Williams - Defender (Sept. 26)

Foes of the Civil Rights Bill have started to play their trump -- the bogey of intermarriage. The subject is so touchy that even the Supreme Court has delayed ruling on a pertinent case. The first anti-miscegenation laws in the U.S. were directed not against Negroes but against whites. Although the California Supreme Court recently held that "marriage is a fundamental right of free men", 28 states presently forbid mixed marriages. Mr. Williams points out that many more white-skinned Americans of African descent are walking around than are black-skinned Americans of European descent. This fact shows just who is lusting after whose women, he observes.

MR. TRUMAN, THE EDITOR

Amsterdam News - Column: White-on-White by Gertrude Wilson (Sept. 21)

There was a time when I sometimes felt injured when Negroes would not take me at face value but I painfully learned to understand that my face value would be clouded by the meanness of the value which all white faces must hold for Negroes. It was never with more clarity that I understood this than in the report of former President Harry Truman's remarks on intermarriage when he fell back on the idiot argument of the worst racists by asking "Would you like your daughter to marry a Negro?" It was necessary for him to "edit" them out of his daughter's life for fear she might marry one. A strange admission for a man who supposedly brought his daughter up to be a woman of character and judgment who could edit out of her own life anything which she thought inferior, whether it be white or colored, or faith or morals. Margaret Truman undoubtedly married her husband not because he was white, but because she loved him.

BLIND NO MORE

New York Courier - Column by Rev. Malcolm Boyd (September 28)

It is an anomaly that we use the term "racial intermarriage" when there is no longer in this country purity of any race. Biological integration between races has been achieved in the U.S. When we speak of integration now, we mean only social and cultural integration. Probably the most useful instrument in human relations at this time would be a significant increase in intermarriage, i.e. destruction of all racial barriers as racial barriers. Negro bigots and black supremacists also must yield ground to a practiced integration in every part of American life.

THE STETHOSCOPE: INTERRACIAL MARRIAGE

New York Courier - Column by Earl B. Smith, M.D. (September 28)

RACIAL ISSUES - N.Y. Courier, Article by Max Lerner (October 5)

Interracial marriage has medical significance as well as important sociological factors. There is no religious law that prohibits mixed marriage. Marriage is a sacred bond between two persons who have free choice. The race of man has not deteriorated from mixing by marriage in the U.S. The final decision on this relationship must be relegated to the individual involved. Mr. Lerner says not biological integration but equal access to life's chances is the issue here. Psychoanalysts may argue that there is sexual attraction mixed with the recoil of hysterical white school girls against social mixing, but it expresses itself in hostility and hatred. Interracial marriage is a matter of personal choice and the Supreme Court should face the problem of miscegenation statutes in 21 states. It is unconstitutional for the state to tell me whom I cannot marry.

VIEWS AND REVIEWS

New York Courier - Column by George S. Schuyler (October 12)

Fear of racial intermarriage is what is fundamentally behind all the uproar over economic and social discrimination. And yet the racial problem in the U.S. will be solved in no other way. The right to marry a person of one's choice would seem to be the greatest civil right of all, but no Negro leaders advocate it. Negro leaders have brought no cases to make the Supreme Court illegalize the 21 state laws against intermarriage.

NEGRO ATTITUDES

GOVERNOR WALLACE AND THE NAACP

Amsterdam News - Column: Home Plate by Jackie Robinson (September 14)

Recently I was asked to be a panelist on a Chicago CBS show along with Governor Wallace of Alabama. The Governor never showed up. The moderator did a magnificent job of straying from the subjects we were to discuss. There was another panelist, Dale Baxter, who is president of something called the National Association for the Advancement of White People, an able man with whom I rarely agreed. The old question of the Negro slowing up in his quest for justice came up and I reminded them that after all these years of waiting, the Negro is not so much interested in being liked as in having his rights. One panelist quoted S. B. Fuller who said in effect that the Negro is not discriminated against. Mr. Fuller has a right to his opinion and the fact that he is a Negro does not make him right. One of these days, as Roy Wilkins said, we will be strong enough to emancipate not only whites who want to support us, but Negroes who are afraid their success would melt away under the scorching heat of integration and free competition. Anyway, I'm sorry Governor Wallace didn't make it.

THEY ARE FED UP

Chicago Daily Defender - Editorial (September 19)

The shameful deeds being committed against Birmingham Negroes must soon end or there will be bloody scenes and racial conflicts of unparalleled ferocity. The evil consequences of Gov. Wallace's brazen flaunting of the law are ripening into bitter fruits. Social progress, history tells us, is seldom accomplished without bloodshed. The Negro has been patient far too long. He has been denied his rights, pushed around, beaten, maimed and lynched. While Governor Wallace's hands are dripping with blood, Congress is sitting on the civil rights bill. And the Federal Government finds no legal warrant for intervention in Alabama. This dilemma will not be resolved until the Negro shows convincingly that he is ready to fight and die for his freedom and rights.

'AMERICA'S CONSCIENCE FUND': A 'CON' JOB TO EXPIATE GUILT

Chicago Daily Defender - Column: A Stone's Throw by Chuck Stone (9/24)

A group of distinguished, well-meaning white Americans have started an "American Conscience Fund" to get rid of the guilt they feel after the Birmingham church bombing. The fund is lilywhite in origin, although several members have a long and meaningful involvement in the Negro's struggle. At least a group of white Americans publicly opposed to genocide ought to let us participate in a fund-raising to preserve ourselves. It's nice of these great Americans to help rebuild the church, but if they'd just lobby a little harder in their respective jobs, cities, departments and businesses to get more Negro jobs, the right to live anywhere, more Negroes in better schools, they would influence public opinion so strongly, that there would be infinitely less violence directed against black people

SAYS ONLY WHITES CAN SOLVE "NEGRO PROBLEM"

Jet (September 26)

According to a recent article in NEGRO DIGEST, Negroes themselves can never solve the race problem because they do not cause the problem. The problem is caused by the "social psychosis of white supremacy" and is a problem of "distortions" or "mass delusions" in the minds of white people Such illness can only be cured "in those cases where the patient wants to get well".

SELLING CIVIL RIGHTS

Amsterdam News - Column: Along This Way by Roy Wilkins (September 28)

One of the major weaknesses of the Negro's campaign for full equality is pointed up by the latest Gallup poll showing that one-half of the American white adults believe the Kennedy Administration is pushing civil rights too fast. Every corporation selling a product has a public relations department; every foreign country employs firms here to tell its story to the American public and its government. We give the back of our hand to the White Citizens Council, while it is steadily building a public opinion in support of its views. The Negro must keep up the direct action program of protest.. must use the courts and must have civil rights legislation.. must use his consumer buying power, his political power.. But he must also mount an educational campaign to win a substantial percentage of American minds.

AMERICA'S BLOWIN' IN THE WIND

Amsterdam News - Column by Jackie Robinson (September 28)

The winds of wrath and resentment of the Negro are churning into what can become one of the worst storms which ever hit this so-called land of the free. The Negro's patience has grown thin.. there is an atmosphere of retaliation after the four helpless lives of young children were snuffed out by some sick, hate-crazed dog... and it is high time we had more than fancy words from the President... Non-violence and calm is not going to last much longer unless the Government finds some way to halt the reign of terror which is threatening the Negro. Governor Wallace cannot escape the responsibility for having set the stage for one of the ugliest crimes which ever disgraced the United States... if it hadn't been for his sadistic and perverted campaign to keep Negro youngsters out of school, these children might be alive today. If you want to see a people inflamed... keep messing around with our children.

THE 11TH COMMANDMENT

Amsterdam News - Column: Another Angle by James L. Hicks (Sept. 28)

THE MCDOWELL DISMISSAL - Chicago Daily Defender, Editorial (Sept. 30)

When the white man finishes with his recitation of the Ten Commandments he stops, but the Negro adds his own Eleventh Commandment which is probably most important to him: "Tho shall not get caught!" Cleve McDowell violated the 11th Commandment and now he must pay. None of the white students who carried a small arsenal on the campus of Ole Miss when James Meredith was enrolled ever went to jail. There were white people in Ole Miss who didn't want Cleve there and he had to go. He had applied for a permit and had explained his reasons. Unlike Meredith, he had no U.S. marshals to protect him and he was threatened by anonymous calls and unsigned letters. In civilized communities, the intent rather than the possession of a defensive weapon would have weighed in his favor. The Student Judicial Council which recommended McDowell be expelled is headed by Champ Terney, son-in-law of Senator James O. Eastland.

OTHER MINORITIES

MEXICAN-AMERICANS JOIN FREEDOM FIGHT

New York Courier (September 7)

"We must join hands like brothers", said the Los Angeles editor of a Mexican-American newspaper. This marks the first time the Mexican-Americans have allied themselves with Negroes. They began to fear they would be left by the wayside and joined a March in Los Angeles which was keyed to the March on Washington, There are some 1,500,000 of them in California.

ARE PUERTO RICANS COOPERATING IN FREEDOM FIGHT ASK LEADERS

PUERTO RICAN FENCE-SITTING ROLE IN RIGHTS FIGHT HIT BY LEADERS

Both of the above articles in the New York Courier by the New York Courier Task Force.(September 7 and 14)

What is the Puerto Rican population doing to support the civil rights fight in which it is always mentioned? Almost nothing. They consider themselves an ethnic group, not a race, and prefer to be identified with the white community. No civil rights groups operate in the Puerto Rican community and the services offered them tend to shield them from association with other organizations. They are beginning to realize that alliance with the Negroes can bring a faster breaking-down of barriers of discrimination. Their attitude to date has been called naive by Paul Zuber, while Mrs. Leolive Tucker, an educational director for NAACP says they are short-sighted, since the reading level is low in the mainly Puerto Rican schools. There is some movement toward "joining hands like brothers" with the Negroes, but most Puerto Rican leaders tend to keep their group separate and apart from the Negroes.

THE JEWS IN RUSSIA

Chicago Daily Defender (October 9)

A rabbi in Russia has been sentenced to death on charges of "economic crimes". The rabbi may not have been guilty at all. Jews are being persecuted in Russia. But why? A commission to inquire into the mistreatment of the Jews in Russia should be appointed by the U.N. We, who are yet oppressed and brutalized, can ill afford to sit back and let persecution of our fellowmen take place without raising our voice against it.

POLICE

MORGUE OR STATIONHOUSE?

Amsterdam News - Editorial (September 14)

For the second time in seven months, police of the 28th precinct in Harlem have reported that a man has committed "suicide" in his cell inside the precinct stationhouse. Where are the police when these people are killing themselves INSIDE the police jail? If the 28th precinct, under Captain Ravens, is going to serve as a morgue for the uptown area, we should either give the station-house another name or give Captain Ravens another title.

CRIME EDITORS

Amsterdam News - Editorial (September 28)

New York reporters recently returned from Birmingham, complained about the city police there maintaining strict control of news events .. virtually police editing of the news. Yet the same thing happens in New York. A Negro woman died in Queens General Hospital five days after she had been slashed by a white man shrieking "I hate Niggers". When questioned, the Police Department told newsmen that the man had used the words "I hate people". Not until 11 days later did they learn he had said "I hate Niggers". Why was it that when a Negro was shot in the back by a policeman in Birmingham, the first report given newsmen was that he was shot by another Negro? In years gone by, the police department said they identified a criminal as Negro to help pinpoint him in the cause of "justice"... but now they tell us they withheld the fact that this slayer was anti-Negro because they didn't want the slayer to know that they knew he was a bigot... This is garbage.. to which the Mayor and Commissioner should put a stop at once. They do it every day in Birmingham but New York has no need to copy.

POLITICS

WILKINS BARS AN ALL-NEGRO PARTY - Amsterdam News (September 14)

NAACP HEAD SAYS ALL-NEGRO PARTY 'LOGICAL ANSWER' IN THE SOUTH

New York Courier (September 14)

While admitting that a Negro political party might have some value in the South on a purely local basis because of local conditions, NAACP's Roy Wilkins said in a radio conference that he would hate to see racial political action in this country through a third party. He warned that a rebuff by Congress on civil rights legislation would increase the chances of more racial violence.

HAYES ROBERTSON - Chicago Daily Defender, Editorial (September 16)

GOP AND CIVIL RIGHTS - Chicago Daily Defender - Editorial (Sept. 18)

Cook County GOP Chairman Hayes Robertson is at heart a Dixiecrat and a Negro hater. If the Republican Party of Illinois is a measure of Republican attitudes throughout the nation, then they may kiss the Negro vote goodbye. The new Negro has no reason to be sentimental about the Republican Party. All the important gains in the last 20 years have been made under a Democratic administration, In California the destiny of the GOP, in the light of the civil rights revolution, is being pondered by party moderates. They believe the alternatives are: to come out hard for Negro rights, risk losing the conservative Southern vote and perhaps even the Negro vote in '64, but building up equity for the long run in the process. Goldwater conservatives vigorously dissent from this view, but they are not really interested in the Negro vote. The moderates oppose Goldwater, prefer someone more liberal, like Rockefeller. We believe with Walter Lippman that Goldwater's nomination would cause panic in the Republican ranks.

SKILLS AND TRAINING

TODAY AND YOU

Chicago Daily Defender - Column by Marjorie L. Dunnegan (Sept. 4)

It has been pointed out that the Urban League has great difficulties in finding qualified applicants when skilled job opportunities are offered. The paucity of qualified applicants is a natural concomitant of the ugly features of the previous pattern, whereby you refuse a colored worker training because of his dark skin, and then refuse him a job because he has no training. In Chicago, say experts, one in every four Negroes over 14 is a "functional illiterate". That means "lacking in ability to fill out properly an employment application." As automation continues its devastating raids on the few remaining unskilled jobs, Chicago Negroes should break down the barriers that keep so many eager workers unemployed and candidates for relief rolls.

THE NEW SOCIAL CLASS

Chicago Daily Defender - Editorial (September 17)

There are still almost 4,000,000 jobless. Prof. Andrew Hacker of Cornell calls this hard-core group "the second America". Unskilled, untrained, many of them Negroes, they are in danger of being the forgotten men in our society of abundance.

SKILL-HUNTING - New York Courier, Editorial (September 21)

VIEWS AND REVIEWS - N.Y.Courier, Column by George Schuyler (10/5/)

At Governor Rockefeller's request a group of New York State recruiters, headed by a Negro, visited 24 Southern Negro colleges interviewing graduates to fill administrative vacancies. The group has quit cold turkey because last year only 9 of 385 applicants passed the State's career test, and none ranked high. The biggest businesses are now skill-hunting among Negroes in all major colleges and have found that too few Negro graduates have taken courses of study useful to American business. It is hoped that more young Negroes will take courses qualifying them for positions with these great corporations.

DOORS ARE OPENING

Chicago Daily Defender - Editorial (October 2)

The demonstrations for civil rights are beginning to awaken America's conscience to its moral responsibility. Trade unions and commercial institutions are changing their hiring practices. It is in the movies where a remarkable breakthrough is taking place, as a result of NAACP demands that TV and movies recognize that one person in 9 in America is Negro, and not all of them are menials. These developments show the power of organized mass pressure.

JOBS FOR UNSKILLED FAST DISAPPEARING

Chicago Daily Defender (October 5)

As a result of automation, the plight of American Negroes is growing worse because unskilled and semi-skilled jobs are disappearing at a "frightening rate", warned Robert C. Weaver, the administrator of the U.S. Housing and Home Finance Agency. While admitting that the middle-class seems destined to grow and prosper, Mr. Weaver pointed out that the economic position of the untrained or poorly trained Negro will continue to decline. Facing job discrimination as well, many Negroes use this as a justification for not trying and for lacking incentive for self-betterment.

NEGRO STUDENTS TOPS DESPITE CULTURAL LAGS - Chicago Defender (10/8)

NEGRO STUDENTS TOP NATIONAL AVERAGE DESPITE EARLY LACKS

New York Courier (October 12)

Negro students in interracial colleges perform well above the national average, overcoming both poor preparation and cultural lacks at home. These findings were based on a follow-up of students receiving aid and counsel from the National Service and Scholarship for Negro Students. "Their credentials were modest", declared the service's president, "But their achievement was brilliant." Fewer than 5% of them withdrew, while the national average of college dropouts is 40%.

SPORTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

INTEGRATED CASTS - Editorial (September 5)

'NO BIAS AT CBS', EXECS TELL EMPLOYMENT UNIT (September 9)

BRIGHTER DAY FOR NEGROES IN RADIO-TV, HOLLYWOOD - (September 5)

IS TV DOING ALL IT CAN IN RACE CRISIS? - (September 30)

The last two articles by Bob Hunter. All four appeared in Defender.

More Negroes are working in Hollywood today than ever before and in TV-radio things have really been looking up. The improvement has occurred in spite of the IATSE policy of seniority for white members and their kin against which the NAACP is appealing to the NLRB. On Broadway there is a growing consciousness of the part Negroes play in American society. There is a vast Negro audience which does not patronize Broadway because they have nothing there to identify with. The situation is changing. There has been little effort in TV to portray the significant changes in people's lives since the Negro revolution. What's it like for a Negro living in Birmingham? What effect has it all had on sensible Southern whites? TV could show the answers to us.

IN THE WINGS

Amsterdam News - Column by Dave Hepburn (September 21)

The American Association of Advertising Agencies stated: "It is vital for the advertising agencies to seek out, recognize and employ the best talents available wherever they may be found, regardless of race, color, religion or national origin." For a group which gave even Jews a hard time, this is some going.

BIAS OUT, BASEBALL IN, 1963 SPORTS PICTURE AT BIRMINGHAM

Chicago Daily Defender (September 23)

The Birmingham Barons are returning to organized baseball now that segregated seating and banning of Negro players have been outlawed.

Thus the city is in the position of returning in the midst of a racial crisis to organized baseball which it quit two years ago because it could not maintain segregation.

NAACP MOVES ON AD AGENCY JOBS - Amsterdam News (September 14)

CIVIL RIGHTS GROUPS EYE TV, ADVERTISING INDUSTRY BIAS

New York Courier (September 14)

The NAACP has demanded from the American Association of Advertising Agencies that its members recognize the existence of the Negro consumer, institute merit employment practices, employ Negro performers without restriction, use Negro models, advertise in the Negro press, and appoint a group to maintain continuing negotiations. While the NAACP acknowledged that token gains have been made recently, they insist on a better representation of Negroes in advertising material and programs.

UNIONS AND EMPLOYMENT

NEGRO FIGHT LIKE UNION EARLY DAYS -- HANNA

New York Courier (September 3)

Hilton E. Hanna, executive assistant of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, AFL-CIO, compared the Negro's struggle for first-class citizenship to the early days of the trade union.. when labor was forced to close ranks and recognize that in unity there is strength. No other group in the annals of mankind has wrought so much in so short a time as has the Negro since Emancipation. If the American Dream is to come true for all its citizens, then the coexistence we seek in international relations must first prove to be a living reality here at home in our everyday domestic affairs.

MUSIC LOCALS MUST MERGE BY MARCH 4 - KENIN (September 9)

CMHI MUSICIANS BLAST LOCAL 208 OFFICIALS (September 24)

Both the above appeared in the Chicago Defender, by Bob Hunter

MUSICIANS ADOPT WATCH, WAIT POLICY - Chicago Defender (September 17)

IN THE WINGS - Amsterdam News, Column by Dave Hepburn (October 5)

In Chicago the all-Negro Local 208 and the formerly all-white Local 10 have been ordered by the President of the International Federation of Musicians, Herman Kenin, to merge by March 4th. Last March a group of 208 members calling themselves Chicago Musicians for Harmonious Integration marched down to Local 10, demanded acceptance, and much to their surprise were signed up without a hitch. Local 10 has 10,000 members; 208 has 2500 and a smaller treasury; it is afraid of being swallowed up in a merger and disallowed its share of Negro officers. Meanwhile in New York, Negroes in Local 802, while integrated, are having trouble with hiked dues, too few plum jobs and no leadership jobs. They have generally been too passive, saying "they just didn't want to be bugged, man" with responsibility as slate candidates. They are getting the union they deserve. That's what happens when people don't want to be "bugged".

MEANY SAYS MANY NEGROES PREFER JIM-CROW UNIONS - Defender (Sept. 23)

MEANY BLAMES NEGROES - Amsterdam News (September 28)

AFL-CIO President Meany said in an address in Chicago that most segregated unions remain segregated because the local Negro unions don't want to amalgamate with white ones. (He added that apprentice rolls must be opened to more Negroes.) NAACP's Rev. Hildebrand said that if that is true it's probably because the Negro union members have no confidence in integrated unions where white men hold leadership positions.

SHARING OF TWIN NEEDS

Amsterdam News - Column: People In Action by Martin L. King Jr.(9/28)

The labor movement did not diminsh the strength of this nation but enlarged it by raising the standards of millions, creating a market for industry, and lifting the whole nation to undreamed levels of production. Those who attack labor today forget that fact. Negroes in the United States are confronted by powerful forces which tell them to rely on the goodwill and understanding of those who profit by exploiting them. These people are shocked by sit-ins, civil disobedience and demonstrations to insure bargaining power. If we do not advance, the crushing burden of centuries of neglect and economic deprivation will destroy us. Negroes are almost entirely a working people with needs identical with labor's needs. That is why Negroes support labor's demands. We fight laws which curb labor... that is why the labor-hater is virtually always a twin-headed creature spewing anti-Negro epithets from one mouth and anti-labor propaganda from the other mouth.

USE AND ABUSE OF LAW

SHORTAGE OF LEGAL TALENT STYMIES CIVIL RIGHTS FIGHT IN COURTROOM

New York Courier (September 7)

Because of a shortage of legal talent for civil rights cases, the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund announced establishment of a system of training legal interns who will go on to practice law in many communities where complex activity has been undertaken by whites to counter the NAACP's legal efforts. Helping are some 100 cooperating attorneys throughout the South.

SEES NEGROES WINNING BIGGER RIGHTS CASES

Amsterdam News (September 14)

Constitutional law experts expect integrationists to win a momentous legal battle before the U.S. Supreme Court in civil rights test cases involving police arrests of sit-ins based on charges of criminal trespass or disorderly conduct. The NAACP will ask the High Court to bar such arrests on the ground that the use of public law enforcement officers and the courts to support private discrimination is unconstitutional.

JAIL THE JAILERS!

New York Courier - Column: Up Front..Down South by Daddy Mention(9/21)

A new day is dawning when a goodly portion of our civil rights money ought to be earmarked for a counter-attack on "lawmen" who busy themselves putting in jail people who insist that the law be upheld. We need the wherewithal and know-how to enforce the law against wayward law enforcement officers, to prosecute false prosecutors, judge false judges, jail false jailers, and sue the whole bunch for depriving us of our priceless rights as Americans. One reason why white Americans enjoy the Bill of Rights is that when their rights are trampled upon, they fairly often prosecute and sue the offender. We don't need new laws; all we need is a statement from the U.S. Attorney General serving notice that henceforth the Department of Justice, District Attorneys and FBI are going to enforce those already in existence to the hilt.

VOTING AND REGISTRATION

WHO WANTS TO VOTE?

New York Courier - Editorial (September 21)

The NAACP, CORE, SCLC, and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee have been complaining about one of the paradoxes of the sustained Negro registration campaign in the South where there is Negro apathy even where registration is relatively simple. It is true that white opposition has grown in intensity but this scarely explains why the majority of Negroes do not even try to register. Voting will not solve all of the Negro's problems in this complex civilization, but it will go so far toward that goal that it becomes criminal to neglect qualifying for it.

REGISTRATION IN SOUTH SHOWS MARKED INCREASE - Amsterdam News (9/21)

TICKER TAPE U.S.A. - Jet (10/3)

Between now and election time in 1964 Negro leaders say at least another 250,000 will be registered for a total of about 1,750,000. While Kennedy captured only 50 to 70 percent of Southern Negro votes in 1960, they foresee him getting 90% next year. Only in Mississippi, Alabama and Louisiana is Negro registration too small to help Kennedy but his aides have written these states off anyway. Democratic polls give Kennedy 95% of Negro vote in nation. This has produced a switch in White House planning i.e.:"No Negro named to Cabinet, weakening of power of Attorney General to probe racial crimes, weakening of civil rights legislation to exclude FEPC, and new arrogance of administration leaders to dictate terms of progress."

MISCELLANEOUS

SOCIAL CHANGE

Chicago Daily Defender - Editorial (September 4)

Up to this year the American people have accepted gradualism as a workable policy in resolving the race problem. Suddenly a national ferment has begun. A shift has taken place away from the oppressive pessimism of the past. We trust the good sense of people when they rouse themselves to confront a big problem. Countless American communities have already worked their way through the most unyielding stalemates on racial issues. Their worst fears did not materialize. The new situation presented new problems; but the new problems were a stage higher and a stage ahead.

THE SPEAKER

Amsterdam News - Editorial (September 14)

William Levitt, who has the dubious distinction of having built the largest city in America where non-white people were not permitted to live, has now come forth to offer the federal government some advice on how to end discrimination in housing. He begins by stating that he will continue to refuse to sell the houses he builds to Negroes.

MENTAL MIDGET

Amsterdam News - Editorial (September 14)

The spectacle of Governor Wallace and his national guard of Alabama virtually playing cops and robbers with President Kennedy and the army of the United States would be almost funny were it not for the fact that Wallace's little game seeks to undermine the very foundation on which the central government of this nation was built. The pity is that a man like Governor Wallace doesn't realize how really nice the President is being to him.. when he could, by one stroke of the pen chop Wallace down to size.

THE HUMAN RELATIONS BEAT (September 25)

Chicago Daily Defender - Column by Sherwood Ross, Chicago Urban League

It would have been unthinkable for Hemingway to characterize an entire group - as did some GI's in Korea - as "Gooks". For him, men were men. They either had it or they didn't. Looking at our suburbs, you wish there were other Hemingways with courage to judge others as individuals. Our suburbs have often isolated themselves by age, occupation, income, ethnic extraction or religion. In some it is as hard to find a man over 50 as to find a Negro. Suburbanites' efforts to keep out Negroes typifies their manner of judging people as a class. Did any of them, like Hemingway, ever stop to judge Negroes as human beings?

WHITES SHOULD ENVY NEGROES, SAYS PSYCHOLOGIST

Jet (September 26)

Negro demonstrators should be the envy of every white person according to Dr. Benjamin Spock, renowned white expert on child development. "..a wonderful thing to find a cause and an effective way of advancing it.. This is where mankind is at its very best, working hard for a deeply important reason", said Dr. Spock.

NEGRO WOMEN'S ATTITUDES DIFFER, STUDY SHOWS - Amsterdam News (9/28)

SURVEY SAYS NEGRO WOMEN MORE MILITANT AND BOYCOTT CONSCIOUS THAN MEN

Chicago Daily Defender (October 5)

RESEARCH STUDY SAYS SELECTIVE BUYING AIDS CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRESS

New York Courier (October 12)

Selective buying and boycotts of products of firms practicing discrimination is a formidable weapon in the Negro fight for fair employment. 89% of the Negroes interviewed by the Center for Research in Marketing said they would support a national boycott if their leaders called one. Most Negroes would return to boycotted products or stores after the situation had been righted, but some never would. Negro women, now moving into more professional and skilled jobs, are even more determined to achieve equal rights and better living conditions than are Negro men, and will support a boycott more willingly to obtain their goals. More and more Negro women work than do white women, while the number of working white women has declined. Negro women are more brand conscious - they want full value for the money they have earned.

MORATORIUM ON PROTESTS

Chicago Daily Defender - Editorial (October 1)

Publisher David Lawrence is playing the role of self-appointed moderator in the racial crisis. He is urging a moratorium on protests. He assumes that irreconcilable conflict becomes reconcilable in time. No issue of consequence has ever been solved by time. Mr. Lawrence has relentlessly advocated segregation, without regard to facts and logic of the social sweep that has warranted recent judicial changes. There can be no moratorium on justice and human rights. If there is to be a moratorium, let it be on segregation and discrimination.

ELIJAH MUHAMMUD CAUTIONS ON USE OF NON-VIOLENCE

New York Courier (October 5)

Non-violence is not acceptable because it plays right into the white man's "trigger finger", said Muslim leader Elijah Muhammud to a Philadelphia audience. "I am not inciting anyone to riot or pick up arms - we move according to the will of Allah", he said. Then he cited two sources for the law of self-defense: the Holy Quran - "Fight those who fight with you"; and the law of God given to Moses - "An eye for an eye...."

R&R Rd.

California case, the Court put on the shelf for conjectural future agricultural use, which would probably enure more to the benefit of absentee non-Indian lessees rather than the relatively few, 2,000, Indians on the reservation, enough water for the domestic uses of 1½ million people in the burgeoning population centers of the Southwest.

So, my point is that I do not think that is a wise allocation of water, and S. 1275 would avoid such unfortunate results by freeing the longstanding principles of western water law to work as they have for the benefit of the people over the years.

The second point of S. 1275, the consumptive use preference provision, is, of course, right on the nose of the legal issue I took up with the Interior and Justice Departments and on which they refused to tell their position concerning the present status of the law. We need S. 1275 to settle that point.

The third point of S. 1275, the requirement that the Federal Government comply with State regulation when asserting water rights under proprietary principles as distinguished from the sovereign power of eminent domain, is also a current and real issue. The Justice Department has recently announced its intention to appeal the lower court decision, I earlier referred to, which had denied the central supremists' claim of the right to take water without either complying with the State regulation or paying damages to the others it harms in doing so. That is the notorious Fallbrook litigation, and we need S. 1275 to avoid such claims by the Department of Justice.

Finally, the fourth point of S. 1275 is hardly academic either. On April 15, 1963, the U.S. Supreme Court handed down another decision granting to the executive branch a broad power to do that which S. 1275 would prohibit; namely, the seizure of water without first instituting court proceedings to determine fair compensation for those who will be harmed by the seizure.

In so doing, the High Court overruled western water lawyers, a western Federal district judge, and a three-judge panel of our western Federal 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. That is the well-known case of Dugan v. Rank, formerly known as Rank v. Krug. S. 1275 would avoid such a result in the future.

So, the situation is clear. There are real and present problems in the field of western water rights.

Water planning, such as is going on all the time and as would be implemented under the terms of other pending legislation, S. 1111, the water resources planning bill, is best done in full awareness of who has what and who can do what with regard to available water. Testimony at our irrigation subcommittee's recent hearings on the water planning legislation was, to a great extent, to the effect that S. 1275 should be enacted simultaneously with the planning bill, S. 1111. Harmonious and sound water planning requires sound water rights.

Also, the implementation of planning by the construction of projects requires sound water rights. The West cannot afford the luxury of disputes either before, during, or after the construction of our dams, conveyance facilities, and service works. Objections to proposals would often disappear if those who would be affected know where they stand with respect to water rights. We could proceed with the job sooner and run it more smoothly after it is finished. S. 1275 would remove many possible doubts which might otherwise exist concerning the far-reaching proposals which we can anticipate will continue to be the rule in the future of water resource development. Enactment of our bill would actually help Federal as well as State and local projects—by clarifying a now too confused situation concerning Federal authority under Federal projects.

Just as the problems I have discussed are clear, so is the solution. It is enactment of S. 1275.

And, as the solution is clear, so are the means necessary to implement it. It is broad grassroots support from organizations like yours.

Only with such support can we overcome administration indifference, and maybe even hostility, which, unfortunately, appears to exist. The westerners, in particular, and all those everywhere interested in good water resource development and good government must make their views known so as to impress upon President Kennedy, Attorney General Kennedy, Secretary Udall, and the rest of the President's advisers on this legislation, that this is an important matter and that it should be treated in the manner you and I, and others familiar with water development, know it must be treated—by enactment of S. 1275.

I am truly convinced that this time we are securing the necessary support to result in enactment of this vital legislation. Many important groups have already this year passed resolutions endorsing S. 1275, either specifically or by virtue of the scope of their stated position. Many good people have been working on this, including your own Nevada director and association first vice president, Hugh Shamberger.

We already have resolutions of support from the American Bar Association, the National Association of Counties, the National Association of Attorneys General, the Western Association of Attorneys General, and various State and local governments and associations of which I am aware. There may well be some national organizations which have expressed their support and which I do not personally know of at this time—the resolutions are coming in thick and fast from all around.

You probably noticed that I did not mention the National Reclamation Association. This is because you have not yet passed a resolution since introduction of S. 1275, though you did pass one on the subject of water rights last year.

I hope that during this convention you will adopt a clear-cut resolution putting the full, unqualified support of this important group behind S. 1275.

As I said, the course necessary to help the cause of water resource development and good government is clear. Other groups are doing their part to help. I hope the Kennedy administration will not stand in the way. I hope you will lend your voices to the cause.

Thank you very much.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, yesterday the Social Committee of the United Nations General Assembly adopted a very broad declaration on racial prejudice which is of great interest to the people of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that the declaration may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the declaration was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECLARATION BY U.N. ON RACIAL PREJUDICE

The General Assembly,

Considering that the Charter of the United Nations is based on the principles of the dignity and equality of all human beings and seeks, among other basic objectives, to achieve international cooperation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction, as to race, sex, language or religion,

Considering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights proclaims that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights and that everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set out in the declaration, without distinction of any kind, in particular race, color or national origin,

Considering that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights proclaims further that all are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection against any discrimination and against any incitement to such dscrimination,

Considering that the United Nations has condemned colonialism, and all practices of segregation and discrimination associated therewith, and that the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples proclaims in particular the necessity of bringing it to a speedy and unconditional end,

Considering that any doctrine of racial differentiation or superiority is scientifically false, morally condemnable, socially unjust and dangerous, and that there is no justification for racial discrimination either in theory or in practice,

Taking into account the other resolutions adopted by the General Assembly and the international instruments adopted by the specialized agencies, especially the International Labor Organization and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, in the field of discrimination,

Taking into account the fact that, although international action and efforts made in a number of countries have made it possible to achieve progress in that field, discrimination based on race, color, or ethnic origin in certain areas of the world nonetheless continues to give cause for serious concern,

Alarmed by the manifestations of racial discrimination still in evidence in some areas of the world, some of which are imposed by certain governments by means of legislative, administrative, or other measures, in the form inter alia, of apartheid, segregation and separation, as well as by the promotion and dissemination of doctrines of racial superiority and expansionism in certain areas,

Convinced that all forms of racial discrimination, and still more so governmental policies based on the prejudice of racial superiority or on racial hatred, besides constituting a violation of fundamental human rights, tend to jeopardize friendly relations among peoples, cooperation between nations and international peace and security,

Convinced also that racial discrimination harms not only those who are its objects but also those who practice it,

Convinced further that the building of a world society free from all forms of racial segregation and discrimination, factors which create hatred and division among men, is one of the fundamental objectives of the United Nations,

Solemnly affirms the necessity of speedily eliminating racial discrimination throughout the world and in all its forms and manifestations and of securing understanding of and respect for the dignity of the human person,

Solemnly affirms the necessity of adopting national and international measures to that end, including teaching, education and information, in order to secure the universal and effective recognition and observance of the principles set forth below, and

Proclaims this declaration:

ARTICLE 1

Discrimination between human beings on the grounds of race, color or ethnic origin is an offense to human dignity and shall be condemned as a denial of the principles of the Charter of the United Nations, as a violation of the human rights and fundamental freedoms proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as an obstacle to friendly and peaceful relations among nations and as a fact capable of disturbing peace and security among peoples.

ARTICLE 2

1. No state, institution, group or individual shall make any discrimination whatsoever in matters of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the treatment of persons, groups of persons or institutions on the grounds of race, color or ethnic origin.

2. No state shall encourage, advocate, or lend its support, through police action or otherwise, to any discrimination based on race, color or ethnic origin by any group, institution, or individual.

3. Special concrete measures shall be taken in appropriate circumstances in order to secure adequate development or protection of individuals belonging to certain racial groups with the object of insuring the full enjoyment by such individuals of human rights and fundamental freedoms. These measures shall in no circumstance have as a consequence the maintenance of unequal or separate rights for different racial groups.

ARTICLE 3

1. Particular efforts shall be made to prevent discrimination based on race, color or ethnic origin, especially in the fields of civil rights, access to citizenship, education, religion, employment, occupation and housing.

2. Everyone shall have equal access to any place or facility intended for use by the general public, without distinction as to race, color or ethnic origin.

ARTICLE 4

All states shall take effective measures to revise governmental and other public policies and to rescind laws and regulations which have the effect of creating and perpetuating racial discrimination wherever it still exists. They should pass legislation for prohibiting such discrimination and should take all appropriate measures to combat those prejudices which lead to racial discrimination.

ARTICLE 5

An end shall be put without delay to governmental and other public policies of racial segregation and especially policies of apartheid as well as all forms of racial discrimination and separation resulting from such policies.

ARTICLE 6

No discrimintaion by reason of race, color, or ethnic origin shall be admitted in the enjoyment by any person of political and citizenship rights in his country, in particular the right to participate in elections through universal and equal suffrage and to take part in the government. Everyone has the right of equal access to public service in his country.

ARTICLE 7

1. Everyone has the right to equality before the law and to equal justice under the law. Everyone, without distinction as to race, color, or ethnic origin, has the right to security of person and protection by the state against violence or bodily harm, whether inflicted by government officials, or by individual, group, or institution.

2. Everyone shall have the right to an effective protection and remedy against any discrimination he may suffer on the ground of race, color or ethnic origin with respect to his fundamental rights and freedoms through independent national tribunals competent to deal with such matters.

ARTICLE 8

All effective steps shall be taken immediately in the fields of teaching, education, and information, with a view to eliminating racial discrimination and prejudice and promoting understanding, tolerance and friendship among nations and racial groups, as well as to propagating the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations, of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and of the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

ARTICLE 9

1. All propaganda and organizations based on ideas or theories of the superiority of one race or group of persons of one color or ethnic origin, with a view to justifying or promoting racial discrimination in any form, shall be severely condemned.

2. All incitement to, or acts of violence, whether by individuals or organizations, against any race or group of persons of another color or ethnic origin shall be considered an offense against society and punishable under law.

3. In order to put into effect the purposes and principles of this declaration, all states shall take immediate and positive measures including legislative and other measures to prosecute and or outlaw organizations which promote racial discrimination or incite to or use violence for the purpose of discrimination based on race, color or ethnic origin.

ARTICLE 10

The United Nations, the specialized agencies, states and nongovernmental organizations shall do all in their power to promote energetic action which, by combining legal and other practical measures, will make possible the abolition of all forms of racial discrimination. They shall, in particular, study the causes of such discrimination with a view to recommending appropriate and effective measures to combat and eliminate it.

ARTICLE 11

Every state shall promote respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations, and shall fully and faithfully observe the provisions of the present declaration, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the declaration on the granting of independence to colonial countries and peoples.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the declaration was adopted by a vote of 89 to 0, with 17 abstentions. One of the countries which abstained was the United States. The reason for the U.S. abstention was a provision in the declaration which may possibly present problems under the Constitution because it called upon the member states to pass legislation that would "outlaw" organizations which may be advocating racial discrimination or segregation. This presents a question for us under the Constitution of the United States and the right of free speech under the first amendment.

I have little doubt that we can deal with this issue when an opportunity comes to do so again in the General Assembly. I hope very much that, by making the necessary reservations as to the constitutional protections of the United States, or by other appropriate means which can be presented by our representative at the U.N., Gov. Adlai Stevenson, the United States will find it possible to join in this declaration. It is important that we do so.

First, the U.N. declaration affirms the basic human values of the charter.

Second—and very importantly—it lines up the whole world in a declaration against discrimination and segregation which is international in scope and demonstrates to the whole world that not only does the United States suffer from manifestations of this character, which affect particularly American Negroes, but that other nations have similar problems, and that the world is cognizant of them, and is now about to take a role in helping individual nations meet the problems.

I am particularly impressed with two of the declarations in this master declaration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 3 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. The declarations are, first:

Convinced also that racial discrimination harms not only those who are its objects but those who practice it,

Another declaration is:

Convinced further that the building of a world society free from all forms of racial segregation and discrimination, factors which create hatred and division among men, is one of the fundamental objectives of the United Nations,

I think all mankind will applaud this declaration and its quality. I would feel deeply disappointed if the United States did not find a way to join in it, as I am confident it represents the overwhelming opinion of the people of this country, both as respects manifestations of segregation and discrimination in the United States and as respects our feeling that such discrimination and segregation should be eliminated, wherever else it may be, notably in connection with the policy of apartheid in the Union of South Africa, which is unjust for so many millions of persons there, and which endangers the peace and security of that great continent.

I am confident this can be done by appropriate reservation, in view of the legal problems which it presents to our delegation at the U.N., but I rise today to call attention to the importance of the declaration and to emphasize the fact that it is not only meaningful to point out that there is a great problem in the world and that segregation and discrimination on an international scale are one of the great problems of mankind, but that the United Nations is now trying to take a hand in an effort to solve them. This is to the good.

It represents my ardent desire—and I think it represents the desire on the part of the overwhelming majority of the American people; certainly the people in my State—that the United States should not refrain from being a party to the declaration, but that it should join in it, as can be done by appropriate reservation, at the time the vote is cast, to save itself from any implication that the constitutional mandate is being compromised.

That could not be done, anyway, under our law. The Constitution cannot be set aside by a treaty or declaration. In this case, the declaration is not a treaty. But I think we should make the necessary reservations and not fail to aline ourselves with a movement of such great importance to mankind and to the conscience of our country.

I ask unanimous consent that an article from the New York Times on this subject may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.N. UNIT ADOPTS APPEAL TO ERASE RACE PREJUDICE—UNITED STATES AND 16 OTHERS ABSTAIN, FEARING CURB ON FREEDOMS—AMENDMENT SOUGHT

(By David Anderson)

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y., October 28.—A declaration against all forms of racial discrimination was adopted by the General Assembly's Social Committee here today. The vote was 89 to 0, with 17 abstentions.

The countries that withheld endorsement of the motion—Western Europeans, the British Commonwealth, and the United States—explained that they did so because the declaration threatened certain freedoms in its desire to stamp out race bias. In particular they opposed a provision that calls on all nations to outlaw organizations that "promote" racial discrimination.

"The purposes and principles of the declaration have our whoehearted support, as we have made clear time and time again," said Mrs. Jane Warner Dick of the United States. However, she continued, wording in the text upset a carefully worked out compromise by Asian, African, and Latin American delegations.

INCITEMENT IS FEARED

"Our legal and constitutional system has maintained a distinction between the mere expression of opinion and the voicing of statements likely to lead to crime or violence," she added.

A dozen speakers echoed this belief that the declaration trespassed on their countries' constitutional provisions.

While the size of the vote for the declaration made its adoption by the General Assembly a certainty, a move will be made to amend the one passage that the United States and the others cannot accept. The purpose would be to obtain unanimous approval.

Mrs. Dick said the United States was "confident that some basis can be found that will make it possible for this declaration to receive the overwhelming support it deserves." H. P. L. Attlee of Britain said it was still possible to improve the text at a later stage.

The Soviet bloc is expected to fight any amendment and a majority of member states may be content to let well enough alone. As one African delegate observed: "Free speech can go too far."

The declaration covers every aspect of racial discrimination that delegates from 111 nations could conceive possible. Its articles open with condemnation of any offense to human dignity and move one to outline what a state may not do, such as "encourage, advocate, or lend its support, through police action or otherwise, to any discrimination."

Civil rights, religion, jobs, and housing would be protected from bias of any kind. The policies, laws, and regulations of a country would be open to scrutiny if a nation abided by the declaration. Special reference is made to apartheid, as in South Africa, as something to be eliminated.

Guarantees of racial freedom in matters of civil service employment, the holding of public office, and voting were written into the declaration, as were such areas as teaching, education, and public information. A need for independent courts to hear racial cases is mentioned, along with the right to absolute equality before the law.

PROPAGANDA AIMS BARRED

The most controversial passages of the document deal with instruments or groups for propaganda and incitement of racial discrimination.

In conclusion, all member states and the United Nations itself are called upon to promote energetic action against racial intolerance and to foster respect for human rights, particularly as set forth in the declaration.

Much trouble was experienced in drafting the declaration. Debate on its provisions dragged on over 25 meetings, in the course of which 81 amendments or revisions were discussed. The dominant wish of the delegates was to strengthen a provisional text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights.

This came as no surprise since the Commission's approach was considered to be one reflecting its composition: of 21 member nations, only one, Liberia, was African and three—Afghanistan, India, and the Philippines—Asian.

Early in debate fear was expressed by the United States and Western European countries that the drive to abolish racial bias might get out of hand.

U.S. RELUCTANCE SHOWN

For example, it was felt that other freedoms, those of association and expression, were endangered. The question came to a focus in the hotly contested article 9, dealing with measures a government is expected to take against discrimination.

The United States reluctantly agreed to the outlawing of organizations that incite to or use violence for the purpose of racial discrimination. But then trouble developed.

Byelorussia introduced an amendment whereby groups merely promoting bias would likewise be outlawed and this was inacceptable to a number of delegations, including the United States.

It was to rearm this position that the United States abstained today and will attempt to have the text restored when it comes before the Full Assembly for final action.

Western delegates have been disturbed by other aspects of the debate. It was argued that confusion had arisen between a declaration and a convention.

A declaration should concern itself with general principles and moral precepts to guide the conduct and behavior of nations, it was reasoned. A convention, due to be drafted next year, is to detail specific legal objections and impose sanctions. Yet the present declaration includes such detail.

REPRESSIVE IDEAS FOUGHT

The search for strong language by the Africans and Asians opened the way for the Communist bloc to inject concepts that were discarded only after long wrangling sessions. Among these were passages terming racial discrimination a threat to peace, neo-Facist, and punishable under criminal law.

The United States led in the fight against every approach of this kind. "We do not believe it is necessary to restrict freedom for the expression of ideas, even ideas we loathe, in order to overcome discrimination," Mrs. Dick told the committee.

Adlai E. Stevenson, Chief U.S. Delegate, virtually assured the committee at the start of the debate that this country would support the declaration.

"We would not risk leaving the impression that we place anything but the highest priority on the fight against discrimination everywhere," he said.

Yet it now appears that the declaration, as it stands, would violate the U.S. Constitution.

Dr. Bonifacio de Miranda of Portugal noted that he had supported the declaration although abstaining in earlier voting. The reason, he explained, lay in Portugal's interest in abolishing discrimination in whatever form.

"We are pioneers in antiracism, the original multiracial society," he said.

---

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR KEFAUVER, OF TENNESSEE

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, last Thursday the Senate devoted its session to paying tributes to one whom I consider one of its all-time great Senators, Estes Kefauver, and I was proud to be among those who spoke. The tributes that poured forth from our colleagues were eloquent testimony not only to the esteem and admiration in which Estes was held but demonstrated the wide range of his activities, invariably in behalf of the public interest and for a better world.

I ask unanimous consent that two articles from the September and October issues respectively of the publication, Freedom & Union, the first of which is entitled "Senator Estes Kefauver: Trail Blazer of Atlantic Union, 1903–1963"; and the second, "How Kefauver Submitted First Atlantic Convention Bill," as well as an article from the former issue by Edward J. Meeman, and an editorial from the same issue by Elmo Roper entitled "Kefauver, the Irreplaceable Man," be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks, and that these be added to my tribute in the memorial volume which will contain the eulogies.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Freedom & Union, September 1963]

SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER: TRAILBLAZER OF ATLANTIC UNION, 1903–63

"The answer of the State Department to every proposal for peace, Mr. President, is that it needs time to consider the proposal. My heaven, Mr. President * * * we need to utilize the brief time that we have * * * to quit drifting and start moving. The State Department evidently does not realize that we cannot kill time; it is time which kills us. And that was never more true than it is at this very moment."

POIGNANT TIMELY REMINDER

Thus spoke Senator Estes Kefauver in his speech, "Atlantic Union: The Way to Peace—Reply to the State Department," in answer to its opposition to the Atlantic Union resolution he had introduced July 28, 1949. He spoke on the Senate floor March 13, 1950—3 months before communism suddenly launched its attack on South Korea.

All that speech repays rereading now, but the paragraph quoted speaks most eloquently just today to all his generation, and most movingly to us Atlantic Unionists who know how priceless was his pioneering for Federation of the Free. No one in the prime of life can be reminded too often or too poignantly that, however much we act as though we had time to kill, all the while time is killing us. Estes speaks to us, and to all, with new authority on this subject now. He did not kill time, he crowded great good into his years, and wisely did he do so, for now time has killed him, when only 60, at the peak of his powers.

File whole
ACME
R + R Rela.

LIBERATOR

Vol. III, No. 10 OCTOBER 1963 35c

Rebellion or Revolution?
Harold Cruse

All Black 3rd Party
William Worthy

Exclusive Interview With
Dick Gregory

LIBERATOR

Vol. III, No. 10 October 1963

LIBERATOR is the voice of the Afro-American protest movement in the United States and the liberation movement of Africa.

Copyright 1963, by Afro-American Research Institute, Inc. 244 East 46th Street, New York 17, N.Y. Tel: YU 6-5939

Single copy: 35¢; yearly subscription: $3.00; foreign: $11. Advertising rates upon request.

All manuscripts, letters, subscription orders, change of address should be sent to the above address.

Executive Board

Daniel H. Watts
editor-in-chief
Lowell P. Beveridge, Jr.
editor
James C. Finkenstaedt
Clebert Ford
Carlos E. Russell
C. E. Wilson associate editors
Evelyn B. Kalibala secretary
Tom Feelings
illustrator

Advisory Board

Daniel H. Watts
chairman
James Baldwin
Ossie Davis
Len Holt
L.H. Michaux
Richard B. Moore
Willard Moore
Capt. Hugh Mulzac
George B. Murphy, Jr.
Uthman A. Salaam
Florence Shervington
Selma Sparks
Paul B. Zuber

CONTENTS

GHANA SPEAKS OUT 3
THE PILGRIMAGE C.E. Wilson 4
MESSAGE FROM LORD RUSSELL 4
DICK GREGORY Clebert Ford 8
THE NEW AFRO-AMERICAN WRITER Rolland Snellings 10
REBELLION OR REVOLT Harold Cruse 11
DUBOIS, AN AFRICAN PATRIOT 12
AN AFRO-AMERICAN CULTURAL CENTER 14
THRU WOMEN'S EYES 15
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR 17
AN ALL BLACK PARTY 18
BOOK REVIEW: BLUES PEOPLE 22

Cover Photo: Wide World Photo

EDITORIAL

Dream and Reality

On the morning of Sunday, September 15, a bomb exploded in the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Alabama. Cynthia Wesley, 14, Denise McNair, 11, Carol Robertson, 14, and Addie Mae Collins, 14, all students at the Church Sunday School, were killed by the explosion. Fifteen others were injured. Later that day Johnny Robinson, 16, was fatally shot in the back by a Birmingham policeman, and Virgil Wade, 13, was killed by two white youths.

These brutal murders of defenseless young Afro-Americans horribly point up the reality of the American scene in contrast to the dream which Rev. Martin Luther King recently revealed on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in Washington. These Birmingham outrages were not an isolated exception; they were a typical and inevitable result of the present national policy—the result of hundreds of unprosecuted bombings, burnings, personal attacks and violations of civil rights perpetrated against Afro-Americans in increasing number and intensity in the face of almost complete inaction on the part of both State and Federal law enforcement agencies. The finger of guilt for these murders points in a wide arc.

The finger of guilt points to the actual perpetrators of the crimes. They must be apprehended and permanently removed from society. As we go to press, there have not even been any arrests for the Church massacre. We fear that, even if the guilty parties should - contrary to precedent - be arrested, they will merely be treated to an extended vacation in some state mental institution in accordance with the new sophisticated precedent of handling such cases. (We refer to the case of James Beckwith, indicted for the murder of Medgar Evers and to General Walker, leader of the armed resistance to Federal authority at the time of James Meredith's enrollment at Mississippi University.)

The finger of guilt points to Governor Wallace and other southern State officials who have used the prestige and power of their office to encourage and defend racial violence and oppression. They must be impeached and permanently removed from any position of political power or influence.

The finger of guilt points to J. Edgar Hoover and his racist cohorts in the F.B.I. for their almost unblemished record of failure to apprehend perpetrators of racial violence - a record which is entirely consistent with racist attitudes and personnel policy within the Bureau. They should be removed from office for - at the very least - incompetency.

The finger of guilt points to Attorney General Robert Kennedy for failure to act against the above-named guilty parties who stand in open defiance of the laws of the land which he is sworn to uphold. He is also guilty for failure to take action on hundreds of complaints of violations of civil rights filed in his office.

The finger of guilt points to President Kennedy for failing to take action against the above-mentioned guilty parties and for failing to take all necessary action, including the use of Federal troops, to insure equal protection under the law to Afro-Americans.

The finger of guilt points to Rev. Martin Luther King for false leadership of the black people; for continuing to preach a policy of non-violence and love in spite of the daily toll of humiliation, blood and life which this policy has cost his people.

Finally and most tragically, the finger of guilt points to the Afro-American people themselves for failure to condemn and act against all of the above-mentioned guilty parties, and particularly for tolerating the misleadership of Rev. Martin Luther King. We must wake up to the fact that the issues of jobs, education, desegregation, and civil rights are only small parts of the basic problem of survival. If we do not organize for survival, we will not be here to enjoy the fruits of equality. We must demand that our leaders recognize the reality of our struggle and responsbily organize for physical self-defense and abandon all irresponsible reliance on the tragically demonstrated ineffectual powers of love and conscience.

- Daniel H. Watts

Ghana Speaks Out

Determined Afro-Americans in Accra, Ghana, lead a march on the U.S. Embassy. (l. to r.) Julian Mayfield, Dr. W. Alpheus Hunton, Alice Windom, W.A. Jeanpierre, and Maya Angelou Make.

Afro-Americans and Africans staged a picket demonstration outside the American Embassy in Accra on August 28th to voice their support of the March on Washington which occurred at the same time (see page 4). A delegation from the demonstrators presented a petition to Embassy officials for President Kennedy.

Many of the demonstrators were in deep mourning for Dr. W.E.B. DuBois, the internationally renowned Afro-American scholar and "Father of Pan-Africanism," who had died in Accra the previous night at the age of 96 (see page 12).

The leader of the delegation which presented the petition was Dr. W. Alpheus Hunton, author of "Decision in Africa" and Secretary of the Encyclopaedia Africana.

Many of the placards carried by the picketers criticized the U. S. positions in Africa, Asia, and Latin America. Dr. Robert Lee, a dentist who has lived in Ghana seven years, explained: "We see our American struggle as part and parcel of the African revolution."

Novelist Julian Mayfield said, "Black Americans have always fought for their freedom. The significance of today's struggle is that more freedom fighters in the United States know they are not alone. A growing number of young Afro-Americans are not afraid to use the term 'American imperialism.' They are fighting for equality, yes, but not to be identified with the Ugly Americans who have colonized Puerto Rico, who seek to starve revolutionary Cuba to death, and who are carrying on a secret war against the people of South Viet Nam."

One member of the group, Mrs. Maya Angelou Make, wife of Pan-Africanist Congress representative in Cairo, Mr. Vus Make, said that the demonstrators in Africa "are very much aware of the fact the Afro-American struggle is inextricably linked with the battle of Africans, Asians and Latin Americans against every form of imperialism and neo-colonialism."

Miss Barbara Masekala, a student from South Africa, said that photographs of dogs attacking Afro-Americans and white policemen clubbing black women had shocked her. "I thought they said America was the land of the free and the home of the brave. These photographs of Birmingham looked more like South Africa's Sharpeville to me."

GHANAIAN STUDENTS BEATEN

Just 12 days after the above protest demonstration, three Ghanaian students were brutally beaten by a group of white men near Tuscaloosa, Alabama. The students initially called the Ghana Embassy who in turn called the State Department which was "reported planning to issue formal apologies" after having expressed its "regrets over the incident."

In marked contrast to the militancy of the demonstrators in Accra, the Ghana Embassy in New York does not plan to protest officially and considers the diplomatic part of the affair closed.

A section of the picket line which kept a vigil in front of U.S. Embassy in Accra in support of the March on Washington.

The Pilgrimage

a reappraisal of Aug. 28

C.E. Wilson

Photos by Lillian Tonnaire-Taylor

They came from every state in the union by plane, bus, train, on foot, to a shrine of American Freedom. On August 28, 1963 the world viewed a moving example of the Negro's faith in the American dream and Constitution. A faith so strong that it has outlasted 100 years of torture, sadism, violence and bitterness.

By now everybody's read and heard about what happened; most saw it all on television, probably seeing more of the proceedings than most of those who were there, but, let's review what happened. As soon as it became apparent that there was going to be a march, friends and foes alike predicted trouble and violence from the rabble that would descend on the Capitol. "Friends" of the Negroes were troubled by the thought of violence, the enemies were hopeful that there would be violence. It was hard to tell the difference between friend and enemy. As the day drew closer the fear of violence became the dominant theme - or was it the unconscious wish of America that there would be trouble so that the Negro drive for a fair break could be ignored and discredited. White Americans realized that if they had been treated so harshly and unfairly for 100 years they would have put on a show: "The Negroes might act just like us, you know - animals that we are."

The weatherman smiled and the day was beautiful. White Washington was annoyed and inconvenienced so they disappeared from the streets and left the City to the troops, the police and the pilgrims. Negro Washington applauded and wore smiles as broad as their faces. As busload after busload streamed through the Negro sections there were waves and applause from the people and the sight reminded one of the greetings received by liberating Allied armies of World War II. An aged white haired dark skinned woman waving and blowing kisses heralded the advance of this Gentle Army. White Washington was not present because it knew the meaning of this liberating horde. They came for Freedom and Jobs.

The police preparations were immense, for the law enforcement agencies were faced by a huge army heavily armed with picnic baskets, thermos jugs and unquenchable faith accompanied by their fierce allies—their children, mothers, grandmothers; their uniforms—white shirts, ties and their frightening battle hymns were We Shall Overcome and Freedom. This army had more chaplains, Negro and white Protestant, Catholic and Jew, than any other battle force ever amassed. the chaplains had instilled into this army's heart that the Lord was on their side. Washington's police force believed that the Lord was on

Cont. Next Page

A Message from Lord Russell

Dear Friends,

I enclose a statement which I wrote for the occasion of the March on Washington. I hope that you will be able to make some use of it.

Yours sincerely,
Bertrand Russell

---

The treatment of the American Negro is an atrocity which has a history of three hundred years in what is now the United States of America. The number of Negroes who have died through torture, lonely murder and systematic maltreatment in this period without doubt is in excess of those killed by the Nazis in the course of their unparalleled barbarism in Europe. More than this has been done to the American Negro. He has suffered an experience of systematised terror in which he could, and indeed can today in many parts of the United States, be shot down at will. In the South he is subjected to what amounts to slave labour and a peonage system; in which he is told he "almost got out of debt" when it comes time to receive his pay. A casual glance can send him to the gas chamber. The Negro has had to experience depravity shown him not on one occasion but over many generations. I have heard Negro music, and if there need be an indictment of the experience of the Negro in the United States, it is contained in its lyrics and its mood.

A nation which can commit this crime is unhealthy. The crime against the Negro is the price paid not only for brutality. It is the cost of America's indifference. This indifference is the most serious indictment of all. I am convinced that the March on Washington is a turning point in the history of the United States. The Negro in the United States is on the move, and he will not stop. The meaning of this is that the values and the practices which have formed the United States over three hundred years are being fundamentally challenged. This March is the real emancipation proclamation, and if it is to be implemented and if the United States is to be saved from the brutality which has both subjected the Negro and which now threatens mankind with obliteration, the March on Washington must lead to an end to indifference, to suffering and mass murder; in short, a revolution in the thinking and acting of Americans.

I, for one, am with you heart and soul. "Let my people go" was no parochial cry on behalf of a small nation. It was a cry for an end to barbarism and cruelty and the voice was for all mankind. So it is with you today.

Bertrand Russell
26th August, 1963

LIBERATOR supporters at the March on Washington. Staff members shown are Carlos Russell (standing third from right), Clebert Ford (standing far right), Dan Watts (kneeling center) and Leroy McLucas (kneeling far right).

the side of the man with the most cannon so they came well armed just in case the good humored, smiling, middle-class oriented group remembered what indignities they had suffered. A quarter of a million showed up; TV and newspapers could only find 200,000. To admit that 250 thousand showed up would be giving their protest more impetus (a smashing victory). (One speaker jubilantly declared, "I told them you would be here - they didn't believe me.") This was a predominantly Negro group. There was (charitably) about 15% white participation, whose presence and assistance was duly acknowledged and acclaimed. Let's not ask who's in the vanguard of the fight for the Negro (or rather America's rights) after this show. However, A. Philip Randolph said afterward, "But the Negro cannot win the fight alone no more than the Jew or labor leader could win his fight alone. We need allies." This gentle army came for Freedom and Jobs.

The pilgrims were most considerate; they didn't display the victims of the system - the winos - the dope peddlers - the pool sharks - the failures - the unemployed - the uneducated and the undereducated. America didn't have to face its victims or maybe the victims were cleaned up for their TV appearance. They just couldn't face a nationwide audience with the scars of the treatment they had received (America is squeamish that way!).

One group of victims did show, however, a tiny embattled group from Mississippi, whose very presence brought back memories of the survivors of the Belsen concentration camp at the end of World War II. As they marched along Constitution Avenue spontaneous cheers rose for those heroic champions of the right to live. Somehow they had escaped past the cotton barrier and were showing how much they loved America, the America as she ought to be. These gentle giants would go back to their free prisons and struggle for rights guaranteed by the laws of the land.

The multitude soon dispersed in very orderly fashion to the four corners of the nation. As they left this army stood straighter, walked taller and their countless supporters who followed the proceedings back home felt prouder. From Los Angeles to Long Island the Negro population paused in spontaneous pride at its accomplishment. They left their debris, picked up their wounded (sun stroke, fainting, car sickness, twisted ankles), picked up their empty picnic baskets and jugs and departed. They had come to appeal to the American conscience for Freedom and Jobs.

Some of the youthful were dismayed - they wanted the Freedom and Jobs. They had come to the commencement thinking it would be a demonstration or a march but contrary to newspaper accounts they were not there to provoke violence. That would have been as unthinkable as hollering and screaming in church. If violence had developed, local toughs might have precipitated the trouble because they were not intimidated by the solemn shrines of the nation's Capitol. By 11:30 A.M. even the roughest must have realized that this would be a different day. As the young militants boarded the buses they wondered what had happened to Freedom and Jobs.

Results of Commencement Exercises

1. Negroes graduated with honors showing proper respect for the shrines. Negro morale was raised 1000%, for these lost citizens and their allies had done something no other group had done. White morale was down 1000% because whites wanted a demonstration of unreadiness to share in America.

Cont next page

2. If there was a hero it was John F. Kennedy, for he had endorsed the activity. Further, he had shown how to handle peaceful demonstrations by permitting constitutionally guaranteed rights to be exercised. These demonstrations are a safety valve, only if the valve is tampered with does there exist any threat to law and order, and the danger that more than concessions may have to be made to the demonstrators.

3. The class valedictorian eloquently spoke of the future and clearly enunciated what should be the dreams and hopes for the future of all Americans.

4. America was given a bit longer to pay off the debt but was served notice that the debt will have to be paid—to wit: Negroes gave America the rainbow sign. They want payment or the fire next time.

5. The title "Negro Revolution" may be eye catching and spur the sale of magazines and newspapers but this is not a Revolution; it's an American Reformation - change within the framework of the American community, utilizing established means and seeking ends which the society allegedly endorses for all its members.

6. Even to a cynic, this pilgrimage (or commencement exercise) was a profound expression of Negro faith in America and the American dream. This was the strongest feature and thereby hangs the question that history alone can answer: Is this faith of the Negro misplaced?

But what about the appeal to the nation's conscience for Freedom and Jobs? This statement assumes that this nation has a conscience; yet, no less a moralist than Pope Pius XII once said that modern man has lost the power to recognize sin (right from wrong). Does a nation that thinks in terms of the fast buck, misleading advertising and sloganeering have a conscience? Is it a sign of our conscience when internationally our slogans are anything we do is good, worthwhile and expedient and everything Communist Russia or China does by definition is wrong, sinful and evil?

If there were a conscience would it have been necessary to march? Would not that conscience have been moved by Emmett Till, Trumbull Park, the Little Rock Nine, Meredith at Mississippi, lines of unemployed, the children of Chicago's garbage littered South Side? The truth is - to this day the conscience of America still develops screaming idiots like the teen-agers of Folcroft, Pennsylvania (destroyed a Negro home two days after the march). What conscience - silent, frightened, afraid to choose right for fear of losing status or friends or MONEY.

Freedom - what's that? Black America knows and dreams of freedom because it lives under economic, cultural, political and social tyranny. To white America its symbol is the dollar sign, its meaning is just the absence of visible restraints. White America has been propagandized into believing that it is free and therefore cannot recognize the real chains it wears.

"Why, everyone is free in America except the niggers and when you think that they are better off than any other black people you can excuse our slight imperfection." To admit Negroes are not free is too overwhelming. It's like saying some of the things I got, I didn't get fair and square or "my folks cheated colored kids so I could get a good education." This none dare admit. How is any man free in a conformist society; in a hypocritical society, in a double dealing, false society, in an undemocratic manipulative society?

Jobs - James Reston on Wednesday, August 28, 1963, the day of the Pilgrimage, wrote: "The jobs part of it may prove to be tougher in the end than the freedom; for the Negro leaders are not only asking for equal opportunity but for preferential treatment on jobs." Tougher than freedom, mind you. Further quote from Mr. Reston: "In July there were 3,382,000 whites unemployed in this country and 939,000 Negroes. In other words, the Negro unemployed percentage was over double the white - 11.2% to 5.1 and in some cities, Chicago for example, the Negro unemployed were over 17%." Read the Nation - (5/11/63) - Robert Theobald's article "Abundance" predicts the future. "Unemployment rates must therefore be expected to rise in the sixties. The unemployment will be concentrated among the unskilled, the older worker and youngster entering the labor force. Minority groups will also be hard hit. No conceivable rate of economic growth will avoid this result." That's right, the problem is not getting better; it's getting worse, and there is no agreement within the Kennedy Administration or in Congress about what should be done. Training even in formal education is in such chaos that schools will continue to turn out poorly prepared Negro youth for some time to come. Labor is most happy that everyone is talking about full employment first as a way to meet the Negroes' demand for employment. Guess why? Try hard, now.

An appeal to National Conscience for Freedom and Jobs. The slogan itself has a deeply rooted moral conviction which gives rise to the question how relevant is religion actually in American life? Fred Cook in the "Corrupt Society" has said: "There are those who argue that the racket society (this one) must remain invincible until man as an individual has a change of heart through religion. Yet we are today living in an age of what passes for religious revival. There are more churches, more converts, more pastors pleading for the moral life than ever before. The result is Billie Sol Estes, pillar of his own church. Perhaps religion demands an austerity of spirit that does not comport with an age of abundance."

James Reston, on the other hand, feels that if one-half of the persons who listened to their preachers and believed them on this business of racial equality took the time to write their representatives in Washington then the political balance or racial equality would be transformed.

Freedom and Jobs - Good slogan but the pilgrims came back from Washington emptyhanded. If you can't put anything in his hand, put it in his heart, raise his eyes and hopes if you can't raise his position. Because there is no Conscience - no Freedom - fewer Jobs.

A sobering reappraisal of the so-called March would lead one to a more balanced view of what happened and why. It was neither a complete triumph nor a complete bust. The future will help place the event in its proper perspective. Remember, this is no time for idle daydreaming but cold hard thinking, planning and watching.

Anybody for another bus ride about 1965? This time we'll go down to Washington for Jobs and Freedom.

LIBERATOR Advisory Board Members Ossie Davis (above) and James Baldwin (below) participated in the March. Davis was master of ceremonies for the pre-march program and called for a minute of silence in Honor of Dr. DuBois after announcing the news of his death in a moving speach to those assembled at the Washington Monument.

Dick Gregory

Speaks His Mind

Clebert Ford

(Ed. Note - On the day this article was written, Dick Gregory was in the House of Correction in Chicago, Illinois, having been arrested with his wife on disorderly conduct charges in connection with a CORE demonstration against the use of mobile classrooms in overcrowded school districts in the predominantly Negro south side of Chicago. CORE had charged that these "Willis Wagons," named after Chicago School Superintendent Benjamin Willis, perpetuated racial segregation. Gregory was arrested once, released without charges, and then rearrested when he returned to the scene of the demonstration. At the police station Gregory said, "I don't want any bail, I intend to stay here. As long as I have breath left in me I will continue to fight for freedom and first class citizenship for Negroes." Gregory remained in jail for approximately two weeks and was released in late August.)

---

Chicago, Illinois: Dick Gregory is a man possessed. It is impossible to come away after talking with him with any other impression. Dedicated, sincere, determined, Gregory seems to have but one mission in life—the gaining of complete freedom for the black man in America. Our meeting was relatively brief yet quite informal. Having participated with Mr. Gregory on a local television program I had some idea of his personality, but I could not help being impressed further by his knowledgeable, candid responses.

It was late afternoon when I arrived at University Apartments, a modest inter-racial housing development in the Hyde Park section of south Chicago. Gregory ushered me into an extremely well furnished apartment that initially gave the appearance of a baggage checking center for a Railway Express Agency. Commenting on the luggage that was neatly "strewn" about the living room, Gregory said that this was the usual state of things recently what with his being on the road so often. "That's the way I always am," he said. I couldn't help but notice the many trophies, plaques, and citations that were displayed in the room. Playboy Magazine's "Owl" award, a plaque from the Better Boys Foundation, an NAACP citation, and other commendations from various civic, social and religious organizations. On the bookshelves that were tastefully placed around the walls I could see such titles as Baldwin's "The Fire Next Time," Lerone Bennett, Jr's "Before the Mayflower," and "The Ebony Cookbook."

Our conversation wandered over many areas, and yet as relaxed as Gregory was one could sense this man's truly profound involvement in the matter of the American Negro's quest for freedom. "The Negro made himself over from his head to his toes for the white man," he said, "he put on shoes, he put on clothes, he even grew a mustache to hide his thick upper lip, bleached his skin, processed his hair, got an education, and 'Charley' still laughed at him. That's why he's out there in the streets, man." When I asked him what he thought about the method of non-violence as a means of protest, Gregory said, "It's a beautiful thing, man. Non-violence is a matter of definition. What may be non-violent to a cat from up north is violent to the next cat. To the southern Negro who left town by the hundreds when a Negro was lynched in the 1920's marching down town for a demonstration nowadays is as violent as hell." Gregory said that the northern Negro would probably resort to other "means" of protest. Of the northern Negro, particularly the New York Negro, Gregory becomes quite concerned. Speaking in an intense whisper, his speech dotted with the colloquial "man," "cat," and "baby," he said, "Man, that cat lives two blocks from downtown where the man makes all the big decisions and he still don't know nothing. The Chicago Negro on the other hand is a real hustler." He continued, "In New York most Negroes live in one slum—Harlem. In Chicago the Negro is all over the city. He made the man take him everywhere—north, south, east, west." At this moment Mrs. Gregory came in from shopping with their two lovely daughters, perhaps two and five years of age. Mrs. Gregory handed him the day's mail and after looking at several letters, Dick suddenly said, "Man, this is a hate letter." When asked how he was able to tell without opening the letter, he said, "I receive a whole lot of them in the course of a week, sometimes a thousand, baby, and I can tell." I asked him if he received any from Negroes. "Some of them are from Negroes," he answered, "but more than likely his boss was looking over his shoulder dictating it." Gregory also said that he sometimes gets mail from a white person who tries to disguise himself as a Negro. "But they always give themselves away by using the term 'you people' somewhere in the letter."

Dick Gregory giving a piece of his mind to the Marchers on Washington before the formal program began.

Our conversation then shifted to Gregory's recent engagement at New York's Apollo Theatre where this writer had heard that he used the term "nigger" in reference to Negroes throughout his act. "The white man had a guided missile in the word 'nigger.' I planned to destroy this weapon by exploding the use of the word," Gregory said. "A white man in California could call a Negro in New York on the telephone and almost destroy him by calling him a 'nigger.' I introduced it in my act by telling a story in which I am the first Negro to move into a particular white neighborhood. I tell the audience that I myself put on a white sheet, and throw rocks at my own windows shouting 'nigger! nigger! nigger!' —thus beating them at their own game. After this I began to use the term more often."

Returning to the revolution, Gregory said, "This thing is also a revolution of television. Television is on the streets, man. Looking at television we saw what we were missing—how much had been kept away from us. 'Charley' didn't know what he was doing when he let us have TV."

There were other topics of discussion that afternoon. We spoke of the Black Muslims of which Gregory reserved press comment. Of Rev. Martin Luther King he said, "Rev. King made history, baby, because the Negro man for the first time committed himself to the defense of his wife and children. Seeing television reports and newspaper pictures of Negro women and children being mistreated by southern white policemen in those peaceful demonstrations made the Negro man for the first time stand up and firmly state that he would physically defend his wife and family should they be faced with dogs, water hoses, or angry white cops." I mentioned James Meredith and Gregory immediately said, "History was made here too; for the first time the Negro on the corner could identify with the idea of going to college." Finally, the coming March on Washington, D.C.— "Yea, I'll be there. Greatest thing would be 20,000 cars and buses all going to D.C., baby."

During our brief meeting I was able to observe a somewhat different person than Dick Gregory, new "Negro" comedian, but Mr. Dick Gregory, a man who was quite seriously involved in a fight in which he was willing to give the ultimate. I could discern no ulterior motives, no publicity gimmicks or political aspirations. No, here was Dick Gregory, a black man who also happens to be an entertainer and happens to be particularly concerned with the treatment of all black people in these United States. And not any special group, emergent middle class or otherwise, but every black man and woman in America. Dick Gregory's understanding of the implications and ramifications of the so-called "problem" is something to wonder at. Gregory is a man of the people. His sympathy and identification with the "cat on the corner" should serve as an example for every Negro regardless of his economic, political or intellectual status. Fortunately, we may not all be "cats on the corner," but no one of us can be free until every "cat" on every corner in America is free. Thanks to the likes of Dick Gregory that time may be a lot sooner than some of us think.

The New Afro-American Writer

Rolland Snellings

I recently wrote a poem, "Cry Freedom," which appeared in the May issue of LIBERATOR Magazine. Its importance lies not in aesthetic excellence, but in the fact that it brings to light a generation of militant young people previously "invisible" to contemporary American society: the new nationalists or "Africanists" as dubbed by certain "Negro" publications—because of ethnic identity with Africa, its peoples and cultures.

These young militants are typical of the educated nationalists who have led colonial peoples to nationhood since the Second World War. Prior to the emergence of the "Africanists," black nationalism was confined to the socially rejected, poorly educated members of the ghetto—the black working class. Much of this is apparent in the "Nation of Islam" movement of Elijah Muhammad which has currently held the spotlight for militancy and radicalism within the black community. This fact has long been the main argument of opponents of this philosophy. Judging from the present situation, they will certainly be forced to re-examine their criticism.

I contend that black nationalism has come of age at last. Here one will find no gravel-voiced demogogue haranguing the masses. Here one will find no fascistic buffoonery prancing the streets in multi-colored plumes and peacock feathers to grace the pages of such outstanding novels as "Invisible Man" by Ellison, and "Lawd Today" by Richard Wright. These young people are mainly a thoroughly educated, politically sophisticated group—destined to play an increasingly dominant role in Afro-American affairs.

* * * * *

Now, a slight outline of the development of this latest phenomenon. Its roots go back to the dynamic and controversial Garvey Movement of the early twentieth century. Many of the same slogans and attitudes of racial salvation and elevation of the African Image have come down to the "Africanists" of the present era. For example: "Buy Black" (emphasizing support of black business), "Africa for the Africans at Home and Abroad," "Up you mighty race, you can accomplish what you will," "A race without a past is a race without a future," etc.

Usually when these young, middle-classed people become socially "aware" or "race-conscious," they immediately join the usual civil rights action groups which receive national attention. While working within these organizations their growth and development continue. As they become increasingly militant, they seem to become more "race conscious," thereby conflicting with the white "liberal" leadership. Such questions as "Wouldn't it benefit black people to learn African history?" "Why don't we give courses in it?" are met with the cold "liberal" charge of "black chauvinism." Similar questions about the white "leadership" also merit a similar charge. Finally, these young people get "fed up" with slow courts, paternalism, and the dignity-crushing tactics of non-violence and decide to go it alone.

While sympathizing with the Muslims, many disagree with the religious doctrine and rigid discipline of the movement. They also note the emphasis upon "Arab culture" rather than black African culture. Suspended between Islam and the civil rights organizations, they stubbornly grope for a militant solution within the vacuum created by the two. Now, triumphantly, out of this vacuum the Afro-American freedom societies are emerging. Rejecting the cliche that "Negroes" are "citizens denied their rights," the "Africanists" boldly state that black people are a subject people colonialized within a European society instead of their own homeland. Hence the rise of nationalism which connects them with the masses of oppressed people all over the world. Operating upon these premises, they are upsetting the "responsible 'Negro' leadership" throughout the nation.

* * * * *

For some strange reason, the "name" Afro-American writers of the past and present have refused to consider nationalism as a possible solution to the American racial situation; and even go to extremes to insult all nationalists with the distorted imagery of psychopathic fanatics representing the nationalist idea. Why this out and out abuse; this derisive slander through creative prose? Why this stain upon an idea which has led to the freedom and nationhood of three-quarters of the world's population?

Only the outstanding writer, James Baldwin, has shown any understanding of the nationalistic philosophy as forwarded by the Muslims. In his famous essay, "The Fire Next Time," though he disagreed with Elijah Muhammad (while defending racist America with luke-warm arguments) he at least gave a fair portrayal of a section of nationalism.

Why does nationalism seem to disturb and frighten the white applauded "Negro intellectuals" and self-appointed "spokesmen of the race"? Could it be a basic misunderstanding of nationalism? Or could it be a lack of confidence, and self-hatred resulting from a deeply imbedded inferiority complex that twists and erodes the psyches of these remarkably talented individuals?

Whatever the answer may be, it is highly advisable that the "name" writers re-examine and re-evaluate their ideas concerning nationalism and take note of its spread among the black masses in this country. It is a sad thing to watch writers fall behind the pulse-beat of their time. A militant new generation has arisen. Truly Garvey's "cubs in the woods" have become majestic lions of the valleys and plains.

Rebellion or Revolution?

Part One of Three Parts

Harold Cruse

For the first time since the 1930's Americans of more than ordinary social insight are openly discussing the possibility of social revolution in the U.S. We know that during the 1930's "revolution" implied the overthrow of capitalistic institutions—a real threat which the more enlightened wing of American bourgeois wealth successfully defeated by the implementation of the various New Deal policies. But unlike the 1930's, when it was reported that some of the idle rich were so fearful of revolution that they had their yachts readied in the harbor for a fast getaway just in case, the talk of "revolution" today has little to do with conflicts in labor-capital relations or the imminent collapse of the capitalist system. It has to do with the present state of American race relations which some people (hopefully or fearfully) describe as the "Negro revolution."

There is no need to mention the obvious—that the racial crisis reflects broad and profound discontent within the American Negro minority. However, when one goes so far as to say that this racial discontent contains the seeds of social revolution in America this immediately calls up a flock of other questions concerning the present outlook of the American state of mind which, when considered side by side with a possibility of a "Negro revolution", has a very sobering, if not disturbing, effect on such speculations. Without a doubt it must have the influence of such considerations which prompted President Kennedy to counsel, some time ago, a propos the racial question, that the "revolution" be a peaceful one.

Considering the social, historical and political background of 20th century revolutions thus far, the talk about "Negro revolution" also demands that all segments of the Negro movement in America be examined very closely. In doing so, we will note that none of the leadership corps of any segment, be it the NAACP-King-CORE-Students-Urban League-Muslims, etc., is anti-capitalist. The same can generally be said for the followers of these leadership factions. If the Negro movement, then, is "revolutionary," it must be revolutionary in a sense which is uniquely different from the characteristics and aims of all other revolutions of our century.

The speculations about the "Negro revolution" have also inspired the usual suspicions that the integration movement is Communist inspired. In answer to such charges one could again point to the very conservative and loyal pro-capitalist sentiments of Negro leadership. But still this would not explain very much about the "Negro revolution." We know very well that Communists and other Marxist factions, such as Trotskyites, Independent Socialists, etc., are very much in support of the Negro movement in one way or another. One has only to read the Marxist oriented press to see this. The truth is, however, that the Marxist factions are trailing very eagerly behind the Negro movement in search of issues for their programs. Marxists are no longer able, as they once were, to initiate any movements among Negroes. Moreover, what is not generally understood by those who raise the issue of "Communism" is that the integration movement, by its very nature, has rendered the Marxist movement superfluous and irrelevant since Marxists qua Marxists are not needed in the integration struggle. The character of the integration struggle cuts the ground from under Marxist parties since they cannot beat the NAACP or CORE at their own game nor can Marxist theories about revolution cope with a Negro movement that is pro-capitalist to the extent of demanding no more than an equitable share of the abundance of capitalist democracy. Yet, people express the feeling that there is a revolution in the air. There is a tenseness abounding as reports of racial strife become more and more a common occurrence. Instinctively we sense that America is preparing itself for great social changes of some kind and the idea of "revolution" is the first that comes to mind. But to conjure up the idea of "Negro revolution" under the present conditions in America also calls for a definition or redefinition of what one means when one says "revolution" or "revolutionary" because in highly industrialized America it is not possible to use such terms as freely as one could in describing social conditions in, let us say, Latin America and still make sense.

People who loosely use the phrase "Negro revolution" are unwittingly adding fuel to the flames of racial crisis which can lead to

Cont. on p. 16

DuBois, an African Prophet

from The Ghanaian Times

A whole race mourns the death of William Edward Burghardt DuBois—the millions of Africans scattered over the continents and islands of North and South America, and the many more millions on the continent of Africa to which he returned as an old and honored pilgrim to the shrine of his ancestors.

He chose to die in Ghana, where his greatest disciple, Kwame Nkrumah, accorded him the shelter and honor which a great teacher and prophet always merits and seldom receives.

He chose to die as a citizen of Ghana, among a people whom he loved and by whom he was beloved. But Dr. DuBois was not a sentimentalist to be carried away by emotions. He became a Ghanaian citizen to symbolize his return to Africa; to do honor to a country where Pan-Africanism is the highest form of patriotism; to record his solidarity with a society striving towards socialism.

W.E.B. DuBois was a humanist, a Pan-Africanist and a socialist. In Ghana, he saw the first dawn of the new day he wanted for the whole of Africa and for the whole of the human race.

He died knowing that the final battle for civil rights for all Afro-Americans was being joined in the land of his birth, the United States. He died knowing that the Charter of Addis Ababa had vindicated the labors of his lifetime to unite the African race.

The March on Washington and the Addis Ababa Charter are his memorials. Every milestone in the liberation of Africans all over the world will be engraved with the name of William Edward Burghardt DuBois.

A mighty tree has fallen. Dr. W.E.B. DuBois, the father of Pan-Africanism, is dead at the age of 96. The great Afro-American scholar has died at his home in Accra in the independent Africa he had done so much to help create.

William Edward Burghardt DuBois was many things: philosopher ...historian ... poet ...visionary. But, above all else, he was a warrior who dedicated the whole of his genius to the struggle for Truth and Justice.

Those two words, Truth and Justice, were not abstract terms to Dr. DuBois. He was never an ivory tower scholar with his head in the clouds.

Born a black man in the racialist American society, he grappled all his life with the affairs of humanity, bringing clarity where there was confusion, bringing courage where there was cowardice, bringing light where there was darkness and despair.

Dr. DuBois dreamed and wrote and fought for a free and independent Africa more than 60 years ago when Europeans took it for granted that our continent was their playground for capitalist exploitation.

At the turn of the century Dr. DuBois attended the first Pan-Africanist Congress ever held, and he was principally connected with each succeeding Pan-Africanist Congress, including the Fifth Congress in Manchester, England, in 1945.

This historic conference was attended by many of today's African heads of state, including our own illustrious President, Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, who was appointed Secretary-General.

Dr. DuBois died when Afro-Americans and their African brothers and sisters were preparing a civil rights demonstration around the American Embassy in Accra, a demonstration to support the massive March on Washington taking place at this time.

In a tragic sense, this is especially fitting for a man who contributed tremendously to the struggle for the liberation of the black man in Africa and in the Americas.

He was a founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the oldest and most distinguished of the civil rights organizations in the United States.

But he was a man who never stopped growing; his vision looked over the horizon. He never wanted his people to be simply like white Americans. He fought for a revolutionary America which would be a progressive force throughout the world.

This world distinguished scholar was arrested as a foreign agent by the American Government in 1951 because he was the chairman of a peace organization. At the age of 83 he went to jail, still fighting for truth and justice.

But the outrage of the working peoples and intellectuals of the world forced the American courts to free him. He wanted to die in Africa and last year he became a citizen of independent Ghana.

We shed no tears for Dr. DuBois. How can we even properly mourn for him? For his entire life was a triumph without any parallel in history; his 96 years was a magnificent victory over reaction and unreason. He died a socialist in the socialist Africa which he had helped to create.

To Africans only his physical self is dead. His genius, his spirit and his work remain alive in all of us who were privileged to live in the same century with him.

CARTY

An Afro-Cultural Center in L.A.

Frank Greenwood, kneeling far right, Chairman of the Afro-American Cultural Center Committe, and several members of the organization in front of a mobile display before starting a door to door canvass publicizing classes in Afro-American history.

Joining the swelling movement of black Americans seeking to advance their own cause, is the Afro-American Cultural Center Committee of Los Angeles, California.

The group was organized by Frank Greenwood, actor, director, and playwright, who saw the desperate need of the black artist to have a building with a stage and other facilities for the artist, writer, dancer, musician, etc. Talented black artists are frustrated and thwarted in their efforts to create honestly and truthfully when they use their own people as the theme and subject of their work. The white owned mass media of communication force the Afro-American artist to compromise his talents and abilities to please the white power structure.

Greenwood's battle was joined by school teachers, students, artists, businessmen, housewives, pullman porters, etc., who enlarged upon the idea to include the aspirations and needs of all Afro-Americans. They pointed out the crying need of the Afro-American to establish centers similar to those of the Jewish, Korean, Japanese and Polish people who use these centers to unify their people through the teaching of their own culture and history and gain pride and respect that can only come through self-knowledge. Now, the AACCC's objective is to build a center that can be used to give concerts, plays, art exhibits, etc., and also to have forums, classes in saleable skills, good grooming, Afro-American history, family budgeting, etc.

To reach its objective the group decided the best way to do so would be to ACT, not talk, to hurl itself into worthwhile cultural activities.

The group's first cultural project was a community-wide handicraft exhibit to show the creativity of the Afro-American in all walks of life. The exhibit was held outdoors at the Vernon Library on the east side, the heart of the Black Belt. The activity not only displayed the creativity of community members but helped focus attention on the Vernon Library which was in danger of being closed because of lack of use by the community. The library's future is now safe, however, and the committee feels that it played a small part in its salvation.

The next activity was New Songs, a showcasing of the song writers in the Afro-American community. The response was overwhelming. Dozens of song writers submitted songs and the general high quality was astounding. Many publishers and recording companies were invited but only a few came to the show. One songwriter, however, did obtain a contract with a song publisher, and many of the other songwriters were encouraged by the committee's efforts on their behalf.

Sharing his skills and abilities, a business owner and ace salesman of the committee volunteered to conduct free sales classes for community persons who are in this profession. Automation and growing unemployment have struck the Afro-American harder than any other group in the country. This class is not only valuable to the unemployed but to Afro-American business persons and merchants who are hard pressed to compete successfully with the white merchants who control the economic life of most Afro-American communities. The class teaches the best and latest techniques of salesmanship.

The group's most recent activity was the setting up of summer classes in Afro-American history for the children who up to now have had no opportunity to learn of their history and contributions to world and American culture. The public schools don't teach this. Our chil-

Cont on p 16

Thru Women's Eyes

by Jeannette

I walked into a shop the other day and a beautiful woman shyly (here my attention strayed) approached me. Strangely two things happened at once. I saw long rows of exotic female frocks encased in cellophane — at the same time, "May I help you"..."Just browsing." Realizing that my answer was cryptic, my attention swung back to her. Madam was dressed in a striking black printed design of handwoven cotton. It had a boat neck-line; the sleeves were elbow length; about ten inches from the shoulder was a flat panel that ended in neat smocking across the front of the dress. Of standard length, it was lovingly all-weather, strongly reminiscent of the "Empire Look." Her sandals of lattice-designed black morrocan leather, with slender heels of clear lucite, were a stunning complement to her dress. She was an exciting accessory to the shop. She showed me several garments and told that they were all hand-made by a designer who specialized in creating modes to enhance the natural image of the Afro-American.

My interest fired, I continued to browse and found a showcase with exotic Zulu bead belts; rope beads of porcupine quill, mahogany, shell, bamboo, rosewood, enamel and acorn designs. Naturally, I couldn't resist the chance of owning some daring circular earrings and pin of stripped rosewood. How chic I looked and what a compliment to my skin tones.

Mr. James Davis, the proprietor, is an energetic, ambitious, purposeful and enthusiastic ball of fire. Through his efforts the Ntu Stop shop was opened about six weeks ago at 63 East 125th Street. Garments made and displayed at the Ntu Stop (pronounced "en-too") are original designs and imports from Africa. These designs are intended to create a fashion trend to enhance the image of the black woman, and to encourage a cultural concept of self. In essence, Mr. Davis desires to outfit his women with traditional African designs generally handwoven and acceptable to Western dress. An imaginary conversation may go like this: "My, what a lovely creation you're wearing. Is it a Dior or Givenchy?" "No, darling, this is an Ntu. He's the most."

Creations are made of several materials: raw silk, homespun cottons, (Egypt and Sudan) mohairs and cashmires. As I listened I felt good to know that the opportunity had at last arisen where the African in exile could attempt to produce his own market for his wares. Yes, I made an appointment to be outfitted in a design made to flatter me. May I state at this time that creations found at the Ntu Stop are priced for someone on a budget. In Mr. Davis' words: "We made an effort here to give elegance to America's tenth man." I daresay this is the first retail store of its kind. I don't know of any shop where the particular customer's needs are so charitably handled.

I forgot to mention, while talking to the saleslady, the most delightful aroma engulfed the room. "What kind of perfume are you wearing?" "This is an Ethiopian perfume. Let me tell you about it. It is made from an ancient Ethiopian formula. The base of the perfume is oil from the civet cat. The civet cat is indigenous to Africa. It seems that the civet is made angry and then sweats out an oil. Through some process these oils are taken and used as the base for a perfume. Would you believe that these oils are very expensive and sell for $500 an ounce." A tinge of pride circled down my back. It is good to hear a proprietor speak fluently about his wares. Did you know that you could shop on 125th Street? As one who loves the unusual, make the Ntu Stop a must on your next shopping spree. Remember when you shop at Ntu you shop for you, too!

Ntu Accessories...

AGENTS WANTED TO SELL The LIBERATOR

LIBERAL COMMISSIONS

Set Up Your Route Now!

Write To: LIBERATOR
Circulation Dept.
244 E. 46 Street
N Y 17 N Y
Call: YUkon 6-5939

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

SUBSCRIBE NOW

LIBERATOR
244 East 46th Street
New York 17, N.Y.

Enclosed find $..... for:

☐ Subscription to LIBERATOR, $3.00 per year

☐ Membership in LCA, $5.00 per year

☐ Contribution

Name.....

Address .....

Please make checks payable to: LIBERATOR

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

CULTURAL CENTER cont.

dren learn about the greatness of such slaveholders as George Washington and Thomas Jefferson but know little or nothing about Crispus Attucks and Frederick Douglass. To get the classes started the committee hired a sound truck, equipped it with a display of children's books dealing with Afro-American history and canvassed the neighborhoods for nearly a whole day. The members knocked on doors, used the sound truck, distributed literature on the committee and classes, and urged parents to enroll their children in the free classes. Many did. Classes were taught by members of the committee and were so successful that the committee plans to repeat them in the fall and also to start classes for adults. The committee also plans in the fall to start a campaign to get the public schools to include the black man's history in the textbooks.

Paul Coates, of TV prominence, heard about the group's works and had the chairman of the committee, Frank Greenwood, and his wife Vera, appear on KTTV before a west coast audience. Letters and telephone calls poured in from all over the state and many new persons have sought to join the committee. Caucasians who sought membership were politely told that the movement is a "do it yourself" project.

The group has even greater enthusiasm because of its exemplary aims and positive achievements and is confident of achieving its objective. They have many projects planned for the fall and they will soon apply for their charter. Then they will begin their fund raising campaign to buy a lot upon which to start building. The committee wants every brick and nail to be touched only by black hands, so that our people can gain the pride and self-respect that can only come through self-help. Impossible? Not at all. Booker T. Washington showed it could be done. So did Mary McCleod Bethune, and so did the many, many others of Afro-American history. Yes, it can and will be done because the Afro-American people will do it.

HAROLD CRUSE cont.

more racial chaos instead of racial solutions because such people are not helping to explain exactly what the Negro is up against in his struggle to win racial equality in America. Winning racial equality in America could very well require revolutionary methods, and very probably will, but then we will have to understand why a revolution and how could the Negro possibly make one.

The why and the how are important considerations because the racial crisis does lay down an indirect challenge to the American capitalist status quo while the Negro leadership, at the very same time, seeks integration into the status quo with no professed desire to alter it. This creates for the Negro movement a highly contradictory situation which is also a dangerous one. It is dangerous because Americans, of all people in the world today, are the least amenable to, adaptable to, or desirous of any far-reaching changes in their social structures. It is also dangerous because the Negro leadership has been instrumental in creating a situation which has implications far beyond its limited range of program. Taken as a whole Negro leadership does not measure up to the demands of the racial crisis - a crisis which developed because the Negro movement has now transcended the moderate limits established by the leadership.

The Negro movement represents an indirect challenge to the capitalist status quo not because it is programmatically anti-capitalist, but because "full integration" of the Negro in all levels of American society is not possible within the present framework of the American system. If this sounds categorically absolute one can only say that the time has come for blunt appraisals of reality: The United States cannot and never will solve the race problem unless Americans change the economic, political, cultural and administrative social organization of this country in various sectors. Any super-optimism concerning the race question based on a

CONT p 20

Letters To The Editor

Dear Editor:

"Won't You Reassure Me" is a great piece of writing and interpretation of solid thinking and analysis. The analysis of the liberal in the liberation movement is the big problem and the important question. If the liberation movement does not smoke out the opportunist elements in it at the very outset we will continue having more of "The American Way" and who needs that?

You mentioned James Baldwin's famous contention that all Negroes hate whites...this question I have argued about with many people and the reaction of most people (white or black) to what I feel is probably one of the most hopeful aspects of the relationship between black and white; and is a good barometer of the depth of the hypocrisy that marks our culture...In all relationships the most encompassing emotion toward another person (or persons) is predominantly LOVE or HATE. All the other feelings are lesser in quantity of feeling. BUT all feelings ebb and flow. We live in a society of exploitation and the white is the chief robber. He has the most and rules the whole society...if he doesn't hate (which could be argued, too) it is because he doesn't have to. He can concern himself with concealing his robbery (and he does) and part of that task is filling his subject with a great concern over the state of his emotional being...Take away the exploitation and BINGO, there is love replacing hate. The white man's hate is a much more complicated process and it would be much more difficult to treat him but Negro hate does not threaten the "best order" of what the white man "says" is the purpose of life.

At this very moment I am doing a lot of reading and research on the destruction of the Iowa Farmers Union by the National Farmers Union who collaborated with the "Right" and used Communists to redbait this powerful organization and its leadership. This organization was destroyed by its own parent organization—the National Farmers Union, who used the very same people they emasculated the Iowa Union for associating with. HERE IS A LEAF OUT OF MACHIAVELLI'S BOOK.

The liberation movement has the right as well as the responsibility to demand (above and beyond the call of duty to talk brotherhood) performance from its allies. The shameful past of many participants in the Negro struggle would not bear much scrutiny under the eagle eye of a conscientious advocate. It is insane to think that any man who lives off of a pattern of exploitation that works for him is going to voluntarily give the key away. The role of the U.S. left so far fits them for contributions of money—not brains or self-sacrifice, either. This is a matter of their record, not cynicism. If progress is to come the truth must be seen and told by its guardians. The time for "adventurism" is past. Let us fight for the future.

Again thanks for the fine presentation and documentation in the service of National and International understanding. You can feel very proud.

Viola Beeson
Des Moines, Iowa

Dear Editor:

Enclosed you will find my check for a subscription to the LIBERATOR magazine. I particularly enjoyed your editorial, Peace At What Price, and the excellent article by my old friend, Dick Moore, Criticism Is Not Anti-Semitism. Please accept my best wishes for your success.

Sincerely yours,
Cyril Briggs

Gentlemen:

I am writing to tell you how much I enjoyed reading your magazine. Although I have read only one edition (June, 1963) of the LIBERATOR, I found it very interesting. I especially enjoyed the article entitled "My Unwilling Brother." The LIBERATOR is one of the few "black" magazines that has been straightforward and frank in dealing with the plight of the black man in America. You have not, as many others have, "bitten your tongue" or "pulled your punches" for fear of hurting the white man's feelings or saying something which he might not like. I think your magazine has the potential of becoming one of the leading and outspoken publications in the fight for full freedom for the black man in Africa and America.

Enclosed you will find a check in the amount of three dollars ($3), which I believe is the cost of a one-year subscription to your magazine. Please start my subscription with the July, 1963 edition of the LIBERATOR. Keep up the good work and good luck.

Yours sincerely,
Robert Fluellen
Philadelphia, Pa.

An All Black Party

William Worthy

On August 28, 1963, during the March on Washington, the National Committee for a FREEDOM NOW PARTY distributed "The Declaration of Washington" to demonstrators.

A week earlier the domestic and foreign press had disclosed that the March would be the occasion for a call to form an all-black political party. The New York Times published a front-page story, and followed it up with an editorial, "Racism in Politics," criticizing the idea. Radio and television networks carried interviews with attorney Conrad J. Lynn, acting chairman of the Committee. On "Meet the Press" Roy Wilkins of the NAACP was asked for his opinion of such a party. Within a matter of days, tens of millions of people, here and abroad, learned that Afro-Americans were at long last striking out for truly independent political action.

For a long time, many black Americans have been concerned about the political blind alley that they are in. But after Birmingham, people everywhere began asking: "Where is our party? What are we doing in bed with "Bull" Connor (who is still the Democratic National Committeeman from Alabama)? Why haven't our leaders organized a party of our own? Even with the mass demonstrations we don't seem to be getting anywhere."

As late as the last part of the winter, realizing how strongly an all-Negro party would come under false and contrived attack, some of us thought that possibly a Freedom Now Party could be interracial. But as tensions grew, as the resentment of black citizens mounted over the failure of the Kennedys to protect Birmingham Negroes with federal troops, as white liberals began hailing the Birmingham settlement as a great victory, we came to realize that the masses of Afro-Americans would not join in an interracial movement that would be the political equivalent of CORE.

Then, the Establishment's alarmed reaction to the Party's announcement convinced us we were on the right track. One example: The Cleveland Plain Dealer, a conservative daily that ordinarily does not go in for yellow journalism, used the New York Times story on its front page and wrote an editorial entitled "This Is Not the Way." It resorted to the hoary device of quoting an "acceptable" Negro "leader" to discredit other Negroes with a new approach, in this case the local head of the NAACP. (Query to readers: What can be done about our so-called leaders who haven't yet learned to say "no comment" to whites who are transparently trying to use them? I suppose that every revolutionary movement in history has faced a similar problem, and I imagine that it has had to be dealt with eventually.)

Three days after the first of three Plain Dealer editorials, there was a front-page story on the departure of Cleveland marchers for Washington. One paragraph told of "several black-shirted" leaflet distributors from the new Freedom Now Party who had passed out literature to the marchers, but had not themselves boarded any of the buses for the trip. In just one short paragraph there were "several" lies -- two specific, one implied. There had actually been two distributors. One wore a dark green shirt; the other, a brown shirt. Both boarded one of the buses; I myself had dinner with them in Washington.

Then there was a second front-page smear in the Plain Dealer. The newspaper made use of files of Cleveland's Subversive Squad, to go into the personal histories of the two young men who had organized a local committee for a FREEDOM NOW PARTY. There was one political charge: an alleged admission by one to Sergeant John Ungvary of a past affiliation with the Labor Youth League. The other charges were arrests for disorderly conduct on civil rights picket lines and several criminal matters.

The officers of the National Committee met this first test head-on. In a letter to the Plain Dealer, Mr. Lynn took the position that the many petty crimes committed by Negroes are part of the pattern of revolt against an intolerable society. The new party is designed to be a constructive form of revolt, and it is just those men and women with backbone that are needed and wanted in the party. Above all, the white enemy would never be permitted to dictate the membership of the FREEDOM NOW PARTY. On that point and on other matters of principle not one inch would be conceded to the Right wing. The initial brochure said that "All blacks who wish to be free will be equal, and equally welcomed." That position will be strictly adhered to. There will be no Eastland Committee inside the FREEDOM NOW PARTY to screen membership applications in the interest of a respectable public "image." Someone once remarked that "the fear of appearances is the first symptom of impotence."

Only a party with no illusions about winning immediate and sweeping electoral victories is likely to take a principled position when the heat is applied. While there are prospects of victories in specific councilmanic, legislative and even possibly congressional districts in 1964, the politically sophisticated leaders of this movement see the new party, initially, as an instrument for forging racial unity, as a vehicle for putting forth a set of integrated demands, and as a means of carrying on a vast educational program about what is happening in this country and what damage U.S. foreign policy is inflicting on Africa, Asia and Latin America. As "The Declaration of Washington" points out, the new party "will concentrate the voting power of black America in a single organization that can deliver knock-out punches to the enemies of equality." For instance, some of the most important of our enemies are not the loud-mouthed Dixiecrats, but U.S. business interests who are the perpetrators of neo-colonialism abroad and who virtually dictate the State Department line on The Congo, South Africa, Cuba, Southern Rhodesia and oil-rich Middle East sheikdoms.

Atty. Conrad J. Lynn, Acting Chairman of the National Committee for a Freedom Now Party.

As the fledgling political movement undertakes this explosive task, it is going to need all available moral support from Africa and other parts of the world. To predict wholesale and wild smears, to anticipate local and federal efforts at repression and suppression is merely to recognize the potential threat that the party represents to vested racist, economic and political interests. President Kennedy's margin of victory over Richard Nixon in 1960 was fewer than 200,000 votes. In 1964, if Negroes turn in substantial numbers to the new party and if the party decides to run a Negro for president for the first time in United States history, one result could be the defeat of the President for re-election and the end of the entire Kennedy dynasty. If Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy is next in line for the Presidency, as is thought, and if, as Gore Vidal pointed out in Esquire magazine, he has a "dangerously authoritarian" personality, if he has far fewer scruples than even his brother and a vindictive streak in his makeup, a family defeat in 1964 will serve the future of this country. If "Bobby" realizes that Negro voters will punish him and the Administration for their derelictions in Birmingham, Oxford, Miss., and elsewhere, only the naive would expect him not to use the great powers of the Department of Justice to try to destroy the party and its leaders.

I regret to say that, with this prospect ahead, I personally would vote on just that ground alone to keep whites out of the party. There are other good practical and tactical reasons. But the sad truth is that of the thousands of whites whom I know, I can think of only a handful who would stand up to the bitter end when home, job, reputation, even freedom from imprisonment are imminently threatened. Negroes, however, have reached the point where they feel they have nothing to lose.

The new party leaders have already thrown down one gauntlet. On the morning after the March, Mr. Lynn led a delegation to the Department of Justice and staged a brief symbolic sit-in at the office of J. Edgar Hoover of the F.B.I. It is a sign of the times, and an indication of Negroes' potential power, that within five minutes he ushered us into an inner office to defend his wretched record in upholding constitutional safeguards for Negroes. Five years ago we probably would have been arrested for disturbing his peace. In view of Mr. Hoover's long immunity from criticism, the demonstration was almost like sitting in on the Pope.

Many tough problems of policy, strategy and publicity lie ahead. They must be argued out in numerous local action and study committees across the country. Educational material must be made available on a regular basis to the study groups. A balance has to be struck between informed and well-planned action, a program of long-range study and a plan for sound building of a principled political movement. My own feeling is that, if this party should founder, the militancy of the past spring and summer could easily turn into despondency and apathy and that it might be many years before Afro-Americans could again be roused to action.

The leadership wishes to avoid bureaucratization and dictation from the top. It would welcome the formation by every LIBERATOR reader of a study and action group of six to ten persons meeting regularly in homes, maintaining contact with other such groups in the same community, federating to form local committees for a FREEDOM NOW PARTY, and working towards a founding congress of the new party. The National Committee can, for example, send everyone a national survey of the practical problems facing a new party that seeks to get on the ballot in different states. Other literature and buttons are also available.

The address of the National Committee is: Suite 207, 81 East 125th Street, New York, N.Y. 10035; telephone: 212 MOnument 2-0618. Mrs. Pernella V. Wattley is corresponding secretary.

The end is in the beginning. The process itself is the actuality. If this movement starts off with sound principles, with a program adequate for the times, and with local and national leaders who will not cave in at the first offer of a pay-off or the first threat to bread and butter, it will end up with a record of very worthwhile accomplishments.

Seminar on AFRICAN and AFRO-AMERICAN CULTURES.

Eight Friday Nights
begining
Sept. 28 to Nov. 16, 1962
8:00 P. M.
AQUARIAN SPIRITUAL CENTER
BOOKSHOP LIBRARY
1302 West Santa Barbara Avenue
Los Angeles 37, California

HAROLD CRUSE cont.

lesser assessment or hope for a neo-liberalistic American revival is heartening but hardly realistic.

Is this the same thing as saying that in order to solve the racial crisis what is needed is a revolution? Again the question is: What do we mean by "revolution"? Social change in any society can be either "revolutionary" or "evolutionary" depending on what organizational methods are pursued and who directs the organizational methods. In the U.S. the capitalist system in all of its major and minor levels of economic administration is owned, controlled and directed by whites of various classes. Even white labor of the trade union type can be said to have a "stake" in white ownership of capital either by racial identification with the ownership class or membership in unions with a bureaucracy with a capitalist mentality to match its capital investments.

Racial discrimination growing out of the racist ideology of the dominant whites of the capital-labor alliance in America has traditionally excluded Negroes (both bourgeois and workingclass) from equal participation in either the industrial or trade union fields or administration in the capital-labor alliance. Hence, if the Negro movement is "revolutionary" or has revolutionary potential how could the Negro movement have the power, in and of itself, to enforce structural and administrative changes in this capital-labor combination in order to make room for the democratic participation of the Negro as an American equal? Essentially, this is what is implied in the word "integration" as projected by the Negro bourgeoisie or, at least, that portion of the "black bourgeoisie" that supports "integration." But since the "integration" program does not demand alterations in the structural forms of American society, and since the white capital-labor alliance does not desire such changes and would further cement their alliance to block such changes, and since the Negro movement must have such changes in order to achieve its aims - where does this leave the Negro movement? From this analysis - which admittedly is oversimplified for the purposes of illustration - we have to conclude that the Negro movement at this moment is not a revolutionary movement. It is not a revolutionary movement because it has no present means or program to alter the structural forms of American institutions. Hence, it is pure political romanticism, at this point, to call the Negro movement the "Negro revolution." It is more properly called the "Negro rebellion" against the American racial status quo.

But there is a great difference between "rebellion" and "revolution" - two conceptions which some people insist on confusing. This confusion is what led, for example, to the outcome of the situation in Monroe, North Carolina involving Robert Williams. The American Marxists of certain tendencies - and Marxists are incurable romantics - tried to make a "revolutionary" out of Robert Williams who was not a revolutionary but a rebel. The Monroe movement was but a small, local manifestation of the growing Negro rebellion which some Marxists and others mistook for the "revolution" in the making. One can say that the final outcome of the adventuristic happenings in Monroe was unavoidable due to the tense racial situation in America. Nevertheless, this does not excuse incorrect and superficial assessments to be applied to the Negro movement in whole or in part. A rebellion is not a revolutionary movement unless it changes the structural arrangements of the society or else is able to project programmatic ideas towards that end. Of the latter the Negro movement does not have, and in America neither arms, nor demonstrations, nor protest marches mean very much without such ideas.

The question that follows is: If, indeed, a revolution is required to achieve Negro aspirations of whatever class stratification in America how is it possible to change the Negro movement from a rebellion into a revolutionary movement? But again this is predicated on whether or not social changes to come in America will be revolutionary or evolutionary. This has not been determined as yet. It is a dialectical question. However, prior to making any rash, or let us say, unscientific predictions, let us get a clearer conception of the American capitalistic status quo and the American Negroes' relationship to that status quo.

Cont. next page

What all of us Americans, black and white, are facing today is a racial crisis which is, in part, the accumulated results of white liberal lying and dishonesty about race, caste and class in this country. On the other hand, it is due, in another way, to the superficial and intellectually empty racial propaganda projected over the years by Negro middleclass moderation policies on civil rights. The liberal New York Post which has for years been catering to the NAACP and later to Martin Luther King, Jr., was forced to admit, through Stan Opotowsky, one of its reporters, that the class of Negroes that revolted in Birmingham and transformed King's "orderly" protest movement into a race riot, had nothing to hope for, no benefits to anticipate from whatever integrated gains King's properly behaved passive protesters would achieve. The liberalism of the New York Post is very late admitting what many of us voiceless Negroes have been saying for years in criticism of white liberalism for catering to the aims and aspirations of the middleclass Negro. Belatedly the liberals have discovered a class of Negroes in Birmingham which Opotowsky described as "lost men." If these Birmingham disprivileged mavericks are "lost" then, verily, we are all lost - the majority of Negroes in America are lost because such Negroes cited by Opotowsky represent the majority. The majority of Negroes cannot be restrained or contained within the legalistic, gradualistic, passive-moderation approach any longer. Hence, the civil rights movement moved from NAACP protest to broad and general rebellion. It is a rebellion which cannot be put down; a rebellion which if not handled with the highest order of internal statesmanship will lead to racial and social chaos.

But Opotowsky came to the wrong conclusion about Birmingham's "lost men." While it is true that the integration movement offers the majority of Negroes very little, it is far from proving that the majority of Negroes are "lost," i.e., to social history and eternity. If we are that lost there is nothing left but to join the Muslims or some other like movement for "repatriation" or "separation." On the contrary, what the Negro rebellion is proving in its own, as yet, inconclusive manner is that the United States, the greatest and most advanced of the capitalist nations in the western combine, is not at all exempt or immune from the forces of social change that are sweeping the world today. Unhappily, this is a fact which American whites will find most difficult to comprehend. Americans think they are a very special and privileged people as they peer uncomprehendingly beyond their ocean beaches into a world wracked and seething with revolution, discontent and political turmoil. Americans have been lulled into a deluded fog of complacency by America's ability to maintain long-term stability. This expertly controlled stability is why there is so much perplexity, desperation, fear and resentment shown by whites all over the country as the Negro protest movement moves into open rebellion. These attitudes are but a reflection of the uncomfortable fact that America, at present, has no clear answers to the problems emerging out of the racial crisis. President Kennedy voiced this fact right after the Birmingham crisis when he said, "The fires of frustration and discord are burning in every city, North and South, where legal remedies are not at hand." This is the bitter truth which the NAACP et al could not admit. For to admit there is no "legal remedy" for "full integration" means that the integrationist leadership is out on a limb.

BLUES PEOPLE

Negro Music in White America

by LeRoi Jones

A penetrating and forthright examination of the philosophy of Negro music – a philosophy that is the product of "the consistent and evolving attitudes which made the black American exactly what he is."

Kenneth Rexroth calls this book: ". . . an original, novel and needed contribution to the ever-growing literature of jazz. . . . Mr. Jones differs from all other authors . . . He doesn't need to fall for the sentimental mystique of the majority of jazz critics—he is himself one of the realities the mystique can only reflect dimly and distortedly."

Langston Hughes—"He comes to some new and highly provocative conclusions."

$5.00 at your bookstore

WILLIAM MORROW & CO.
425 Park Avenue South, N.Y.C. 16

BOOK REVIEW

Blues People

BLUES PEOPLE: Negro Music in America, by LeRoi Jones. Morrow, $5.00.

BLUES PEOPLE is, essentially, a history—viewed through the large end of the telescope—of the Negro in America as evidenced by his music; it is in many ways a fine book (humorous, at times, in that special way Thelonius Monk's music is), and should be read by people who care about literature, by people who care about "Negro Music," and by that select few who care about both.

Mr. Jones develops, quite logically, the point that Negro music began with the blues (the immediate predecessors of the blues, the work songs, he defines as Afro-American music), and that "Blues is the parent of all legitimate Jazz." This is a very crucial point, a pivotal one even, for the thesis of the book is that "the most expressive Negro music of any given period will be an exact reflection of what the Negro himself is." And that by a "musical and a socio-anthropological scrunity something about the essential nature of the Negro's existence in this country ought to be revealed..." as well as something about the nature of American society as a whole.

It is an interesting thesis. And beginning with the work songs of the Afro-American, Mr. Jones traces the journey of the blues from New Orleans, to Chicago, and finally to New York; the landmarks of the trek being the works of Bolden, Oliver, Ma Rainey, Bessie Smith, Armstrong, Ellington, Basie, Parker, Gillespie, Monk, Rollins, Coltrane, and finally Ornette Coleman. Along the way, Mr. Jones points out the dubious role the black bourgeoisie has played in the development of Negro music, as well as the efforts of the supermarket culture to dilute Negro music; the former he condemns for their negative attitude towards Negro music, and their attempts to deny anything reminding them of their Negroness; the latter ("whose only strength lies in its ability to destroy itself and the rest of the world..."), he indicts for their unending battle to reduce Negro music to insipidness.

Nor does Mr. Jones belong to that school of Negro thought espousing the belief that the Negro's facility for playing Jazz lies in some innate quality the Negro alone possesses; rather he states that it is the Negro's experience in America, his philosophy and way of thinking about the world that made him the creator and innovator of Jazz; and the Negro's music "changed as he changed, reflecting shifting attitudes or...consistent attitudes within changed concepts."

BLUES PEOPLE is written with much force, and the reader must be exceedingly cautious lest he find himself overwhelmed by Mr. Jones' persuasiveness. Many times, as when Mr. Jones explains why a Benny Goodman, and not Basie or Ellington, was deemed the king of swing—or, the reasons Dave Brubeck's picture appeared on the cover of Time Magazine and not, say, Miles Davis'—the reader finds himself musing: "Ah Ha! Yea, I figured something like that was going on. So, that's what really happened!"

And yet, for all its power, BLUES PEOPLE raises a fundamental question: What is Negro music? Or more specifically, who can say with authority that the avant-garde Jazz played by Coltrane, Rollins and Ornette Coleman is THE Negro music, when the masses of Negroes are listening to the "expressive music" of Ray Charles, Sam Cooke and Jimmy Smith?

However, despite these reservations, it must be admitted that, in general, Mr. Jones is equal to the course he has charted for himself. BLUES PEOPLE poses basic questions about the nature of the society the Negro so urgently seeks to enter, and the disdainful manner in which that society has always viewed the artist. But then the reader will find the book worth its price if for no other reason than to find out what Mr. Jones means when he states that "...the young Negro musician of the forties began to realize that simply by being a Negro in America, one was a nonconformist."

Charles L. Russell

LIBERATOR Book Service

( continued from back cover)

FICTION

THE PREMIER, by Earl Conrad. This critical study of a fictional Black Nationalist leader raises vital questions for the Freedom Movement. (201)

DICK GREGORY FROM THE BACK OF THE BUS, by Dick Gregory. Humorous and moving book by one of the top entertainers in the U.S. 60¢ (202)

AN AFRICAN TREASURY, edited by Langston Hughes. Collection of top contemporary writings by Africans. 50¢ (203)

THE GODDAM WHITE MAN, by David Lytton. Shocking expose of South Africa's moral disintegration under the apartheid system. 60¢ (204)

ANOTHER COUNTRY, by James Baldwin. Remarkable best-selling novel set mainly in present-day New York. 75¢ (205)

GO TELL IT ON THE MOUNTAIN, by James Baldwin. Brilliant novel of growing up in Harlem. $1.45 (206)

AND THEN WE HEARD THE THUNDER, by John O. Killens. The new novel about black troops in World War II. By the author of YOUNGBLOOD. $5.95 (207)

THE GRAND PARADE, by Julian Mayfield. Novel about how the color problem affects all levels of society in a Southern town. $4.95 (208)

THE ANGRY BLACK. Collection of stories and articles by such authors as Ralph Ellison, Langston Hughes, and James Baldwin. 50¢ (209)

LAWD TODAY, by Richard Wright. This pre-Bigger Thomas novel published posthumously depicts one sordid day in the life of Jake Jackson, a postal clerk, and his three bridge playing, whiskey drinking, and women-chasing cronies. 60¢ (210)

SOMETHING IN COMMON, by Langston Hughes. A collection of short stories, thirty-seven in all, selected by the author himself. $1.75 (211)

THE BLACKS, by Jean Genet. An all-black cast dramatically challenges the complacency of white supremacy. $1.75 (212)

PURLIE VICTORIOUS, by Ossie Davis. An outrageous spoof of plantation stereotypes and customs. A movie has been made from this Broadway play. $1.25 (213)

AFRICAN VOICES, edited by Peggy Rutherford. A collection of fiction by new African writers. $1.45 (214)

A RAISIN IN THE SUN, by Lorraine Hansberry. The prize winning Broadway hit play about life in Chicago's black ghetto. 50¢ (215)

DOWN SECOND AVENUE, by Ezekiel Mphahlele. An autobiographical novel about life in Johannesburg by one of South Africa's prominent writers, who is now in exile. $1.25 (216)

BLACK BOY, by Richard Wright. Author's harrowing record of childhood and youth. 75¢ (217)

NON-FICTION

BEFORE THE MAYFLOWER, by Lerone Bennett, Jr. History of the Negro in America 1619 to 1962. Profusely illustrated. $6.95 (121)

THE STRANGE CAREER OF JIM CROW, by C. Van Woodward. Explains how segregation became a "sacred" institution only after being codified into State laws about 60 years ago. $1.50 (122)

JOHN BROWN, by W.E.B. DuBois. A new version of the classic study of America's most maligned martyr. Reviewed in March '63 LIBERATOR. $2.25 (123)

TO KATANGA AND BACK, by Conor Cruise O'Brien. Former commander of UN operations in Congo. Exposes neo-colonialist manoeuvering in UN Secretariat. Reviewed in March '63 LIBERATOR. $5.95 (124)

THE MYTH OF THE NEGRO PAST, by Melville J. Herskovits. A classic study of African cultural patterns surviving in the New World by a pioneer in this field. $2.45 (125)

THE NEGRO IN AMERICA, by Arnold Rose. The authorized condensation of Gunnar Myrdal's monumental study: An American Dilemma. $1.95 (126)

BLACK METROPOLIS (2 vols.), by St. Clair Drake & Horace Cayton. Revised edition of the famous study of black Chicago with incisive criticism of strife and life in northern cities. $2.45 each vol. (127)

THE BEST OF SIMPLE, by Langston Hughes. Hilarious yet piercing comments on the American panorama by the contemporary raconteur and poor man's philosopher, Jesse B. Semple. $1.65 (128)

AFRICA, HER HISTORY, LANDS AND PEOPLE, by John A. Williams. A short, well written and profusely illustrated history of Africa. Invaluable for teachers and parents. $1.95 (129)

THE EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION, by John Hope Franklin. Some historical misconceptions are exposed in this analysis of the reasons for and results of the Proclamation. $3.50 (130)

NOBODY KNOWS MY NAME, by James Baldwin. Already a big best seller by one of America's greatest writers. $1.65 (131)

AFRICA UNBOUND: REFLECTIONS OF AN AFRICAN STATESMAN, by Alex Quaison-Sackey. How Ghana's Ambassador to the United Nations looks at Africa and the world. $1.95 (132)

THE NEGRO REVOLT, by Louis E. Lomax. Picture of young and militant Afro-American world confronting the status quo approach of the established leadership. 75¢ (133)

BLACK MOTHER: THE YEARS OF THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE, by Basil Davidson. The African side of the story of the most shameful period in European history. $6.50 (134)

THE LOST CITIES OF AFRICA, by Basil Davidson. A history of Africa drawing on many recent and hitherto unpublished research findings. $6.50 (135)

LET MY PEOPLE GO, by Henrietta Buckmaster. The exciting and inspiring history of the Underground Railroad. $1.95 (136)

BLACK LIKE ME, by John H. Griffith. White man learns what it's like to live the life of an Afro-American - by becoming one. 50¢ (137)

RECORDS

ABBEY LINCOLN "STRAIGHT AHEAD" with Max Roach, Coleman Hawkins. $3.00 (401)

WE INSIST! FREEDOM NOW SU[illegible] ax Roach and Oscar Brown, [illegible] ey Lincoln, Coleman Ha[illegible] $3.00

OF GENERAL INTEREST

SEVEN DAYS IN MAY, by Knebel and Bailey. Bestseller about a military conspiracy to take over the White House. 95¢ (601)

LORD OF THE FLIES, by William Golding. No. 1 bestseller among quality paperbacks; first rate adventure and a parable for our times. $1.25 (602)

SHIP OF FOOLS, by Katherine Anne Porter. Celebrated novel dealing with a voyage in which all manner of human frailties are exposed. 95¢ (603)

FAIL SAFE, by Burdick and Wheeler. Thriller about mechanical failure in atom bomb-carrying U.S. plane patrol. 75¢ (604)

CATCH-22, by Joseph Heller. Satirical expose of the military mentality in World War II. 75¢ (605)

THE SANDBOX and THE DEATH OF BESSIE SMITH, by Edward Albee. Family selfishness and the death of a famous blues singer are the subjects of these moving plays. 60¢ (606)

THE UGLY AMERICAN, by Lederer and Burdick. Devastating novel about the failure of the U.S. State Department. 50¢ (607)

THE MANDARINS, by Si[illegible] Powerful novel by one of Franc[illegible] tentionalists. $2.45 (608)

THE STRANGER, by Albert Camus. One of his most powerful and thought-provoking works. $1.25 (609)

BOY, GIRL, BOY GIRL, by Jules Feiffer. Fine book by one of America's finest satirists. $1.50 (610)

CATCHER IN THE RYE, by J.D. Salinger. One of the all-time best-selling satires on American youth. 50¢ (611)

FANNY FARMER BOSTON COOKBOOK. Probably best known of all U.S. cookbooks. 95¢ (612)

CAN OPENER COOKBOOK, by Poppy Cannon. Cooking made easy; simple recipes for all cooks. 60¢ (613)

ART OF FRENCH COOKING, by F. Garvin. 60¢ (614)

COMPLETE BOOK OF ORIENTAL COOKING, by M. Waldo. 60¢ (615)

BABY AND CHILD CARE, by Dr. Benjamin Spock. The top bestseller of them all. 50¢ (616)

LIBERATOR Book Service

LIBERATOR BOOK SERVICE is a response to the numerous requests by LIBERATOR readers for material on African and Afro-American affairs. We have selected items of interest to our readers, but inclusion in the list does not imply editorial approval. We welcome suggestions for additions. To order, merely fill out the order form below and return with payment in full.

NON-FICTION

DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF THE NEGRO PEOPLE IN THE UNITED STATES, by Herbert Aptheker. Authoritative and comprehensive picture of the struggle of the Afro-American for the liberation of black America. Original documents. $2.25 (101)

THE SOULS OF BLACK FOLK, by W.E.B. DuBois. Classic statement of the history and aspirations of Black America by the dean of Afro-American letters. 50¢ (102)

100 YEARS OF LYNCHING, by Ralph Ginzburg. Our biggest seller to date -- a powerful and compelling book. 75¢ (103)

BLACK MOSES, by E.D. Cronon. Exciting and penetrating biography covering all aspects of the fabulous career of Marcus Garvey. $1.95 (104)

AFRICAN POLITICAL PARTIES, by Thomas Hodgkin. Timely reference book for understanding today's fast-moving developments in Africa. 95¢ (105)

DECISION IN AFRICA, by W. Alphaeus Hunton. Forthright condemnation of U.S. and European neo-colonial maneuvering in Africa. $1.85 (106)

FACING MOUNT KENYA, by Jomo Kenyatta. Anthropological study of the Kikuyu people by the father of Kenya nationalism. $1.45 (107)

NOTES OF A NATIVE SON, by James Baldwin. The author's collection of essays on the Negro struggle to live in America. $1.25 (108)

BLACK MUSLIMS IN AMERICA, by Eric Lincoln. Factual study of one of the most talked-about protest movements in the U.S. today. $1.75 (109)

I SPEAK OF FREEDOM, by Kwame Nkrumah. Collection of speeches by one of the great African leaders of our day. $1.95 (110)

SCOTTSBORO BOY, by Haywood Patterson. A true story of typical Southern "justice" and of the jungle conditions that prevail in Alabama prisons. 60¢ (111)

AFRICAN PROFILES, by Ronald Segal. A thought-provoking analysis of crucial issues in Africa sprinkled with snapshot biographies of its leading political figures. $1.45 (112)

LIFE AND TIMES OF FREDERICK DOUGLASS, autobiography. The great black abolitionist describes his life under slavery and his struggle against that institution. $1.50 (113)

AMERICAN NEGRO SLAVE REVOLTS, by Herbert Aptheker. The book which destroyed the myth that Afro-Americans were happy under slavery. $2.25 (114)

A STAR TO STEER BY, by Capt. Hugh Mulzac. The story of the author's 35 year struggle to become the first colored captain of a U.S. merchant ship. $1.85 (115)

BLACK BOURGEOISIE, by E. Franklin Frazier. A critical look at the morals and mores of Negro "society." 95¢ (116)

THE ARAB ROLE IN AFRICA, by Jacques Baulin. Explodes the myth of two Africas—north and south of the Sahara. Shows importance of Moslem in Africa. $1.25 (117)

THE EBONY COOKBOOK, by Freda DeKnight. Basic cookbook by famous Afro-American home service expert. Hundreds of recipes, color plates. $4.95 (118)

NEGROES WITH GUNS, by Robert F. Williams. Explosive account by the central figure in the Monroe, N.C. story. Reviewed in the February LIBERATOR. $1.95 (119)

THE FIRE NEXT TIME, by James Baldwin.
"God gave Noah the rainbow sign,
No more water, the fire next time!"
Two essays: "My Dungeon Shook" and "Down at the Cross." $3.50 (120)

MORE ON INSIDE COVER

FOR CHILDREN

FOREVER FREE: The Story of the Emancipation Proclamation, by Dorothy Sterling. The true story of the struggle against slavery. For teen-agers. $2.95 (301)

SNOWY DAY, by Ezra Jack Keats. Afro-American children will finally be able to see a reflection of themselves in this charming picture book for very young people. Winner of Caldecott Award. $3.00 (302)

HEZEKIAH HORTON, by Ellen Torry, illustrated by Oliver Harrington. The story of a young resident of Lenox Avenue, Harlem, who loves automobiles. $1.75 (303)

THE SLAVE WHO FREED HAITI, by Katharine Scherman. The true and exciting story of Toussaint Louverture. $1.95 (304)

FIRST BOOK OF TALES OF ANCIENT EGYPT, by Charles Mosley. A beautifully illustrated introduction to the culture of one of the greatest African civilizations. $2.50 (305)

PLAYTIME IN AFRICA, by Efua Sutherland. Photographs by Willis E. Bell. Delightful pictures and text showing how children entertain themselves in Ghana. $3.00 (306)

NORTH STAR SHINING, by Hildegarde Swift. Beautifully illustrated story in verse of Africans in America. $3.50 (307)

THE FIRST BOOK OF NEGROES, by Langston Hughes. The story of Africans in America from the early days of exploration to present-day Harlem. $2.50 (308)

CORRIE AND THE YANKEE, by Mimi Cooper Levy, illustrated by Ernest Crichlow. The adventures of a young slave girl who helps a Yankee prisoner escape during the Civil War. $3.00 (309)

FAMOUS AMERICAN NEGROES, by Langston Hughes. Short biographies of Harriet Tubman, Frederick Douglass, Paul Lawrence Dunbar and others. $3.00 (310)

THE SKY-GOD STORIES, by Verna Aardema, illustrated by Elton Fax. One of the many stories about Ananse the spider from West Africa, simply told for young children. $2.00 (311)

PAMPHLETS AND PERIODICALS

LIBERATOR.....back issues, 35¢ each Jan. '63 (501), Feb. '63 (502), Mar. '63 (503), Apr. '63 (504), May '63 (505), June '63 (506), July (507)

UMBRA MAGAZINE, a new Negro literary publication. This, the first issue, is dedicated to poetry. 75¢ (508)

NATIONALISM, COLONIALISM AND THE UNITED STATES, with articles by James Baldwin, John O. Killens and William Worthy. 50¢ (509)

Mail this coupon today

LIBERATOR BOOK SERVICE, 244 East 46th Street, New York 17, N.Y.

Please rush to me the items I have circled below: Enclosed find $.....

Send to.....

Address.....

.....

101 102 103 104 105 106 107 108 109 110 111 112 113 114 115 116 117 118 119

120 121 122 123 124 125 126 127 128 129 130 131 132 133 134 135 136 137

201 202 203 204 205 206 207 208 209 210 211 212 213 214 215 216 217

301 302 303 304 305 306 307 308 309 310 311 401 402

501 502 503 504 505 506 507 508 509

601 602 603 604 605 606 607 608 609 610 611 612 613 614 615 616

Payment in full must accompany each order. No charge for postage. Make checks or money orders payable to Liberator Book Service.

Commentary
October, 1963
R&R Rel.

LESLIE A. FIEDLER

RACE—THE DREAM & THE NIGHTMARE

DEEP IN the mind of America, if not actually below, at least at the lowest level of consciousness, there exist side by side a dream and a nightmare of race relations; and the two together constitute a legend of the American frontier, of the West (when the second race is the Indian), or of the South (when the second race is the Negro). In either case, it is the legend of a Lost Eden, or in more secular terms, of a decline from a Golden Age to an Age of Iron—as America moves from the time of the trapper to that of the settler, from the era of the great plantations to the days of Reconstruction. What makes the Golden Age golden is, in the case of the Indian, an imagined state of peace between white man and red man, transplanted European and aboriginal at home; love, innocence, a kind of religious, even other-worldly calm preside over this peace. And what makes the Iron Age iron is a state of war between redskin natives and paleface invaders; a burden of hatred and guilt, a history of scalpings and counter-scalpings, revenges and counter-revenges make this war ultimate hell.

For a long time, indeed, it seemed not only a peculiarly but an exclusively American nightmare; for though the history of every nation may be, as Joyce suggests, a bad dream from which it cannot awake, each has its own night-time fantasies, as each has its own fate. With the rise of the dark-skinned people everywhere, however, a peculiar white American experience (shared, up to now, perhaps, only by white South Africans) may become the common experience of all the whites of the world. I am talking about our sense of acting out our national destiny in the presence of witnesses, involved in that destiny (through fear and hate, we know; through love as well, we hope) by virtue of their color, but by the same token detached from it. It is this special experience which has bred our special nightmare, as well as our special dream.

In a somewhat different form, this essay will appear in Mr. Fiedler's new book, Waiting for the End, to be published by Stein & Day in March 1964. Mr. Fiedler is the author of An End to Innocence and Love and Death in the American Novel, among other critical works, as well as of the short stories collected in Pull Down Vanity, and the recently published novel, The Second Stone.

This situation is not a creation of Americans, but a pre-condition of their existence as Americans: a heritage from the Europeans who settled on our continent before America itself was invented. With the darker races, white Americans have, of course, inevitably mixed, mingled, even mated, in friendship and in furtive lust; but they have not assimilated to them. The three races remain distinguishable in America today—though there are few Indians and perhaps even fewer Negroes without some admixture of white blood, and though culturally (even psychologically, as we shall see) differences once quite real begin to blur and disappear. Indeed, the distinction seems to become for most white men and some colored ones, too, more and more psychically important to maintain, as it becomes more and more difficult to do so. At any rate, the majority of white Americans at the moment seem unwilling to surrender a distinction it pains them to maintain. What satisfaction would it be, in any case, to reach a time when lines between colored and white can no longer be drawn, if there are no colored people around to applaud it—as there have always been colored people to suffer under and deplore discrimination?

To the two darker races, with whom he must in many places live, the white American is, then, bound by bonds of guilt, older than his national identity itself; and of those bonds he and those races are both aware. The white man knows his guilts have long been mitigated by law and statute as well as by kindness and love; but they will not disappear, cannot, he suspects, short of the moment of total assimilation which he rejects for reasons he does not ever clearly understand. And when he has persuaded himself that somehow they do not matter, he sees in the eye of the Negro or Indian watching him (or fancies he sees, it scarcely matters) evidence that they do. The intelligent white man's burden of guilt consists not merely in knowing himself an oppressor but in knowing the oppressed know this, too.

Indeed, in our latter-day, liberal world the weight of reflexive guilt has become greater than that of direct guilt (and it is to this that a recent writer like James Baldwin has learned to appeal). We are aware that the Negro is aware of his long sexual and economic exploitation; we are aware that the Indian is aware of his expropriation and the disruption of his communal life. And it is their awareness from which we have now come to flinch. For we know even the most rapid advance of reform and amelioration in race relations cannot change it; as long as the Negro remains a Negro, the Indian an Indian, a part of his self-consciousness must be the consciousness of our offenses against him. And so long as we are able to recognize him as something distinctly other from us, we are convinced he must feel himself an other, too. But without a hatred equal to our guilt he would not know himself for what he is—i.e., what we have made him.

This is why we have long not merely dreamed a dream and a nightmare, but dreamed that the colored man dreamed them, too. We long for an accounting which we pray we may be spared, and need somehow to believe the oppressed peoples among us long for it, too. If only they dreamed it, perhaps that would be enough; or if, alternately, they dreamed with us figures of forgiveness like Harriet Beecher's Uncle Tom. If only in fantasy we were united, no matter whether in fantasy of reconciliation or revenge, then we could forgive ourselves. But we do not forgive ourselves. And, indeed, it is hard to know which comes first in the logic of the psyche, which on that level is the cause of which: our not forgiving ourselves, or our not being able quite to imagine the dark-skinned people we oppress forgiving us.

Our greatest literature has always understood what we are just beginning to come to terms with in the realm of social action: that white Americans have from the first hopelessly confused the real Negroes and Indians—with whom they must, for the sake of social survival and civil peace, learn to live—with certain projections of their own deepest minds, aspects of their own psychic life with which precisely they find it impossible to live. Here is the deepest sense in which the oppressor suffers equally with the oppressed, enslaves himself along with those who are his slaves. But to understand it adequately we must be willing to risk a detour (from which some have never returned) into the no-man's-land between politics and psychology.

WHAT WE customarily call "oppressed minorities" (and the same is true when the oppressed are, in fact, majorities) are exploited not only economically and politically, but also psychologically; though this latter fact is less noticed in election speeches, newspaper editorials, or even serious analyses of class and race relations, whether pro or con. Oppressors, that is to say, project upon the oppressed certain of their own psychic dilemmas, elements of their own mental life of which they are ashamed, or toward which they are deeply ambivalent. And such projection, it is worth noting, does not work both ways—only from the more favored group to the less favored one; from, say, white to Negro, but not, in a white-controlled society, from Negro to white. So in the Middle Ages, males projected upon females their own longings for lust and treachery, their unconfessable fear and hatred of marriage; so under Hitler, Germans projected upon Jews their own self-hatred and resentment of their demonic leaders, as well as their own most secret erotic impulses—particularly toward children. So adults project upon school-children and adolescents their own denied desire for irresponsibility and sheer dirt; so masters project upon servants their suppressed wish for more disorderly sex lives, less devotion to honor, etc., etc. So, finally, heterosexual males, in our society, project upon homosexuals their own unconfessed dream of aping and competing with women, of turning the other cheek. But in all of these cases, a one-way psychic transaction is involved; there is no equal and opposite projection possible for females or Jews, children, servants, or homosexuals.

Meanwhile the psychically oppressed flounder in their attempts to come to terms with the burden imposed upon them: the obligation—clearly understood or dimly felt or unwittingly suffered—to act out, in addition to their own authentic roles, secondary ones corresponding to the inner necessities of quite alien others. The culture they share with their oppressors demands of them duplicity; and like all who lead double lives, they are troubled by anxiety and guilt. To allay this, various strategies are available to them, all aimed at mitigating or destroying the unendurable doubleness of their lives, by denying either their authentic selves or their projective roles.

In the first instance, we are dealing with the strategy called by American Negroes "passing": the attempt of the psychically exploited to remake themselves in the image of those who exploit them, to assimilate to those exploiters; or at least, to seem to do so. With such an end in view, homosexuals marry and beget children; Jews join the Episcopalian Church; the Irish send their children to finishing schools; and Negroes take out hunting licenses. But "passing" is, alas, impossible to those of the psychically underprivileged who are as clearly distinguishable from the group that imposes its fantasies upon them as, say, women and children; for they cannot, in ordinary course, disguise themselves as males or adults. Indeed, total assimilation is even difficult in America for Negroes and Jews, conventionally identified by certain quasi-mythical physical traits: kinky hair, blubber lips, great hooked noses, etc., etc.

Yet there are, of course, businesses and professions which flourish precisely on the basis of attempts to change or conceal such identifying traits: the producers of skin bleaches and hair-straighteners, or those doctors who specialize in bobbing noses. Where names serve as additional devices for segregating the unfavored group, name-changing becomes a conventional device: those with conspicuously non-Anglo-Saxon family names, for instance, applying to the courts for others, or at least bestowing on their children names derived from ancient English castles or more recent English poets. So in the 19th century, women eager to write books rather than appear in them as archetypal characters, rechristened themselves as males (usually choosing, for obscure reasons, to call themselves "George"); and so in the 20th, Indians eager to be done with reservation restrictions depend on some conveniently French name to make them seem more Canadien than redskin. Finally, however, only intermarriage does the trick, actual physical assimilation; though in cultures where interracial psychic exploitation flourishes, the children of such mixed marriages have still to make the choice of "passing" or not. The unions which produce them may, indeed, be motivated by mythical pressures as well as love (the hunger of one partner for what he has cast out of himself on to the people of the other); and choosing between Mother and Father, the children take sides, or are chosen for one side or another before they have a chance—in the most desperate of psychological games.

There is, however, another order of assimilation, a kind of "passing"-once-removed, in which the psychically exploited emulate in the privacy of their own excluded world, and for no eye other than their own, the behavior patterns of their exploiters. It is as if they sought to prove to themselves their absolute immunity to all the impulses and desires projected upon them by those exploiters; as well as their complete identity with those who consider them completely other—whether those others ever acknowledge it or not. So, for instance, Jewish boys gathered in fraternities dedicate themselves to athletics, hard drinking, and sex, to make clear that they are by no means the joyless scholars, the bodiless "brains," that gentile fantasy would make them. So, too, the members of all-Negro P.T.A.'s in more prosperous neighborhoods gather to discuss juvenile delinquency or the threat of comic books—the ladies in fur scarves, the gentlemen in rimless glasses—to prove their lives are as earnest, well-regulated, and gray as that of any white philistine. So, finally, high-school kids, even from Indian reservations, gather in jackets and ties at Boys' States to hold mock U.N. meetings, to second motions and pound gavels; as if they never "made out" in parked cars, or wallowed drunkenly on illegitimately bought whiskey, or sat with their parents around the bonfires at peyote "picnics."

Such "passing"-once-removed often results in parody rather than genuine emulation: an unconscious parody of the solemn idiocies of the social world of the psychic exploiters, which those exploiters find it easy to take as a joke on the exploited. Certainly, for generations now (up to the recent moment when the N.A.A.C.P. decided to impose its veto on such traditional literary condescension), white American humorists from Mark Twain to Octavus Roy Cohen and the writers of "Amos and Andy" have delighted in mocking the Negro's attempts to re-enact the mores of white society and white business—not realizing how double-edged the ridiculousness of such travesty in fact is.

A SECOND STRATEGY of the oppressed, generally called "Tom-ism" after Harriet Beecher Stowe's much admired and much maligned Uncle Tom, represents a resolve on the part of the underprivileged to be done with doubleness by becoming entirely what it pleases their exploiters to think them, thus abandoning any attempt to establish an authentic identity. So Anglo-Saxon women, for instance, not merely endured but enthusiastically embraced the symbolic virginal role imposed on them by male guilts and fears from the mid-18th to the early 20th centuries; and, indeed, they not merely read but wrote the books which defined for their fellows such archetypal functions. The scornful "Uncle Tom" has been conventionally used to designate only those willing to turn themselves into the images of humility and forgiveness dreamed by their oppressors; but similar satisfactions are provided by those who agree to become the bogeymen of terror and revenge also dreamed by those oppressors. Uncle Tom and Bigger Thomas are not very different in the end; woolly-haired sniveler and black bully both sacrificing the possibilities of authenticity and full humanity, in order to provide "satisfaction and security" for those bound to them by ties of mutual terror. To play the black rapist of D. W. Griffith's The Birth of a Nation is as abject a surrender as to play the hero (really an Anglo-Saxon Good Woman in blackface) of Mrs. Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin. And precisely such a surrender we see these days in the "beat" young (really Bad Negroes in whiteface), who act out the repressed fantasies of their middle-aged parents in a profitless and self-betraying charade.

Indeed, the woman who turns herself into the pale embodiment of Virtue, the young man who assumes the role of Mother's Helper, the pious black advocate of understanding and non-resistance are likely to seem in the end more disturbingly ambiguous and more truly dangerous to husbands and parents and white segregationists than the dark, passionate vamp, the run-away young rebel without a cause, or the sullen, insolent Negro. For the professional Good Darky, like the Good Girl and Good Boy, the psychic oppressor cannot help suspecting, may be putting him on, pulling his leg; and, indeed, there is a wavering and uncertain boundary between true "Tom-ism" and what homosexuals call "camping"; the flagrant exaggeration of characteristics attributed to the minority of outsiders by unsympathetic insiders—in order to disarm and mock those insiders.

Who can tell the moment at which the bluff and hearty stage-Irishman, the obsequious and hand-rubbing Jew, the mincing, wrist-flapping fairy, the blond, blue-eyed, dependent girl, the faithful black servitor crying "Yassuh, massah!" cease genuinely trying to assume the humble roles in which they have been cast, and begin to exploit those roles subversively? A recent book by Elia Kazan, finally published under the title of America, America was called originally That Anatolian Smile—with reference to the placating, insidious show of teeth common to all those who flaunt before their oppressors the humility demanded of them, yet somehow make it a threat. Such a smile represents a first level of slave-revolt—a psychic counter-attack which presages social and political action, but which can be proved against those who practice it in no court. Thinking of all that smile means, James Baldwin has written to Kazan in praise of his book, "Gadge, baby, you're a nigger, too"; thus recognizing how not only Greeks, like Kazan's forebears, but all the psychically underprivileged, including Negroes, have learned to tread the dangerous line between being "Tom" and playing "Sambo": between, that is to say, genuine self-abasement and self-denial, on the one hand, and the secret freedom of mad, mocking "camp," on the other.

Even "camping," however, is an activity less than fully human: a slave's secret revolt that leaves him (even in his own deepest self-consciousness) a slave still; and the joke of composing manifestoes of freedom in code, a language of gesture and speech really comprehensible only to the in-group, soon runs out. What final satisfaction is there in Emancipation Proclamations written in Yiddish which the gentile exploiters cannot read; or of songs of contempt in a jive-talk which the square white masters do not understand? The point is ultimately, of course, to make them understand; and all minorities dream of the day on which they will be able to declare openly their freedom not only from archetype and stereotype, but from the devious strategies with which they have long had to come to terms with their double existence: the day they will be able to boast that they have begun to invent themselves.

American Negroes have in fact reached that point during the last decade or two, not only on the level of mass culture and popular propaganda through the political movement which calls itself the Black Muslims, but also in the fiction of Richard Wright, Ralph Ellison, James Baldwin, John Williams, and William Melvin Kelley. It was, however, in a prophetic little story by a white author, which first appeared in Partisan Review for May–June 1943, H. J. Kaplan's "The Mohammedans," that the New Negro, the Negro as his own mythologist—comic and terrible at once—entered our literature. And the younger Negro writers who have followed him have not been able to start from scratch, but have had to construct their images of themselves on models provided by white writers, European and American—by Faulkner, for instance, or Franz Kafka. Nevertheless, Negroes in the United States are coming to exist at last in their own minds, not reflexively but directly, despite the images of Aunt Jemima which beam out at them from the boxes of pancake flour, or the pictures of Little Black Sambo that grin up at them out of kids' books.

And this is perhaps why the old ladies of Harlem, however little they may be able to formulate such an idea even to themselves, hail James Baldwin as he walks along the street—quite as if he were a leader in their political struggle like, say, Martin Luther King. But at the moment that he invents himself, the Negro begins to invent the white American, his white American, too; must, indeed, invent him out of the scraps he has left over, the human elements he has chosen—painfully or in apparent relief—to discard from his own image. And already there are white Americans who begin to see themselves as "fay" or "o-fay," as everything the Negro thinks them when he names them so in contempt; just as all Negroes once, and many still, thought and think of themselves as "niggers."

One nail, however, has not yet quite driven out the other; for still in our greatest books, and in our deepest imaginations, we find the old archetypal images of Negro and Indian, and we turn to those images still, eagerly though with diminishing psychic returns. What, then, have and do the darker peoples (not only Indians and Negroes, but Polynesians and Orientals, too; even Mediterranean Europeans, who are half-Negroes to the pallid Anglo-Saxon-Celtic-Scandinavian-Germanic blend that makes up the legendary Amerikansi) represent to our pale-face majority? Two things chiefly, closely linked but still distinguishable: nature itself, which is to say the romantic's nature—the wilderness, anti-civilization, anti-culture; and the impulsive life—the extra-rational part of the mind, which earlier Americans liked to call "The Heart," but which we prefer to call instinct or libido or id.

Ask any American for his attitude toward Indian and Negro, and you will discover his attitude toward his own impulsive life; or conversely, find how any American deals with his own basic drives, and you can guess his attitudes toward our colored minorities. The man who "whops niggers" or "shoots injuns" is, symbolically, trying to kill the savage in himself, though he may, perhaps must, at the same time lust for dark flesh. Mrs. Stowe, much more acute than anyone can ever quite remember, knew all this when she made Simon Legree a son of the Puritans to begin with, and portrayed him as pursuing black females when not tormenting black males. But maybe both, after all, are forms of exorcism congenial to the Puritan mind: whipping and rape—a double assault on the despised natural. There is a curious pessimism in Mrs. Stowe; for though her book may have provided an ideology for abolitionism, it does not really foresee such a solution, ending short of any Happy Ending, even the rescue of Uncle Tom by the White Boy who loved him. For her, love comes too late, here on earth at least; and the reconciliation of Black and White must be remanded to Heaven.

OTHER AMERICANS have, however, if not quite hoped, at least imagined more; for they have known how much depended upon our making peace with the Indian and Negro, on the symbolic level as well as the literal one; Thoreau, who both lived and imagined the role of a white Indian, was one of these. His account in A Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers of the idyllic friendship between the trapper Alexander Henry and the Indian called Wawatam represents first of all, of course, a desire we all share to achieve social peace and a united nation; but on a second level, it stands for our need to come to terms with the wilderness, into which emigrating Europeans were thrown with a rude suddenness which created perhaps the greatest culture shock of human history: the shock out of which our image of ourselves has exploded. And on a third, the deepest, perhaps the ultimate level, it represents the need of men divided against themselves by the heritage of the Puritans (which alone enabled them to survive that culture shock) to join together their sundered selves: the impulsive self identified with the hostile forest and its inhabitants, the moral self identified with the best they had rescued from the Old World and hoped to preserve in the New.

In the other very greatest American writers, in Melville, for instance, and Mark Twain, even (despite his embattled political position as a latter-day Southerner) in William Faulkner, we discover the full realization that until the American solves what he calls the "Negro" or "Indian Problem," the white American cannot be a whole man. The Emancipation Proclamation we long for is the proclamation of our own emancipation from a genteel rigidity of spirit, the rigor mortis of Anglo-Saxon morality; and it is in search of this that Ishmael yields himself to Queequeg, Huck embraces Nigger Jim, and the Boy of Faulkner's "The Bear" makes himself the foster-son of the half-Indian, half-Negro Sam Fathers. Yet none of our greatest writers, however idyllic their celebration of the union of white and colored, is without ambivalence. Elsewhere in A Week, Thoreau ponders the tale of Hannah Dustan who was carried off by Indians after her infant had been murdered and who not only escaped from the threat of naked gauntlet or rape but brought back with her "the still bleeding scalps of ten of the aborigines" whom she had killed in their sleep. Mythicizing this old story, Thoreau continues:

> The family of Hannah Dustan all assembled alive once more, except the infant whose brains were dashed out against the apple tree, and there have been many who in later times have lived to say that they had eaten of the fruit of that apple tree.

In Twain, the murdering Indian is balanced off against the loving Negro, while in Melville the loving Polynesian is answered by the treacherous Black; and in Faulkner the representatives of instinct and nature are sorted out not by tribe or race, but by age: post-menopausal colored women and aging colored men playing saintly or even Christ-like roles, in contrast to young and potent Negroes who are cast as demi-devils.

But this we expect, and indeed, find everywhere until very recent times, when political liberalism and the cult of the primitive succeed in driving the dark side of our ambivalence deep, deep underground. Traditionally there have been two contradictory attitudes toward nature at work in the American mind, the "Rousseauistic" and the "Puritan"—the first, as we have seen, expressed in the dream of Alexander Henry, the second in the nightmare of Hannah Dustan. Not only in our literature but in our lives, we have shuttled back and forth between a romantic nature cult and a philistine anti-nature religion: on the one hand, becoming enthusiastic advocates of nudism, and the world's warmest supporters of Freudian psychology; on the other, joining movement after movement against whatever pleases the flesh—alcohol, meat, tobacco, drugs. In fact, we maintain these two polar attitudes not alternately but simultaneously, choosing duplicity rather than compromise, and this, indeed, is the essence of the American way.

Corresponding to each attitude there is, moreover, a program, a kind of politics which creates divisions more fundamental and real than the purely nominal ones which separate Republicans from Democrats among us. One program urges us to Stamp Out Nature: chop down trees, kill off buffalo, slaughter whales, rape and ruin the wilderness, join the Christian Science Church. The second cries in answer, Disappear into Nature: preserve our primitive areas, guard our natural resources, provide summer camping grounds with real live bears, strip to the buff and lie in the sun. And each of these approaches, of course, entails a corollary program in respect to the Negroes and Indians: the first, Stamp out the Coloreds; the second Blend with Them. In its most extreme form—as in the case of the Indians, for instance, who have always seemed to us economically dispensable—the negative program is simply: Kill Them Off, an American version of the Nazis' Final Solution. And certainly there rings deep in the mind of anyone who has ever seen an old-fashioned Western movie or read an old-fashioned Western story the folk saying: "The only good Injun is a dead Injun."

But the advance of civilization quite soon mitigated the naïve totalitarian approach with which we began; and Pen Them Off replaces Kill Them Off as official policy. Especially if there are economic advantages, as with the Negroes, in keeping the underprivileged alive, but, for enlightenment's sake, too, in other cases, it seems preferable to isolate the oppressed in segregated communities, in colonies abroad or ghettos at home, on reservations, in slave-quarters, or red-light districts. The last has always appeared to us an especially attractive solution. In the West, for instance, the early brothels were stocked largely with Indian girls; and even when the gun-fighters we honor had begun to bring in and protect their white replacements, a longing for more local fare remained. Similarly the slave quarters on Southern plantations were notoriously private brothels for the master and his sons; and a taste for Negro women survived their abolition. To make a woman a whore is like making any human a slave; it denies her identity, even reality (especially in a bourgeois world where the human is defined almost wholly by the family group), and ends by making her a thing, a device for pleasure.

Ghettoization has, then, two purposes: to force on those who are ghettoized conditions of squalor which seem to verify the grounds of discrimination against them; and to make them if not unreal, at least invisible. We affect surprise at how "invisible" the German concentration camps were to many Germans; but precisely as "invisible" are the Negro ghettos of New York and Chicago to those who never walk that way; for to be thus "invisible" is precisely the point of their existence. And if, in the United States, poverty has in recent years become "invisible," too, this is because it has tended to become more and more exclusively the lot of those already penned off for their skin color or cultural backwardness. But this is the final triumph of Puritanism, to have ghettoized the unsuccess it fears as the outward sign of sin, along with the dark-skinned people who symbolize its own deepest guilts and fears.

ALONGSIDE the Puritan program of annihilation and segregation, however, there has always flourished a sentimental counter-program of conciliation and love. Beside the figure of the Indian-killer, there lives in our imagination that of the Indian-lover; and if the former is likely to be, like Hannah Dustan, a woman, and the latter, like Alexander Henry, a man, this is because we have always sought to keep distinct the notion of a comradely union (which our deepest mind approves) and miscegenation (which our deepest mind abhors). Though we have continued to tell each other in the schoolroom the tale of Captain John Smith and Pocahontas, we have traditionally distrusted the squaw man, the renegade; and the notion of the woman who goes over to the wigwam has until recently stirred on the popular level nothing but horror. In the past, at least, it has been only the dream of a Garden of Eden with two Adams—one colored, one white—and no Eve, that has given us the illusion of "satisfaction and security"; though as early as the 20's, Sherwood Anderson and D. H. Lawrence had begun to express overtly an envy of and a longing for the presumed superior pleasures of dark-skinned sex; and in the 60's the "spade chick" begins, at last, to replace Chingachgook and Nigger Jim as a mythical figure of reconciliation in the novels of, say, Jack Kerouac and Robert Gover.

The recent popular success of the latter's One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding marks, perhaps, a critical point in the evolving mythology of the Negro in the United States. Certainly few would have predicted, even a year or two ago, best-sellerdom for a book which tries to turn Topsy into America's Sweetheart, by glorifying her as a fourteen-year-old black whore, who understands orgasms and drugs, but despises fast cars, television, and war. Gover's is finally a false book motivated less by a desire to tell the truth than by white self-hatred and self-abnegation (his chief white character is a cartoon version of what the "o-fay" imagines the Negro imagines him); but it is not untypical of a moment in the history of our culture, when a young white Montanan can write and believe, after a night of peyote-eating at the bonfires of the Cheyenne: "The Indians are collossal downmen (they are too lazy to write). While we have been playing checkers they have been playing give away. As a result they have nothing but poverty, anonymity, happiness, lack of neuroses, wonderful children and a way of life that is free, democratic and in complete fulfillment of the American dream. . . ."

Yet the myth of an Earthly Paradise for males only has died hard. Not so long ago, in fact, it was for the first time expressed without camouflage or disguise in a popular movie: a film called The Defiant Ones, which closes on a scene in which a white fugitive finds peace in the arms of the Negro comrade he has begun by despising, after both of them have been betrayed by an evil white woman. And in Saul Bellow's most recent novel, Henderson the Rain King, his white hero flees the world of female love to find satisfaction in the affectionate embrace of a preternaturally well-read black prince. Yet there is a sense, especially among the very young, and those who, like Norman Mailer, speak to them most directly, that the old myth is no longer quite viable in a world in which Indians and Negroes, along with non-whites everywhere, come close to the end of their long indignity. The dream which began with the trapper Henry and flowered into the mid-19th-century cult of male friendship, seems to many contemporaries too sentimental, or wrongly sentimental, too blandly liberal, perhaps—at any rate, too easy to sustain us here and now. And in certain of our latest books, in the whole cluster of works, for instance, called "hip" or "beat," as in our recent life, we have seen the emergence of a new dream, a new Edenic ideal—pointed toward the future, rather than, as in Thoreau's case, toward the past.

Yet the new dream begins with the old—in fact, presupposes it; but it goes further, for it not only imagines joining with Indian or Negro in pseudo-matrimony, or being adopted by some colored foster-father—but being reborn as Indian or Negro, becoming the other. The locus classicus of this altered archetype is Norman Mailer's essay "The White Negro," reprinted in his Advertisements for Myself. "In such places as Greenwich Village," Mailer writes, "a ménage-à-trois was completed—the bohemian and the juvenile delinquent came face-to-face with the Negro, and the hipster was a fact in American life." Mailer is not a notably clear writer, and it seems at first reading as if he were merely talking about yet another sexless union of the races, in which, as he tells us, "marijuana was the wedding ring" and "it was the Negro who brought the cultural dowry," i.e., jazz, "the music of orgasm." But he is trying to tell us about something else: about the child born at long last out of that union, about the hipster himself—rebel without a cause, pseudo-psychopath, drug addict, and pursuer of danger: in short, the White Negro.

Here, then, finally is the justification of Thoreau's boast about the friendship he describes, "so almost bare and leafless, yet not blossomless nor fruitless": the strange fruit, not of the physical miscegenation so long feared by white supremacists, but of the innocent union of Huck and Jim on the raft. And here, indeed, may be the solution to our deepest guilts and starkest quandary (making possible without further ado even physical assimilation, to which not skin color but cultural and psychological differences have always been the real impediments), the resolution we scarcely dared hope for in actual life, however often we imagined it in books. In light of this, it scarcely matters whether the Negro whom the hipster becomes in his imagination ever really existed at all; for it is with the projection of our rejected self, which we have called "Negro," that we must be reconciled. Moreover, a new generation of Negroes are presently learning in Greenwich Village, or at Harvard College, to be what the hipster imagines them to be, imitating their would-be imitators. It is the kindest joke our troubled white culture has played on them; and, one hopes, the last.

In any case, the "savage" proposed by Mailer as a model for the hipster is, though he calls him a Negro, quite as much an Indian; which represents a further reach of absurdity, considering that even some forty years ago, D. H. Lawrence was already able to say, "The Red Man is dead, disbelieving in us," and that, certainly, few of his remaining representatives ever penetrate the bohemias of America's big cities in 1963. But Lawrence knew, too, that, contrary to folk-belief, even the dead Indian is not a good Indian; quite the contrary. "The moment the last nuclei of Red life break up in America," he wrote, "then the white men will have to reckon with the full force of the demon of the continent." It is not merely that the hipster's beloved marijuana is rather the gift of the Indian through the Negro, than of the Negro himself; but that, as Mailer reports, those two imaginary Indians, D. H. Lawrence and Ernest Hemingway, are among his "intellectual antecedents," and that, therefore, he feels himself "a frontiersman in the Wild West of American Night life." Somehow it has been necessary for white Americans to be reborn as imaginary Indians before they could become imaginary Negroes; and, indeed, Americans were imaginary Indians from the start, our national destiny beginning when certain New England palefaces, eager to demonstrate they were no longer Europeans, put on feathers and war paint to celebrate the Boston Tea Party.

FROM the beginning, there have been in myth, if not in fact, White Indians among us, Crévecoeur, for instance, asking in his Letters from an American Farmer, "By what power does it come to pass that children who have been adopted when young among these people [the Indians] can never be prevailed upon to readopt European manners?"; and crying out in astonishment, "There must be something in their social bond singularly captivating . . . for thousands of Europeans are Indians, and we have no examples of even one of those aborigines having from choice become European. . . ." Even in the movies, Tom Mix and Gary Cooper (spiritual offspring of Natty Bumppo and Chingachgook) preceded Marlon Brando and Elvis Presley (cultural sons of Huckleberry Finn and Nigger Jim); but Hemingway could never tell where Gary Cooper stopped and he began, and may, indeed, have died of the effort to prove that they were one. If the frontiersman was a mock Indian, and the Western movie star a mock frontiersman, what is Hemingway but the White Indian twice removed, out of whose union with the imaginary Bad Negro, the black rapist of the Birth of a Nation recast as a hero, the hipster, or at least Mailer's version of the hipster, has been born.

In our very lives, we have come to repeat this pattern, individual biography recapitulating cultural history. Born theoretically white, we are permitted to pass our childhood as imaginary Indians, our adolescence as imaginary Negroes, and only then are expected to settle down to being what we are told we really are: white once more. Even our whiteness, however, threatens to become imaginary, as the Negroes we have long mythicized begin to mythicize us; and we think of the embattled whites of Reconstruction days in the South, attempting to assert counter-myths of themselves against those of their former slaves and the abolitionist ideologues. And how comically-pathetically that experiment worked out we cannot forget; intending to appear White Knights out of Sir Walter Scott, the imaginary white men of the Ku Klux Klan in fact revealed themselves as the gibbering and sheeted dead, anonymous ghosts of nameless fathers, able to ride only in malice and in the dark. The White Anglo-Saxon Protestant, appalled at such a prospect, has had, to be sure, the alternative option in the last couple of decades of becoming in late youth or early middle-age an imaginary Jew—modeling himself, in accordance with his politics and taste, on Herman Wouk or Leon Uris, Irwin Shaw, Saul Bellow, or Bernard Malamud. But that option, too, begins to wear out.

In any case, for a long time now we Americans, white or black, gentile or Jew (and the rest of the world oddly follows our example, though without the deep impulses which motivate us), have been somehow pleased to see our children at four or five and ten or twelve dressed, if not actually like Indians, at least like the frontiersman, the trapper, the cowboy: all those who learned from Indians to dress in the skins of beasts, to carry a weapon, stalk the woods, and present to the world the bronzed stolid face, the inarticulate hero's gaze common to Sitting Bull and Gary Cooper and Ernest Hemingway. Wherever jeans go in the world, and they go everywhere that Coca-Cola goes, the dream of the West goes with them; and wherever that dream goes, the drugs we have learned to use from the Indians follow after. First, of course, came tobacco, carried back with them by the sailors of Columbus, and introduced by Sir Walter Raleigh to the English bohemians of the Age of Elizabeth, wild young Indians like Christopher Marlowe, who added smoking to atheism and homosexuality to round out their sum of sins. And ever since the series has continued without flagging, marijuana, mescalin, the Mexican mushroom—all moving from tepee to high school or college or young man's "pad," as our youngsters at last begin the shift from a whiskey culture to a dope culture; and all carrying with them cancer, hallucinations, addiction, madness: the red man's revenge.

But the boy who smokes "pot" is an adolescent, not a child—which is to say, no longer an imaginary Indian but an imaginary Negro; and, indeed, nowadays, it is the black man rather than the red who is likely to have introduced him to the red man's "medicine." But it is not merely a matter of dope, this affinity of the young and the Negro. Indeed, there is scarcely a father of adolescents in the United States who is not in the year 1963 beginning to be aware (though he may feel it as a pain, rather than know it as a fact) that his sons are in their whole life-style—their speech, their gait, the clothes they wear, the music they love, as well as the vices they emulate—closer to the life-style of Negroes than he could have foreseen on the day of their birth. He may find them, in fact, in posture and in gesture, in intonation and inflection, perhaps even in the deepest aspirations, which, after all, control such outward behavior, closer to the great-grandfathers of their Negro friends, than to their own great-grandfathers—Anglo-Saxon or Italian, Jewish or Greek, Scandinavian or German or Irish or Slav. It is what we have really longed for from the first—perhaps what the story of Alexander Henry has all along meant; but we have scarcely begun to acknowledge it to ourselves, much less come to terms with it. And if we are awaiting the artist who will make poetry of the pathos and comedy it entails, we scarcely know even this.

R+R Rel. Gen

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING

November 1-3, 1963

Statement on AJC AND NEGRO PROTEST ACTIVITIES

The American Jewish Committee has traditionally sought to combat discrimination and inequality of opportunity through education, negotiation, and appropriate legislation. At the same time, it has sought to identify basic social and psychological causes of prejudice, discrimination and intergroup tension. While stressing these approaches to intergroup relations problems, the Committee has never, in principle, disapproved more direct forms of protest or action, where appropriate.

In their struggle for the basic rights so long denied them, most American Negroes have become impatient with gradualism and half-remedies, and have called for a concerted drive to win equality now. This campaign has included sit-ins, freedom rides, selective buying campaigns, picket lines, marches and demonstrations. Such direct mass action has at times awakened the conscience of Americans and proved to be an effective technique for achieving equality.

While these activities are largely under Negro leadership, the drive for equality is not solely a Negro problem. It is a challenge calling for moral commitment and decisive action by Americans of every race and religion and of every section of the country. It is increasingly clear to whites as well as Negroes that gradualism and "tokenism" will no longer solve this most urgent of all domestic problems.

Responding to this challenge, the American Jewish Committee, along with the Synagogue Council, the National Council of Churches, the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice, labor unions and many other civic groups, supported the August 28th March for Jobs and Freedom in Washington, D.C. We considered that demonstration a "proper, and indeed, characteristically American means of petitioning Government for the redress of grievances and for fulfilling rights guaranteed to all Americans," and called on AJC members to participate.

Many groups have also urged their members and leaders to join with Negro groups in local demonstrations and other forms of protest action. The American Jewish Committee, in dealing with these issues, has traditionally been guided by a number of criteria, such as the justice of the cause, the effectiveness of the proposed technique, the question of its constitutionality, the responsibility of the proponents, and the groups associated in the proposed activities. We recognize that social protest and pressure are, at times, effective means of mobilizing support for negotiation and agreement. As the aim is to remedy those inequities which provoke protests, efforts to bring about remedies by such means as negotiation or legislation should be continued. Chapters can often serve a useful function in interpreting to their members and leaders of the community the tensions underlying demonstrations.

The question of AJC participation in particular protest actions must therefore be determined by a review of each situation, with all of the criteria herein set forth remaining the touchstones in arriving at that decision.

Adopted November 2, 1963
Edgewater Beach Hotel
Chicago, Ill.

R&R Rel. Gen

THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

EXECUTIVE BOARD MEETING

November 1-3, 1963

Statement on QUOTAS AND RACE RELATIONS

The American Jewish Committee strongly supports the constitutional principle that civil rights are individual, not group rights. Law protects individuals against discrimination based on race, color or creed; it does not protect or prefer groups or entire categories such as minorities. The legal recognition of groups even for benign reasons would give rise to a new political principle, one that would perforce make of the group the source of individual rights -- a principle repugnant to democracy. We therefore oppose any attempt to create a system of quotas as such for Negroes or anyone else in housing, employment, education and other areas.

However, we must recognize that Negroes, as a group, have been discriminated against systematically and deprived of the normal benefits and opportunities of society. Consequently, only large-scale measures deliberately designed to establish a new place in society for Negroes will be effective. Since Negroes have suffered discrimination in jobs, housing and schools for generations, it is incumbent upon the nation to provide measures to help close the wide and growing gap which separates the overwhelming masses of Negroes from other Americans. To be meaningful, equality of treatment in all walks of life must be the foundation upon which is constructed a new social framework of supportive devices enabling the individual Negro to overcome a heritage of social deprivation.

America has historically rendered special assistance to special categories of people upon whom society has enforced extra burdens and who have had special needs that could not otherwise be met. These have included, among others, veterans, workers, farmers, migrants and the aged. We think, therefore, that agreement should be sought on a crash program that would help Negroes and members of other minority groups to overcome their disadvantaged positions. Such a program should include the following elements:

Education Provision for first-class schools for culturally deprived children, with the most modern facilities and the best teachers; intensified remedial instruction in the lower grades for such children; intensified efforts by schools and colleges to seek out qualified Negro and other disadvantaged youths; after-school tutoring programs; expanded adult education programs geared to the needs of citizens lacking basic literary and technical skills; and assumption of responsibility by school officials and boards of education for achieving school integration wherever educationally feasible through such devices as site selection, the redrawing of district lines and rezoning where practicable.

Employment The enactment of federal and state fair employment practices legislation to ban discrimination in public and private employment; intensification and expansion of apprenticeship and training programs -- both by management and unions -- in order to increase the reservoir of trained Negro and white manpower; assumption by employers and unions of greater responsibility for making all categories and levels of employment available to qualified Negroes and other minority workers without discrimination.

Housing The extension of the President's Executive Order on discrimination in housing to cover all existing public and publicly assisted housing, and housing covered by mortgages of lending institutions supervised or chartered by the Federal Government; the adoption of fair housing laws and ordinances by states and cities; and the assumption by builders, developers and real estate operators of responsibility for building and operating open occupancy developments and promoting racial diversity in communities throughout the country.

We urge the development of intergroup relations training programs in schools, in housing projects, in industry and unions, and elsewhere.

We also urge all our members, and indeed all American citizens, to express their personal commitment to these objectives and to extend their direct support for the achievement of these goals.

The cause of integration will be better served if less energy and attention are devoted to controversy over a "quota" system, and more to the broader scene. Only imaginative, vastly-conceived programs can cope with this situation. Our energies should be devoted toward that end.

Adopted November 2, 1963
Edgewater Beach Hotel
Chicago, Ill.

(See letters to the Editor attached)

R + Race Rel.

The New York Times Magazine Nov. 10, 1963

High-school students protesting desegregation in Birmingham, Ala.
"Many attractive and voluble youngsters are eager to proclaim white superiority."

A Southern Teen-Ager Speaks His Mind

Disturbed by the militancy of young white Southerners in resisting school integration, a Southern writer and editor interviews an 18-year-old Mississippian.

By MARGARET LONG

OXFORD, MISS.

THE harsh and hating faces of young Southerners photographed in troubled scenes of the desegregating Deep South have shocked and baffled most other Americans, among them, indeed, many rational and peaceable people in Dixie. To investigate the ideas and feelings that fire many of these boys and girls I made a mission to Mississippi, the state where segregationist sentiment is most intense. Here I found many attractive and voluble youngsters eager to proclaim white superiority, Southern culture and Negro contentment. These high-school and college boys and girls exhibited a common innocence of the Negro movement, which they believe is fomented by outsiders and Communists. (The N.A.A.C.P., the only civil-rights organization most of them know, seems to them a blend of both.) They also showed intense emotions of both affection and revulsion toward Negroes.

The sweetly mannered young people I talked to seemed most of all gripped by a poignant loyalty to the precarious present and the easy past of the white South, a fealty uncorrupted by alien facts and ideas from beyond the tight and turbulent little world of Mississippi.

From here, the common ground fell away into varying attitudes, ranging from the valiant "Never!" of one Delta boy who would "die for" segregation, to the "It's coming" of several others and the pained confusion of a 17-year-old girl who thought, "It's awful Nigras can't come to our churches."

The Confederate dedication of one 18-year-old probably best expressed the adamant segregationist mood typical of many young people of the Deep South. He was Don Barrett, a Phi Delta Theta pledge at the University of Mississippi at Oxford, who answered questions at word-tumbling length, his replies replete with nice, old-fashioned "Yes'ms" and "No'ms." His forebears came to Mississippi from Virginia and South Carolina, and his great-grandmother, he said, gave $80,000 that she had hidden away to the Confederate Army after her plantation, Newstead, was used by Grant as headquarters during the Vicksburg campaign and then was sacked and ruined.

"She turned it over, lock, stock and barrel," he said, his round, rosy face glowing and his eyes dark with love. "That's the kind of heritage I come from—and I'm proud of it."

YOUNG Barrett's more immediate heritage includes a pleasant childhood of play in backyard pecan treehouses, fishing and hunting, adoration of a beautiful mother (she was beauty queen in high school, at Millsaps College in Jackson, and at Ole Miss) and a trusting attachment to his energetic and commanding father. ("He's got more sense in a minute than I've got in three weeks. He's the wisdom I draw on.") He also exhibits the usual masculine pleasure in two little sisters and pride tinged perhaps with rivalry, in an older brother, Pat Jr., who is taking psychology at Millsaps and planning to study law at Ole Miss.

"Yes, of course, I used to play with Negro children," he said. "We quit, well, we quit when . . . when we both realized the difference, and they went their way and I went mine. You may be surprised that our next-door neighbors were Nigras. They lived catty-corner across the street from us . . . the nearest neighbors."

Mr. Barrett spoke ardently of the good Negroes and his affection for them and their (Continued on Page 114)

---

MARGARET LONG is a novelist ("Louisville Saturday") and former columnist for The Atlanta Journal who two years ago received the Florina Lasker Civil Liberties Award. She is at present the editor of the Southern Regional Council's magazine New South, in Atlanta.

A Southern Teen-Ager

(Continued from Page 15)

profound loyalty to him and his. He smiled quickly and radiantly at the memory of these ancient felicities. Dora, who cooks and cleans up, is "a young 43"—like his mother. They were born on the same day and exchange birthday presents. Allie Mae, a registered nurse by correspondence course, "respected by the white community and venerated by the Negro community," nursed Don when he was born and promised his grandmother "she'd always take care of Sara," his mother. Allie Mae visits frequently in Miss Sara's bedroom and on the phone. Amelia, older, cooks on Sunday, and Pecolia, he confided with a flash of delight, "is making me a quilt." There are several Negro hands on his father's cattle farms who are also life-long familiars at the Barrett house in Lexington.

LEXINGTON is the seat of Holmes County, seven miles in the hills at the edge of the Delta, "the heart of Mississippi and the citadel of Southern rights," with "stark nekkid bluffs looking out to the Mississippi River." It is to him the most beautiful place in the world, a rich center of farming which produces the best crops and "the best people, too." The citadel of Holmes County has 19,600 Negro citizens and 7,000 whites.

"I feel, as do most of the white population of the South, that the Negro is inherently unequal," Barrett said. "Now they say it's lack of opportunity, cause and result, the reason men first took the fire and light of learning, that the Nigras never had the need in Africa because they could just pluck the fruit of the woods and all, and sustain life on that. But you can't say they didn't get learning and civilization because of the easy climate, because they've got a range of all climates and mountains and jungles. They came into contact with the Saracens in North Africa. And Alexander the Great and they never did catch the light of learning, nobody in the region. If they hadn't been taken over by the white man . . .

"Well, where they're not, they're still eating each other," he said, his voice vibrant with triumph and disgust.

"BUT the white South has taken the Neegra, fed, clothed, taught them how to speak and wear clothes and taught him Christianity. Still, look at 'em, their illegitimacy rate!"

Mr. Barrett was at such polite pains to say the respectful Southern "Nigra" and never to lapse into the easy and offensive "nigger," and I was so vigilant with my proper and hard-learned "Negro," that we quite rattled one another. Once, in the heat of exchange, he said "Neegra" and, again, "Neeger," and I once wildly pronounced it "Nigroo," to our mutual dismay. But we both behaved well upon these lapses, quite as if they had not occurred, and proceeded as nice as you please.

"In my opinion," he said, "the South made its biggest mistake—because they hated to do it out of our love and affection for the Nigras—but our mistake is in talking states' rights instead of anthropology."

"THE moderates" (and here Barrett used the term as it is widely understood in Mississippi, as equivalent to Communists or other enemies of order and freedom), "prophets of gloom and doom, say it's coming—we gotta accept it. I think if the Nigra is able to live on an equal footing after the troops leave, then we are wrong—wrong when we say the Nigra is not capable.

"Yes'm, I expect there'll have to be an occupation before there'll be integration in Mississippi, and the Kennedy twins are ruthless enough to do it without batting an eye if they're re-elected. It would probably be the most tragic thing that could happen to our beloved state. But afterward, when the troops leave . . ." Here he explained that white resistance to the troops would be so adamant that upon their despairing withdrawal, "everything would be just like before, only the poor Nigras would lose all the friendship and goodwill they had."

Barrett's uncle is a cotton planter and head of the Citizens' Council in Lexington and his father is a founder. Don himself is "a sort of honorary member" because he "wanted to give my $5," though he is under the usually accepted age. Contemplating the possibility of Negro political control in the Delta through its 65 to 70 per cent Negro majority—"although it would never happen" — Barrett said such a regime "without white man's control would be chaos."

"If we turned politics over to them, we'd have another Congo. It's not wild like that under the patient, restraining hand of the white man, when they behave reasonably well.

"Do anything to us? I don't think so, no'm. I don't believe the Nigras, if they got control, would have any reason to hurt people who have nurtured and cared for them, but it would be chaos. Yes, out of their incompetence. The economy would collapse, and it would be like Reconstruction. You remember the Nigras in power in Reconstruction were voting themselves carriages and all kind of luxuries. It wouldn't be out of malice—they're a kindly people—but out of inability to run things. The Southern code of hospitality, gentleness, kindness—they've learned it and accepted it. . . .

"IF the majority of Nigras with the vote there"—this was in reference to Charles City County, Va.—"haven't taken over, it's because they haven't got the initiative. But look at Memphis. Nigras are 32 per cent of the electorate. They're beginning to control politics, and Memphis is beginning to look like a dirty Northern city," he said in another spurt of disgust.

Barrett is also apprehensive about treatment of white women under black domination. "If the social system is thrown out of kilter, as moderates would do, there would be more danger than there is now under the patient hand of white leadership. I would certainly take up arms to protect our women. To me there is nothing more wonderful than a Southern lady. Gosh! It's really undefinable. But she's cultured, genteel, intelligent, beautiful — usually beautiful, anyway."

PATROL—Military police on duty on the University of Mississippi campus during the racial tension there a year ago.

In defense of the social and economic system, Barrett would not eat with a Negro, or call one Mr. or Mrs. or Miss, because "it's not socially acceptable, it's not done—anymore than I'd cut more than one piece of steak at a time or tuck my napkin under my chin."

NOR would he betray his manners for distinguished Negroes or for different customs in other places. In Milwaukee, where he visited an aunt and "a wonderful Yankee uncle—the only good Yankee I know," he did not desist from giving his bus seat to standing ladies, in the Mississippi way, just because it was not the usual practice in Wisconsin.

As for celebrated and accomplished Negroes, Barrett says, "more power to 'em." He cited "Gaston in Birmingham"—a millionaire Negro banker and property owner. "You can see he obviously has a very high I. Q., is well-mannered and a fine man, I'm sure. Well, it's just a combination of genes that worked out that way. But the chances are 1 in 5,000 that his children would be like that."

There are "exceptional" Negroes in Lexington, who own stores, cafes and funeral businesses, but no professionals. "We are courteous and treat them with the respect due their education," he explained. "There's none of this pushing around or 'Get outa my way' for them in stores or anywhere —or for the lowest field hand either."

Barrett scoffs at the outsiders' notion that it's deprivation and "brutality" which makes Negroes migrate from the South.

"That's ridiculous. It's economic. The Negro definitely was necessary to farming 20 years ago. My uncle owns a plantation where he had 60 families chopping cotton, borrowing money, depending on him — you know, old-style sharecropping. Ten of the 15 left live there now because they love my uncle and they depend on him, although he just needs five of 'em. But he gives them Saturday-night spending money and everything and he could say, 'Fred, go up the hill and kill me a big snake,' or 'Go cut off your head,' and Fred would do it.

"They don't help him. They're an economic liability. He supports 10 families out of love and loyalty. He's a fine fellow, president of the Tchula Citizens' Council. The others left because they had to sell their small farms—with mechanization, the Nigras can't make a profit on a little farm —and had no place to live. Now you just see old grandfathers and little bitty children, pickaninnies. The young ones have gone to Chicago.

"My girl, I talked to her on the phone and this horrible thing had happened. Houston was dead. Houston drove their tractor and she just loved him. Mr. Foose's father —that's his name, Mary's father, Mr. Foose—and Houston's father were always on the place together. Houston's father had worked for Mr. Foose's father all that time, and they loved him.

"THE Citizens' Council, Mr. Foose is a leader in it, is not like the Ku Klux Klan. We hate violence. But we are determined to keep our way of life," he declared with rapidly rising fervor. "Nobody can take it away from us, and I would die for it. I wouldn't do anything foolish, but we will not give up.

"People say Nigras are catching up—that's wonderful —but that's no justification for social change in 1963 for what might happen in 500 or 1,000 years."

Barrett is not much disturbed by the current Mississippi Negro drive to write in

(Continued on Following Page)

Look No Further

Here are the very steaks you've paid considerably more in some of the finest restaurants and private clubs, and wondered why you couldn't have them in your own home. Now, these tender, delicious aged steaks can be delivered to your door or shipped in an attractive gift box, with personalized card. Quick frozen, packed in insulated box for guaranteed safe arrival. Sorry no COD's.

Box of 12-12 oz. aged Sirloin Steaks — Only $29.95 Express Prepaid

Send check or money order to

AMRON MEAT CORP.
P.O. Box #158 Home Crest Sta.
Brooklyn 29, N. Y.

When you DINE Italian, WINE Italian with RUFFINO

Italy's Prize CHIANTI Red or White

SOLE U.S. DISTRIBUTORS SCHIEFFELIN & CO., NEW YORK

the MAN and the Great Dane
Year-Round COAT

Great Dane adds a dash of spirit to the notably conservative
Year-Round Coat . . .
The Clubman . . .
iridescent cotton/acetate . . .
subtly muted plaid . . .
weather-defiant . . .
handsomely lined.
Companion pile lining zips in and out . . .
fits perfectly always.

In black-olive . . . about $25.00 at Macy's, Bamberger's and other fine stores throughout the country.

Cosmopolitan MFG.CO.
FRED MONOSSON, President
GREAT DANE BLDG.
712 Beacon Street, Boston 15

(Continued from Preceding Page)

15,000 or 20,000 Negro protest votes for Aaron Henry, state N.A.A.C.P. president, for governor, and the Rev. Ed King, a young, white civil-rights devotee, for lieutenant-governor, and to draw 200,000 disfranchised Negro votes in a straw election for Henry. Nor does he share outside dismay at intimidation of Negro voting aspirants — random violence, arrests of demonstrators, eviction of would-be voters from jobs and property, and a few killings.

"FEDERAL right to vote? No, the Constitution gives the states the right to say who shall vote and who shall not. There's no such thing as the right to vote. It's a privilege, earned only after qualifications set up by the state have been met. Instead of reducing voting requirements, we ought to make them more strict. I believe in the poll tax. Our $2 poll tax goes straight to the schools, white and colored.

"I don't think there's any harm in a few qualified Negroes voting. But you can't open the floodgates. I don't condone violence, but the state has the right of police power to protect the health, morals and general welfare of the people. And when feelings are running high and the spark is there, they could set off a riot.

"I think the police were right in Greenwood and Jackson [scenes of summer disorders and mass arrests of Negroes seeking the vote and other civil rights]. And about these peaceful grievances, they should not trespass on private property."

BARRETT went—"defending my state; no, not that, either, as an observer"—to the University of Mississippi upon the entrance of James Meredith to the university. He drove to Oxford with a friend, without his father's permission.

"I was close enough to the marshals to see what was happening," he related. "Some of the boys were armed, and one man was standing by the Y Building shooting out street lights with a .22 rifle. The students were jeering and sneering and occasionally tossing a cigarette butt at the marshals. All of a sudden, McShane [Chief U. S. Marshal James Joseph McShane] said, 'Gas 'em!' and from a clear blue sky, a patrolman got hit in the head, from behind, and knocked down by a marshal throwing tear gas—that metal case hit him.

"Barnett [Gov. Ross Barnett] made a mistake. That Sunday, if he'd issued a call to white males of Mississippi to stand firm at the gate, why, you'd have seen 600,000 men mustered at the gate. I know all of Holmes County would have come, except a couple of scalawags.

"I didn't attack the marshals, and I was not armed, it was not my place to. But if Governor Barnett had called the Citizens' Councils and other responsible citizens, and had said, 'Come, it is Armageddon, get your gun'—well, I certainly would. Yes, ma'am!

"Oxford seemed to me a nightmare. I felt I was not in the United States, but in Budapest or a Warsaw ghetto. If that was American action, then God save us."

If whites and Negroes attend schools together, he wonders "what's to keep little white Mary from bringing home little black Johnny from school some day, and that leads to mixed dating and mixed marriages."

Would either of his sisters grow up to choose a Negro husband? "Heavenly days, no! But girls who haven't had the upbringing would if we change the social order."

He considers Cleve McDowell, the Negro recently expelled from the University of Mississippi for carrying a gun, as "more dangerous than Meredith. The way he behaved, like I've heard people say, 'he's a good Nigra, he just wants an education.' And that would lead to acceptance. He behaved like a nigger, he would open doors, he had good manners and he scuffed his feet and held his head down. So, he could be the leak in the dike, and then the dams burst.

"Of course, Meredith was the most segregated Nigra in the United States. He was ignored. Yes." (He laughed in appreciation of the placard rhymes which appeared on the campus: "Ignore the Nigger with Vigor" and "Nigger-free in '63.") "Ole Miss has never really been integrated."

BARRETT was "not much impressed" by the Negro March on Washington. "It wasn't any different from what I see Saturday night in Lexington when they come to town to get drunk and cut up, except they're happier in Lexington." He smiled here at the remembered spectacle of Lexington police warning the tipsy Fred, "Now, Fred, how many times I got to tell you?" and at Fred's shuffling, laughing promise to stay sober.

He described Negro pleasure in Government "'modities"—the surplus foods that they get on welfare—and the willingness of "many, many, many" simply to collect relief and "'modities" rather than work. All the Negroes on the Barrett place "get real butter and cheese" from the welfare, and "we use oleo."

Barrett, a 96-average student in high school and on a scholarship at Ole Miss, would vote for Governor Barnett, "the most courageous leader of our time," for "dictator or anything." He is now more proud of being a Mississippian than an American, and laments our "Federal power, a crushing force, a rampage," under which we're "no longer the land of the free." He also deplores foreign policy which, with the United Nations, "is destroying the only pro-West governments in Africa. Katanga and the Union of South Africa, we stab them in the back."

He takes a grisly view of Federal aid to states and localities. His story is "not original," but he compares Federal aid to the starving hunter who whacked off part of his famished dog's tail, ate off the meat, and threw the bone to the beast. Whereupon the "whimpering dog," like recipients of Federal aid, gratefully "licked the hunter's hand."

SPOKESMAN—Don Barrett in his room at home in Lexington, Miss.

FOR all his lordly and loving attachment to Negro friends, Barrett sees an eventual solution in the departure of all Negroes for the North "to live on welfare," since the planters and automated land no longer need them. He also believes the Delta will be "forever agrarian," though partly industrialized with small, imported industries employing whites in a prosperous blend of his beloved old way of life and new Yankee paychecks.

This, then, is the romantic tradition and reactionary passion with which the young segregationists of a dwindling old South face the nonviolent Negro revolution. In love with the life long gone, they stand embattled, fighting change with talk of old times, planter-rulers and good servants happy in subjection.

PICTURES & PRINTS
Oestreicher's
Prestige Prints®
-WORLD'S FINEST REPRODUCTIONS OF GREAT PAINTINGS

Modigliani, "Girl in Pink" 21x15 $8.25 pp. Full Color

Vermeer, "Girl in Yellow Turban" 18½x16 $10.75 pp. Full Color

Sloane, "New England in December" 24"x36" Full Color $15.75 pp.

Gutgemon, 'Flower Serenade' & 'Flower Madrigal' Set, Each 20 x 16 Full Color $6.75 (each) pp.

Rembrandt, "Man With The Golden Helmet" 26x19½ $18.75 pp. 20½x15¼ $5.75 pp. Full Color

Berman, "Hat Seller" 25 x 19½ $12.75 pp. Full Color

■ Enjoy the world's greatest art in your own home. Oestreicher's, specialists in Prestige Prints® — offer only the finest reproductions selected for their true colors and fidelity to the original. Choose from over 300,000 old masters, moderns, contemporaries—marines, landscapes, religious subjects. "If it's in print—Oestreicher's has it." Mail orders carefully filled. (Please print.)

Fine picture framing.
All work done on premises.

Catalog illustrates over 500 works— lists over 4700. $1 pp.

Oestreicher's Prints Inc.
Dept. TM 10 43 West 46 St., N.Y. 36
Open Thursdays 'til 9 P.M. • PL 7-1190

ITALIAN FOOD
Delicacies

Ever since 1893
Manganaro's has been famous for its imported food specialties. Salamis, cheeses, pasta, cakes and other gourmet products.

SEND FOR NEW CATALOG T
MANGANARO FOODS
488 Ninth Ave. (bet. 37th-38th Sts.)
New York 18. LOngacre 3-5331

R+R Rel.

VJ
PA
SB
BP
NLV

CITY OF ATLANTA

Atlanta 3, Georgia

SAM MASSELL, JR.
President, Board of Aldermen

November 13, 1963

Mr. Lester Maddox
Committee for Human and Property Rights
891 Hemphill Avenue, N.W.
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Mr. Maddox:

This is to acknowledge your telegram of November 12th, requesting a meeting with members of the Atlanta Board of Aldermen regarding racial problems.

It is my personal policy to meet, upon request, with any recognized civic organization at times mutually convenient for the purpose of exploring problems and possible solutions. I am interested in all of Atlanta's people, and as a public official, elected by the city-at-large, I feel I have a responsibility to represent them all equally, whether or not I always agree with them on debatable issues.

If you and your organization accept the premise that all people are entitled to equal rights and if you profess opposition to discrimination against people, based on race, religion or nationality, then we may proceed to make arrangements for a conference. If you cannot begin with this foundation, which I feel is so basic in the Godly, humane and democratic way of American life, then it would be a waste of time for us to discuss the problem further.

Awaiting your reply, I shall hold open 3:00 P.M. on Friday, November 29th. If this is convenient for you, I will be available and will invite the other members of the Board. So that proper seating arrangements may be made, please also advise me the names of the officers of your organization who will accompany you at this meeting.

Sincerely,

Sam Massell, Jr.

Sam Massell, Jr.
(Office: 40 Pryor Street, S.W.)

SM, Jr:epv

INTERMARRIAGE AND THE RACE PROBLEM—

As Leading Authorities See It

"The New York Times" recently reported:

"Marriages between Negroes and whites have been increasing in New York and have become a poignant part of the life of the city."

How widespread is racial intermarriage? Although banned by law in 19 States, is it increasing in other parts of the nation?

What effect is intermarriage likely to have on the nation's race problem? On the nation itself, and on its people?

Is the U. S. population on the way to becoming a blend of races?

Such questions are being raised with increasing frequency as the Negro drive for equality spreads across the country.

For answers, members of the staff of "U. S. News & World Report" interviewed some of the world's leading authorities on race and race problems. Following, in their own words, are their views on a controversial subject.

"YOU CAN'T CHANGE SOCIAL SITUATION BY LAWS"

Interview with Dr. Gunnar Myrdal, Swedish social economist, now professor of international economics at University of Stockholm

At STOCKHOLM

Q Dr. Myrdal, in 1944 you wrote a book about the Negro problem, calling it "An American Dilemma." Do you now foresee a solution to that problem?

A Solution? Well, you can find solutions to technical problems. But in social problems—particularly those which are so intrinsically difficult and mixed up as the Negro problem—there is no solution, in an absolute sense.

You don't change the over-all situation by law. In a sociological problem, what we mean by a solution is something creating conditions for development in the right direction, toward an improvement. But there is no real solution, like solving a mathematical equation.

Q Do you mean you can't change the situation by laws?

A I wouldn't want to say that exactly. You change the situation by laws to an extent, but not wholly.

Put it this way: The whole protest movement in which the Negroes are engaging now is directed primarily at civil rights in what we might call the broader sense, including the right to be employed, to have equal employment opportunities.

All right, let's say this is achieved by law—that the Negro has the same right to a job as a white man and is not discriminated against when he applies for the job.

But you would still have Negroes living grouped together, segregated, and they would remain a substantial part of the American people who have less schooling and not-so-good schooling and live in slums. And his rate of unemployment would be higher, on the average, than the white man's.

But I wouldn't say that the law isn't changing things. It

Dr. Gunnar Myrdal, a Swedish economist of international reputation, was chosen by the Carnegie Foundation in 1937 to direct a study of the American Negro. A result was publication in 1944 of his book, "An American Dilemma; The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy." This book was cited by the U. S. Supreme Court in its 1954 ruling that segregated schools deprived Negroes of equal opportunity. Dr. Myrdal has been Sweden's Minister of Commerce. Now 64 and a professor at the University of Stockholm, he has continued close study of the U. S. and has just written a book, "Challenge to Affluence," dealing with the U. S. economy.

Copyright © 1963, U. S. News & World Report, Inc.

very definitely is changing things. But you can't change a whole social situation and a whole nation merely by laws.

There are many other things which have to be done at the same time. And I think the really encouraging thing about the situation is the position which the press and other enlightened leadership have taken in America at this time—in both North and South, incidentally. They have understood that changing the law is not enough.

Q What more is needed?

A If the Negro wants better housing, then you must improve housing generally. If you want to improve Negro education, you must improve your school situation for poor people all over America. And this means more doctors, more lawyers, more teachers, more schools, better schools. And all this costs an awful lot of money. You see what I mean?

Q The Negro seems to be asking for what he calls "complete integration." Is this the answer to his problem?

A Integration is a very loose word. Sure, the Negro is asking that his color shall not be used for discriminating against him under any circumstances. He wants to be an ordinary American. As a matter of fact, he is. There is nothing strange about the Negro. He is not different from other people, except that for a long, long period, since he came to the country as a slave, he has been living under very extraordinary conditions. And he wants to be equal to other people.

Q Does this mean social equality, too—including intermarriage with whites?

A No educated or intelligent Negro could ever agree that, because of his race, it should not be possible for him to marry as he pleases. He is against that.

I don't think, however, that—as a practical thing—intermarriage is very much on his mind. It is more on the white man's mind than on the Negro's.

Q Do you mean the Negro wants to be free to marry a white person if he chooses, but that he is not very much interested in exercising that freedom?

A Well, surely, as an American citizen, he doesn't want laws that say it is a crime for him to marry a white girl. That's an open rebuff to his dignity.

But, as I pointed out in my book, there is a difference in what I call the "rank order"—order of importance—in the things that the Negro wants and the things that the whites want, or don't want, as far as the Negro is concerned.

This is a hopeful thing, I think. It means that the things the Negroes most want are the things that the whites are most prepared to give him. What the Negro is most interested in is being able to make a living, to live in decent houses, to be treated equally in the courts—not to have justice automatically against him—to have equality in social-welfare policy. He wants not to be discriminated against in buses and in public facilities of various sorts and so on.

What the whites call "social equality" is much lower on the Negro's value scale. However, he does want social equality, too, and the right to marry freely.

But now take the white man: He is most against what the Negro wants least—intermarriage and miscegenation. Most white Americans now are getting prepared to give the Negro what he wants most, which are the things I mentioned before, such as being able to earn a living without being discriminated against and having equally good schools—and you can't have equality in school if you have separate schools; it doesn't work.

In this difference in "rank order" you have the possibility of progress as far as the Negro is concerned.

Q Should all laws against racial marriage and miscegenation be eliminated?

A I do believe that every Negro and every good American must be against these laws because they are obviously discriminating. But I don't believe that eliminating them solves any problem.

Incidentally, the big period of miscegenation was during slavery. This is why, say, 80 per cent of American Negroes have white blood in them. Slavery was the time of real miscegenation. There was also a lot of it in the period after slavery. But I think there has gradually been less and less of it, partly because the Negro knew he was being exploited. It was the Negro woman who was exploited by the white man. This has produced a very deep feeling about miscegenation in the Negro.

INTERMARRIAGE AND THE RACE PROBLEM

continued

Of course, from a scientific point of view, there is no reason why people shouldn't marry as they please and get along with each other.

Q How does intermarriage affect the races involved?

A Well, race, race—we are all a mixture of many things. You have much Negro blood mixed in the peoples of Southern Europe. I don't have the source now, but I remember that there was a large Negro population in one of the big British port cities, and this Negro blood now has disappeared by absorption into the white population. We are all mixed in our racial character.

Q Do you mean that the Negroes in America—10 per cent of the population—could be absorbed into the white race through intermarriage?

A Well, you're putting a rather hypothetical question there, because something like that is not in the cards. I don't think anything like that is going to happen very soon, for various reasons. Even if it did happen, maybe the whites might be a little darker, or even a little gayer, something like that. But I wouldn't put any importance on it. All big countries are a mixture of all sorts of races, anyhow, if you go back thousands of years to where we started from.

Q Why don't you think such a racial absorption is going to happen in the U. S.?

A Well, it won't as long as there is racial prejudice—and remember you'll have racial prejudice even if you take away the legal and institutional barriers, even if you create full formal equality, which, by the way, I believe will come in 10 years, being rather optimistic myself.

Nevertheless, there will be feelings on the white side which, in most cases, will prevent intermarriage. And there is, also, not prejudice, but a certain pride on the Negro side. The intellectual, upper-middle-class Negro particularly feels, first of all, a shame about the long period of miscegenation when his Negro women were exploited by white men. Furthermore, the Negro also has a sort of racial pride.

I don't think normally the Negro is looking for a white girl. This is a kind of bug in the white man's brain—that the Negro is particularly anxious to marry his daughter. I've not seen very much of that.

Anyway, I don't think this business of intermarriage has much to do with the problem at all—not at all. I don't think it's practical. But, of course, America is full of racial prejudice in many other aspects. You have anti-Semitism. It's not only the Negroes who are segregated in housing. Jews and some other peoples also are.

Q Do you think that the fear of racial interbreeding accounts for a lot of the white resistance to integration?

A In principle, yes. But one has to be very careful here. To a large extent the fear of interbreeding is a kind of rationalization. It is a stereotype which developed in order to bring some sort of order and rationality into their attitudes. It is very convenient if you want to keep school kids segregated to say that we don't want to bring on miscegenation. To some extent this is just a pretense, this fear.

You see, this intermarriage business is used all the time by people who want to prevent advancement by the Negro. There is a lot of irrational feeling and irrational belief in this intermarriage fear, and probably many people genuinely have these fears, but it's a foggy and phony idea.

Q Is there any scientific or historical reason for believing that racial mixture is bad for a country?

A We have had a great deal of intermixture in every country, if you look back far enough.

I don't think there is any scientific foundation for believing that intermixture of the races is detrimental to the quality of a country's people. There is none if you talk about it in biological terms or in psychological terms.

"MOTIVE FOR INTERMARRIAGE OFTEN NEUROTIC"

Interview with Dr. Ernest van den Haag, professor of social philosophy, New York University

Q Professor van den Haag, do you see any real solution for the race problem in this country?

A Well, I don't know what is meant by "solution." Some people have proposed racial intermarriage as the only ultimate solution—intermarriage to such an extent that there wouldn't be any real Negroes left.

Q Do you think intermarriage is a solution?

A I think it's an insulting proposal—insulting to the Negroes and to everyone else.

Q Why do you consider it insulting?

A Because it seems to imply that Negroes and whites, as long as they remain Negroes and whites, will necessarily hate each other, and that the only way to avoid hating each other will be that they stop being Negroes and whites and all become gray or brown or something like that.

Q Do you think this is likely to happen here—that Americans will some day blend into a common color?

A No, I don't think there will be racial intermarriage on a scale large enough to produce such a result.

Q Do you foresee any great increase in intermarriage?

A There will be an increase, certainly, over the amount there is now. But I think it will remain stabilized on a fairly low level. I really doubt that it will be on a scale such that it can even come near causing the Negro race to disappear.

But even if Negroes should disappear, as a distinct race, it still would not be a solution to the problem. Some people would still be lighter in color than others, and the same problems that arise now would continue to rise.

Dr. Ernest van den Haag is a sociologist and a psychoanalyst as well as a professor of social philosophy at New York University. He has dealt with race relations in several publications, including his latest book, "Passion and Social Constraint." Born in Holland in 1914, he studied in Italy and France, came to U. S. in 1940, completed his education in this country. He formerly taught at City College of New York, Brooklyn College and University of Minnesota.

Let me point out that in places like India, numerous lawsuits occur in which the bridegroom complains that the bride had been powdered when presented to him so as to appear lighter in color than she actually was. So, even in a population which is relatively homogenized in skin color, as in India, the light-colored skin is preferred to the darker-colored skin, and the same sort of difficulties arise that we encounter here.

Q Do you mean that humans are so constructed that a difference in the color of their skin creates an antipathy?

A Not necessarily antipathy. But the visual aspect of another person plays an important role, particularly in sexual selection but also in other relations. After all, skin is the most visible part of the body and I cannot believe that people will ever disregard it.

Now, I don't wish to indicate that people will necessarily be hostile to people of a different skin color. What I do wish to make plain is that people will consider skin color as part of their aesthetic and psychological evaluation of another person. Since skin colors will remain different—regardless of intermarriage—this problem will remain with us.

Q Has there already been a considerable mixing of the white and black races in this country?

A Yes. But, you see, "interbreeding" and "intermarriage" are very different things. The normal disposition in most people is to prefer people who look like themselves—people of the same kind. There are deviations from that, but this would be the normal disposition. I think, on the whole, people are likely to prefer to marry in their own race.

Q Is there a basic difference—a difference in cultural heritage, you might call it—that sets the black and white races apart and which is hard to overcome, even when they live in the same environment?

A There are basic differences in culture, but whether these differences are due to race is an open question. The fashionable reply 50 years ago would have been to say that the differences in culture are absolutely linked to genetic differences of race.

The fashionable reply today is to say that the differences in culture are absolutely not related to race.

I regard both these replies as merely fashions. As for the evidence, it is simply not conclusive, either way.

There is no explanation satisfactory to my mind as to why, for instance, Negroes in Africa never invented a written language or built a major political empire, as almost every other race has done. There may be a racial connection. But we don't know the nature of the connection, if any.

Q What about the effect on individuals of extensive interbreeding?

A The effect on individuals is individual, so I cannot generalize on that. From the physical standpoint, some anthropologists feel that some difficulties can result, but the evidence is not strong enough to indicate that we have much to fear from that.

Psychologically, the difficulties that result tend to be much more social in origin than genetic.

Q Do children of mixed marriages face special difficulties?

A Such children often do not have a sense of belonging to either side. Under present circumstances, a mixed marriage does give its children a special handicap. Now, in a completely mixed society, it would be different. But we don't have a mixed society, and that's that.

Q How about the problems faced by the husband and wife in a mixed marriage? Is there any evidence to indicate how such marriages usually work out?

A I practice as a psychoanalyst, and I have treated some cases of people involved in mixed marriages. I haven't encountered many such marriages which seemed very happy.

In the cases that have come to my attention, the motive for intermarriage was often neurotic. Usually the white person would marry a Negro as a way of defying authority. The person that I would consider psychologically healthy is not very likely to intermarry under present circumstances.

Here I don't wish to be misunderstood. I don't mean to say that everybody who marries a person of a different color is neurotic. What I'm saying is that under present circumstances, in our society, the probability of a neurotic motive is exceedingly high.

But if the motive for marrying a person of another race is healthy—a genuine personal feeling for that person—I don't see any good reason why the marriage shouldn't work out, though it might face social difficulties. There is usually bitter opposition to such a marriage on the part of the parents.

Q Do you expect that, as integration increases and the number of mixed marriages grows, there will be increasing social acceptance of mixed marriage? Or will there be a rising resistance?

A I think probably there will be some of both results. In some circles, there will be greater acceptance, while some other circles will be reinforced in their rejection. The likelihood is that there will be deeper splits, if anything, in attitudes.

(continued on next page)

HOW MANY INTERRACIAL MARRIAGES?

There are no official statistics to show the number of Negroes married to whites in the U. S.

Estimates vary widely. A 1956 survey indicated that, in States where mixed marriages are legal, fewer than 1 in 20 married Negroes have non-Negro spouses and fewer than 1 in 200 of all marriages are between white and Negro. Andrew D. Weinberger, a New York lawyer who has made studies of miscegenation laws, estimated recently there are almost 1 million interracial married couples in the U. S. But he says some 810,000 of these are not known as mixed marriages because they involve persons of mixed ancestry "passing" as whites.

INTERMARRIAGE AND THE RACE PROBLEM

continued

Q All in all, what do you expect will be the effect of intermarriage on the race problem in the U. S.?

A I don't regard it as either a threat or a promise. I do not think it is likely to be very significant.

Q What do you foresee as the answer?

A I think that material discrimination can be eliminated, to a large extent, by appropriate legal measures—and I would be in favor of such measures. By "material discrimination" I mean discrimination that places someone else at a material disadvantage because of race.

Personal preferences, however, cannot be thus eliminated—nor do I think we have a right to ask people to give up their preferences. If a man says, "I don't like Negroes," that's a preference, just as though he were to say, "I don't like blondes." And as long as he does not discriminate against Negroes—that is, as long as he does not place them at a material disadvantage merely because of his personal dislike—then I think he is entitled to his dislikes.

Furthermore, in my opinion, a man is entitled, if he wishes, to remain separated from Negroes, wherever possible—a right to mix or not to mix, provided again that he does not thereby place the other person at a material disadvantage.

In the long run, we must hope that people will find it possible to accept the justice of nondiscrimination—but be content with the fact that some people simply don't like some other people. They have a right to likes and dislikes on any basis.

"NEVER LOOK TO INTERMARRIAGE AS A SOLUTION"

Interview with Dr. James M. Nabrit, Jr., President, Howard University, Washington, D. C.

Q Dr. Nabrit, do you think that we are going to see more racial intermarriage in the future in this country?

A I don't think so.

You know, intermarriage is a two-way street. It takes two people. And there just doesn't seem to be much desire for intermarriage on the part of either group. So I would never look to intermarriage as a solution to our problem. There just isn't that much intermarriage and I don't believe there's going to be that much.

Q How much importance do Negroes attach to interracial marriage?

A To an individual, marriage is a major interest. But up to this time interracial marriages have not risen to the level of importance which would warrant any broad legal consideration or treatment. Many questions of disabilities affecting masses of Negroes and other racial minorities are too critical for a diversion of scarce legal talent into studying the relatively minor area of interracial marriage.

In my teaching on civil rights over the years, we expended our efforts on basic areas of civil rights—namely, suffrage, housing, transportation, employment, education, public accommodations and justice before the courts.

Dr. James M. Nabrit, Jr., is a Negro lawyer and educator. As a lawyer, he handled many cases involving Negro civil rights. As an educator, he organized and taught the first course in civil rights to be offered in a U. S. law school. With Howard University since 1936, he became dean of the law school there in 1958 and president of the university in 1960. His age is 63.

The subject of interracial marriages, while generating much heat, is really not of sufficient scope at the moment to merit the publicity which it is receiving.

My own personal view is that interracial marriages are constitutionally protected, but they affect such small numbers of people that their consideration might very well be postponed at this critical time in the lives of our citizens.

Q If there were more interracial marriages, do you think that would help race relations?

A I don't know. My own opinion, which is not based upon study, is that the more contacts and the more relations we have between the races, the better the understanding will be. Now, whether or not this would be helped by interracial marriages, I'm just not able to say.

Q What do you think is the practical solution to the problem of race differences in this country?

A I think the practical solution is to give the Negro certain things like a fair break at a job and at advancement on that job, a fair chance at decent housing at a price which he can pay, a fair shake at education, and an opportunity to enjoy the normal use of public accommodations.

These in themselves would occupy him for many years in trying to take advantage of them, and the development through those areas would ameliorate many other things which are really primarily acerbations. You just get so frustrated at these major things that you strike out at everything, and you get a feeling of hopelessness.

So, if you had these things, which most people in the country really don't object to as long as they are not affected—which most of them would accept—I think that to reach that stage in race relations would give us a long period in which the Negro would try to consolidate his position and consolidate these gains, and a lot of the fringe things that bother us would just vanish.

"WE'VE GOT A BLENDING OF RACES RIGHT NOW"

Interview with Dr. Margaret Mead, anthropologist and associate curator of ethnology, American Museum of Natural History, New York City

Q Dr. Mead, does the United States have a racial problem that is unique in the world today?

A We are trying to do something in the United States that has as yet never been done. We have here representatives of all the great races of mankind. They arrived here under startlingly different conditions. The white European arrived as a happy and enterprising colonist and adventurer. The African arrived as an unwilling slave. The Asians were brought in originally as manual laborers. And the American Indian, of course, is the displaced original owner of this land—displaced at a time when his civilization was at a very simple technological level.

Now, under these circumstances, with the best will in the world and with the highest religious and political ideals, it takes time to weld a unified people.

Q Do you see a solution to this problem?

A I don't think this is a single problem, or that it has a single solution. I don't like to call it a problem, but a situation. The situation contains problems—but also opportunities, hazards—and also new possibilities. You see, I don't like to describe it as the Negro problem. I think, given the situation we have in this country, we have the problem of blending peoples together harmoniously.

Q What do you mean by "blending together"—integration?

A Well, integration is the term that's being used at present, and it's being used almost exclusively to refer to Negro Americans—that is, to Americans with some African ancestry. This ignores the fact that Negro Americans have a large amount of European ancestry and are actually a new kind of people in the world.

But I think we ought to keep in mind that there are other groups in this country who are not fully integrated into American life—people who are not given all the privileges and opportunities that are appropriate for American citizens.

Q Do you think that integration will remove whatever racial difficulties exist in this country?

A No. I think people are always going to react to other people in terms of any kind of differences between them, and differences in racial ancestry are always going to be somewhat conspicuous.

Q Do you foresee a time when we will have a blending of the races in this country—a physical blending?

A Well, we've got a blending of the races right now. We have been blending busily with Africans ever since they landed on this shore. It is exceedingly difficult to find in this country today an individual of pure African descent.

Q Do you expect integration to increase the amount of blending—the amount of racial interbreeding?

A No. There may even be less.

Q Why?

A Because there may be a decreasing amount of illegal intermixture, for one thing. We've always had interracial breeding in this country. Now, the difference between interbreeding and intermarriage is that, with intermarriage, you treat the women of both races with equal courtesy and consideration. With integration, Negro women would be as well protected as white women are.

Q How about intermarriage? Will that increase?

A No, I don't see any reason to believe that there will be a great increase in intermarriage. I should think that, if we had really full integration, if Negro Americans acquired full civic and economic privileges, then conceivably the rate of intermarriage might go down. And certainly the rate of intermixture would go down, as the premium on illicit intermixture would go down. And the premium on "passing"—a person of part-African descent passing as a white—would disappear.

So, conceivably, the total amount of racial intermixture might decrease, rather than increase, because we have a general tendency in this country at the present time toward the self-segregation of like groups.

Most people nowadays want their children to marry people exactly like themselves. It makes life so much simpler if they eat the same foods and celebrate the same holidays and have the same prejudices.

When interracial marriages are fully sanctioned by society, both families are brought into the picture. Today, very often, young people who intermarry have to run away because they are marrying against the disapproval of both of their families and the entire society. And the average Negro family is not going to welcome intermarriage any more than the average white family.

Dr. Margaret Mead is internationally known as an ethnologist, anthropologist and writer. She has made intensive studies of primitive societies and written several books about them. She also has made a continuing study of modern American society. Now, at 61, she is a professor of anthropology at Columbia University and associate curator of ethnology at the American Museum of Natural History in New York City.

Q Then you don't expect intermarriage to be a material factor in race relations in this country?

A Oh, yes. I think that every interracial marriage which is agreed to by both races—specifically by the families of the marrying pair—and which is treated with respect by society increases the possibility of both groups treating each other as equals. Americans, on the whole, do not believe that anyone they don't marry is their equal.

Q With the present attitudes of society, could interracial marriages impair racial relations, retard integration?

A To the extent that cross-racial marriage is heavily disapproved or punished in any way, this creates a temporary hazard to the orderly progress of integration, because it is not intermarriage that the Negroes are primarily working for at present. They are working primarily for public privilege and responsibility and opportunity—for the right to vote, to buy a house in the same way that others buy houses, to send their children to a good school, and to have equal economic opportunity.

INTERMARRIAGE AND THE RACE PROBLEM

continued

Intermarriage is not something that Negroes articulately are working for. Therefore, to put intermarriage at the forefront of the discussion is, to a degree, a distortion of what is actually going on in the civil-rights movement.

Q As an anthropologist, do you see anything especially injurious or especially beneficial in race mixing?

A Well, there is a condition known as "hybrid vigor" which sometimes characterizes the descendants of different races or stocks—when they are physically superior in some way to either ancestral group. We recognize hybrid vigor in plants, in animals, and in human beings as well. We can also say that when a group of living beings is segregated from crossbreeding, the descendants may develop characteristic weaknesses.

In general we can say that quality of the individuals who are the offspring of crossbreeding will depend on the quality of the individuals who mate. If interbreeding occurs only among the least able members of two groups, then the outcome may be a group that is inferior to the rest of the population.

Q Is there any evidence that there are basic differences between the white and the black races that would raise a cultural barrier to their intermarriage or interbreeding?

A There is not the slightest evidence that there are any basic differences that are relevant to culture. Science has not yet demonstrated—and that's all science can ever say—that there is the slightest correlation between those particular physical characteristics which cluster to produce what we call different races and those particular characteristics that are important to the development of culture.

By "culturally relevant" I mean intellectual ability, creativity and powers of self-discipline, development and character. All these things, as far as we know now, are completely dependent in their expression on culture and learning.

Now, there's one question you have not asked that comes up in such discussions. That is the question: "Don't you believe in heredity?"

Q Do you believe in heredity?

A Of course, but individuals inherit from individuals and not from races. Because we say that there are no differences among races does not mean that we are saying there are no differences among individuals. Of course there are. Every race has very bright people and very stupid people.

But if you have one race that is socially disadvantaged, then the children of that race usually will show a lower degree of achievement when achievement is measured. Then the accusation may be made that this race has a hereditary defect. But all the evidence we have at present suggests that any widespread defective achievement which is found is the result of faulty education and social deprivation—not of race.

"I DO NOT BELIEVE THERE IS A SUPERIOR RACE"

Interview with Dr. W. Montague Cobb, head of the anatomy department, Howard University, Washington, D.C.

Q Dr. Cobb, what is the attitude among Negroes toward interracial marriages?

A I would say that, on the whole, the Negro community accepts both partners in an interracial marriage—or should we say the "foreign" partner—more readily than the white community does. There is not so much intolerance.

But there is no particular desire among Negroes to intermingle or intermarry with whites.

Q Is there objection among Negroes to marrying whites?

A No. I would say just indifference. Both of my daughters married Negroes. They had other opportunities.

Q Among Negroes, is intermarriage considered an important factor in race relations?

A It never has been.

Q Do you anticipate any big increase in mixed marriages?

A There would be no deluge of interracial marriages even if there were no bars to them whatsoever, because that is not taking place now where the opportunity exists.

Q Do you think that, if there were more mixed marriages, it would increase social acceptance of them? Or would it increase racial tension?

A I can't evaluate that, but I don't think that anyone would advocate increasing mixed marriages. Marriage is a personal thing. I don't see how you can force it.

Q Do interracial marriages face considerable difficulties in the United States at present?

A Sometimes. There are places where an employe could be discharged if it is known that he or she is married to a member of the other racial group. In small communities, no matter how enlightened—like, say, university towns—the interracial couple is likely to have it hard. In large or cosmopolitan areas, where identities are not so important and there is relatively little neighborhood gossip, it doesn't matter so much. I know of a number of interracial marriages which are successful, and some that have broken up—but not on the grounds of race.

Q Does the child of an interracial marriage face a severe handicap?

Dr. W. Montague Cobb is an anatomist, physical anthropologist and medical writer. A graduate of Howard University, Western Reserve University and Amherst College, he has taught anatomy at Howard since 1942, headed its anatomy department since 1947. His writings include biological studies of the U. S. Negro. He is 59, describes himself as of mixed race.

A No. Now, on this matter of intermarriage—I'd like to put that in the rather minor perspective in which I consider it by referring to what is talked about as "biological inferiority."

We know that people differ in their individual abilities and special talents, but there has never been any particular segment of mankind which has had a monopoly on superior ability or talent. And no great culture has developed in isolation. The possession of a capacity and its development are two different things.

Great cultures, or people with great potential, can stagnate by lack of contact. I do not believe that there is an inferior or a superior race.

Now, as to what harm admixture does, I don't know of any evidence for that.

I am an admixed person myself and so I am able to regard this problem a little more objectively than someone who thinks he is all white—or all anything else. I have some Indian ancestors, some Caucasian—not known to me—and a larger segment of Negroid.

I've been unable to isolate any of my own qualities and say, "This came from that ancestor," or so on. And as far as I'm concerned, the racial identity of the fellow I've got to compete against has no meaning at all. And I am sure that there has never been any biological antipathy between human groups.

Furthermore, the white man doesn't know how many Negro genes he's got in him.

"NATURE DOESN'T CARE—BUT SOCIETY OFTEN DOES"

Interview with Dr. Brewton Berry, professor of sociology and anthropology, Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio

Q Dr. Berry, is interracial marriage increasing in the United States?

A It is my understanding that there has been a slight increase in some places, such as New York. But the increase has not been sufficiently large to make it significant. It's very difficult to get reliable statistics on that subject. But the number of marriages between Negro and white is really very small in this country.

There has been, however, a great deal of mixing of white and Negro in this country—with or without marriage. This has been going on since colonial times.

The result is that about 70 per cent or so of the American Negroes today have some white or Indian blood—or both.

Q How about the number of whites with some Negro blood?

A Well, that's a subject that's almost impossible to study, since white people who are aware of Negro ancestry would conceal it. But there has been some investigation of that.

One study, using a rather elaborate statistical methodology, arrives at the conclusion that about 20 per cent of the white people in the United States have some Negro ancestry. I think this is not at all difficult to believe, because there's always been a certain amount of "passing." People leave the Negro race and slip over into the white classification surreptitiously. In my recent book, "Almost White," I deal with a considerable population that is in the process of doing that now.

Q How extensive is this "passing"?

A Sociologists have studied this question, and a conservative estimate, I would say, is that 2,500 persons per year resign from the Negro race and take up life as whites. Some people put the number much higher than that.

Q It has been suggested by some that mixing of the races—widespread intermarriage—might help solve the racial problems that exist in this country. As a sociologist, what is your view on that?

A I can't see intermarriage as a feasible or practical solution of any problem. It seems to me that when unlike racial and ethnic groups begin to eliminate their differences, intermarriage generally follows. But it's a consequence of solving the tensions and conflicts—not a means of solving them.

Q If intermarriage should become so extensive as to produce a racially blended population—

A I don't believe that intermarriage results in a blended population. Even with intermarriage occurring over a long period of time, we would still have persons who are physically different from each other, so that we would still have these racial characteristics that we could use as symbols of status if we chose to. So I don't see intermarriage as really relevant to the solution of our problem.

(continued on next page)

Dr. Brewton Berry is the author of an award-winning textbook, "Race Relations," and of a recent study of Americans of mixed racial descent, "Almost White." A graduate of Wofford College, Yale University and the University of Edinburgh, he taught at the Universities of Missouri and Rhode Island, and has been professor of sociology and anthropology at Ohio State University since 1946. His age is 62.

INTERMARRIAGE AND THE RACE PROBLEM

continued

Q What has been the result in countries where there has been extensive intermixing of the races?

A In countries such as Brazil it is still advantageous to be light, rather than dark, and a black skin is still a social handicap—although they do not attach anything like the significance to it that we do.

Q What are the effects of race mixing on individuals?

A The effects of interbreeding depend not on biology, but on the social situation.

From a biological point of view, there has been a difference of opinion among scientists as to the biological consequences. Some have maintained that its results are disastrous—that it results in what they call "disharmonious combinations." Other biological scientists have maintained that the biological consequences are advantageous—that it results in what is known as "hybrid vigor."

My personal opinion is that nature doesn't care at all. I've been studying hybrid people for several years, and I am unable to report any monstrosities that result from the mixture. Nor do I find any great abundance of genius. So, in my opinion, nature doesn't care—one way or another—about the mixing of races. But society often cares. The social consequences are extremely important.

Q Do many Negroes want to marry whites?

A No. I think that intermarriage is at the bottom of their priority list. What Negroes want are their rights as citizens. I think most articulate Negroes would say that they feel if Negroes want to marry whites they should have the legal right to do so. But it's one thing to want the right and another thing to want the marriage. And Negroes, I think, have little or no desire for marriage with whites.

Q If there were a sizable increase in mixed marriages in the U. S., would there be a greater social acceptance of them, or would resistance rise?

A Generally, I think, our prejudices follow our behavior, rather than the reverse, and if a particular practice became common or widespread, we would come to accept it. We get used to certain patterns of race relations and learn to accept them. I grew up in the South and I have seen this happen many times.

Q What do you see as the solution to the race problem in this country?

A Well, wherever unlike groups of people live together, there's always tension and friction. This has always been the case, and probably will continue to be.

However, friction and tension and conflict can be reduced, if not entirely eliminated.

There are many places, in our own country and elsewhere, where unlike peoples have learned to dwell together in peace and harmony, so I think there is a possibility of our minimizing or reducing, if not completely solving, our race problem.

Q How can we achieve this peace and harmony?

A In my opinion, the United States has done a very good job in resolving many of our minority problems—a much better job than most other countries. With respect to our Negro minority, we probably have done the poorest—and with respect to the American Indians, too.

Now, I would say that, in resolving a problem with minority groups, one fact that has to be considered is the wishes of the minority. There are some minority groups that don't want to be integrated. In the case of the Negro, he wants to be integrated into the mainstream of American society. And I think that no solution is possible as long as we frustrate that wish. So I think that the solution lies in our eliminating the discriminations that the Negro suffers. But that is only part of the story.

Q What is the rest of the story?

A I think the Negro himself needs to be prepared for integration through an educational program. We tend to blame most of our troubles on discrimination. But if discrimination could be eliminated instantly we would still have the problem because most Negroes lack the education and the skills to take advantage of the opportunities that integration would offer.

Also, the fact that we have an unemployment problem in this country means that, even if the Negro had the education and the skills, there still are not enough jobs, and he is the one who feels the pinch first.

So I think the solution of the problem in this country lies in resolving our problem of unemployment, in improving the education of the Negro, and in the continuing elimination of the discriminatory obstacles that Negroes face.

"RACIAL MIXING COULD BE CATASTROPHIC"

Interview with Dr. Henry E. Garrett, professor emeritus of psychology, Columbia University, and visiting professor of educational psychology, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Va.

Q Dr. Garrett, it has been suggested by some people that intermixing of the white and Negro races might be a solution to the race problem in this country. From your studies of racial differences, what is your opinion?

A I think racial mixing is undesirable in this country and could be catastrophic. Racial amalgamation would mean a general lowering of the cultural and intellectual level of the American people.

Q Why?

A From what we know about race differences, the Negro has less of what I call "abstract intelligence" than the white man. He functions at a lower level when it comes to the sort of ability that creates a modern technical society. That is, he is not so able to think in terms of symbols—words, numbers, formulas, diagrams.

Q What is the evidence for that?

A The evidence goes back over nearly 50 years of psychological testing in this country. The differences between the two racial groups in a variety of mental tests are so large, so regular and so persistent under all sorts of conditions that it is almost unthinkable to conclude that they are entirely a matter of environment.

Dr. Henry E. Garrett is a psychologist. Born in Virginia in 1894, he is a graduate of the University of Richmond and Columbia University. He taught at Columbia for 33 years, was head of the psychology department there from 1941 to 1956, now is professor emeritus at Columbia and visiting professor at the University of Virginia. He has written several books and made studies of racial comparisons.

Q What are these differences?

A In recent studies in the South, it has been confirmed that, on the average, the Negro pupil is from 15 to 20 points in I.Q. behind the average white pupil in the kind of abstract intelligence that I spoke of. In school performance in the elementary grades the Negro lags from one to three grades behind the white student. In high school the lag is much greater.

Q Do you mean that the Negro race is somehow inferior to the white race?

A I don't mean that the Negro is generally inferior. Physically, he is certainly as strong and agile as the white man. But there are differences in the biology, in the brain structure and in the blood groupings of whites and Negroes. These are not very large, to be sure, but they are large enough to convince many of us that there are significant differences between the two racial strains, besides those brought out on the tests.

Q Have any of these differences shown up in the Negro's behavior or accomplishment?

A The fact that the Negro lags in abstract intelligence—in the ability to deal with symbols—is shown, I think, in his history.

The Negro in Africa has exhibited little capacity for creating a civilization such as that in Europe. He is today pretty much where he was 5,000 years ago. South of the Sahara Desert there was never any literate civilization. The Negro invented no system of writing. He didn't build a bridge or a terrace, domesticated no animals, did not discover the principle of the wheel, probably did not discover how to build a fire.

Arnold Toynbee, the eminent British historian, has said that, of the 21 great civilizations of the past, not one was in black Africa.

It seems to me that this fits in with the lag which we find in this country in mental testing.

Now, when you come to a race mixture, I don't see that there would be any evil effects so far as the physical structure of the hybrid is concerned. We all know that the mulatto is viable—he lives as long as the Negro or the white man. The difficulty, it seems to me, comes in mass mixing, which is the goal of the Negro pressure groups.

Q Do you think that mass intermarriage is a major Negro goal?

A You can't help but think so. If you look at any Negro newspaper or magazine, or if you listen to the statements made by such people as Adam Clayton Powell, the Negro Congressman from New York, you get the idea clearly brought out that what they look to is an amalgamation with the white group. I think they strive for amalgamation because they feel that they'll never get social equality without it.

Q Do you foresee a material increase in racial intermarriage as a result of integration in this country?

A I don't see how intermarriage can fail to increase if young people of both races are thrown together in their formative years. I think that's what the Southern white parent dreads most.

I am afraid that what a good many white parents are going to do is to teach their children to hate Negroes to offset what they think might be the result of intimate personal contacts.

This would lead to a very unhappy situation. We regard any alien group as people to be treated courteously and fairly only when they constitute no threat to us.

Q Isn't the Negro improving as his status improves in this country?

A The Negro has not improved intellectually in this country, relative to the white man, in spite of his great social and economic progress. In the first World War, for example, about one Negro out of seven did as well as the average white soldier. In World War II, about one in seven or eight did as well, and in the Korean War we had exactly the same ratio. That is, while both groups improved, they maintained the same relative distance, the one from the other.

I think one of the fundamental fallacies in the thinking of many people today is that the Negro is a sunburned white man, and if he is treated fairly will behave like a white man. My contention is that he will never behave like a white man because he is not a white man.

The Poles, the Italians and the Irish were assimilated into the American populace because they are all Caucasian. If the Negro is assimilated, however, you are likely to get a mixture such as one sees in some of the West Indian islands, in Puerto Rico, in parts of Brazil and in Central America.

Q What have been the results of racial amalgamation in other countries?

A I don't believe that, historically, amalgamation with the Negro has ever done anything except lower the general level of the national life of those people who have been willing to mix.

Q How long would it take to obtain a racial amalgamation in this country?

A It would probably take 200 or 300 years to absorb all of the Negroes in this country or to get their number down to a very small proportion. Even then we would probably have a caste system based on race and color—a stratification of society in which you would have a group of white people who would refuse to mix, a group of very black people of low intelligence who would not mix because they couldn't, and a large intermediate group that would continually be pressing to displace the upper white group.

Q What do you see as the ultimate solution to the race problem in the United States?

A I don't think there is any pat solution. I suspect that there will be a long series of adjustments over the years. It might well be that, as the Negro gets more status, better jobs and more acceptance in public accommodations, then he will cease to strive so hard to push into white society.

But whatever happens, I believe we'll continue to have a kind of segregated society—a society that is segregated socially, though not segregated in some other respects. [END]

The Negro-white problem is greatest in the North where the Negro is taking over the cities—and being strangled by them

Racial Collision

A Two-Part Article by

Newly militant Chicago Negroes protest school facilities at City Hall. Their demands led to school superintendent's temporary resignation.

PART I

Rushing to a Showdown That No Law Can Chart

Richard Daley, three times mayor of Chicago, is aging now. Under the shiny black vest, his girth has thickened; but the China-blue eyes in the wide, pale face still stab as he leans forward to talk to a visitor about the Negroes of Chicago.

Civil rights? Daley rumbles. Civil rights in Chicago? Negroes can vote, can't they? They can register, can't they? They can go anywhere they want, can't they? He talks of the jobs they hold, their numbers among his cops (14%), the phenomenal improvement in their education. This is Chicago, he says proudly—not Birmingham.

All that Mayor Daley says is true. Everything promised by the civil rights bill now before the Congress has long been granted to Negroes in his city. Negroes can, indeed, freely enter any hotel or restaurant in Chicago (downtown, that is, not in the suburbs). Negroes can indeed vote (seven South Side Negro wards alone provided 118,000 of the 139,000-vote margin by which Daley won re-election).

No distant federal government need intervene, as suggested by the civil rights bill, to protect Chicago's Negroes. They have their own aldermen in the city council, and it stands clearly on the record of history that Daley was the first big-city political boss to grant full equality and loyalty to the Negro captains of his Cook County machine. Out of loyalty to them—as well as to President Kennedy, whom Daley reveres—the mayor has just compelled a bitterly resentful city council to pass a bill which, if enforced, opens housing to Negroes anywhere in Chicago.

Yet, in the South Side Negro wards of Chicago, Richard Daley's name is today hissed and booed; his Negro aldermen are nicknamed "the Silent Six" by other Negroes, and scorned as part of the white man's machine. No Negro leader in Chicago can define what it is they want—except that they want action. "Dick Daley," says one leader, "is a man surrounded by tame Negroes. The mayor of this city doesn't need silent Negroes—he needs an action committee."

Daley is not the man to unburden himself to a stranger. But the fact is that he has cashed every claim he held on the loyalty and obedience of the machine in order to pass this housing bill for Negroes; it has cost him votes all through white Chicago, which resents the bill. How will he defend the action in the white wards next year—the Polish wards, the Irish wards, the Italian wards, the Jewish wards? In the gravelly, rough voice that seems to style all mayors of Chicago, Daley says he'll ask the white voters how many of their folks came over on the Mayflower. All men are equal, aren't they? And there follows, then, a recitation of the noble prose of the Declaration of Independence.

But the crisis that Daley will not discuss goes far beyond the arithmetic of voting in 1964, either in Cook County or any other big city of the U.S. For Richard Daley and the men who really lead the Chicago Negro community are out of contact: they simply do not understand each other. Whites and Negroes in his city, as in every city of the North, have passed far beyond the simple legal remedies provided by the current civil rights bill. Whether they want to or not, they must explore a future no law can chart.

Detroit's mayor is 26 years younger than Chicago's Daley. Handsome and articulate, Jerome Cavanagh, at 35, glows with the engaging freshness of the young new politician. His perspectives for the nation's fifth-largest city are large and visionary. But he wilts as he estimates that 65% of his time is spent on Detroit's Negro problem. "You come home," he says, "after one of these days and you're desolate. You've spent the entire day putting out fires—but what about the other important things?"

In Los Angeles, a woman voices the perplexity in a woman's way. Rosalind Wyman of the Los Angeles City Council: "What can you do? You sit there watching what happens in the South and you rack your brains. My God, what can you do right here in your own backyard?"

These are fragments from this reporter's notebooks after six weeks of travel through the nation's cities in a season of trouble. For, as black Americans and white Americans began, in 1963, to move toward an ultimate showdown, there were actually two stories to report. One was the battle for simple decency, fought from Birmingham picket lines to Capitol Hill, and now moving to formal climax in the civil rights legislation before Congress. But beyond this headline story looms the larger, more important, yet frighteningly obscure story of race ferment and change in the great cities, where the American Negro increasingly lives and seeks

CONTINUED

New Winegard Antenna Development for Better TV Reception!

excellent for Color and Black and White

Winegard engineers have developed a super-sensitive TV antenna that increases the amount of signal that gets to your TV set . . . at the same time knocks out ghosts, snow and other interference.

This unusual antenna is the gold anodized Winegard Colortron. It will give you sharply detailed TV pictures for color or black & white sets . . . even in difficult reception areas. It will pull in TV pictures hardly visible with ordinary antennas. And it is so powerful, you can operate 2, 3 or more TV sets from one Colortron antenna.

The Winegard Colortron works two ways to give you better reception. First, a patented Electro-lens design intercepts more signal. Second, a powerful electronic power pack amplifies the signal. The result is the finest possible reception.

Colortrons are rugged, too. Wind tested to 100 mph. Permanent GOLD ANODIZED finish won't weather-wear—stays like new for years.

For the best reception, insist on a Winegard Colortron. Four models from $24.95, electronic power pack extra . . . satisfaction guaranteed.* Ask your TV service dealer or send coupon for full story.

Guarantee in force for 90 days after installation.*

Winegard 3025-11 Kirkwood Burlington, Iowa

☐ Send FREE booklet on Colortron
☐ Send information on long distance FM reception.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

My nearest TV station is.....miles away.

Neither whites nor Negroes will look the grim facts squarely in the face

NEGROES
CONTINUED

his future. There, all that the new civil rights bill promises has already been won—from the Negro's right to vote, to his right to eat hamburgers sitting beside white men.

In the big city the story of the Negro is one of unshaped perplexity—the perplexity of the Negro with the city, and of the city with him. The city's promises to him are as large as freedom itself, but delivery on those promises is another matter. In the North, the happy, traditional refusal of the American temperament to admit that any problem is insoluble is confronted by the equally traditional but unhappy refusal to look facts squarely in the face.

White and Negro urban leaders both know that a bad situation has to be changed—all the while refusing to examine what the situation really is.

The very questions that explore this larger story have an ugly ring to them: Why, really, are white people abandoning their big cities? Will Negroes take over—and if so, when? If the centers of the cities become black and the suburban rings around them become white, what kind of metropolitan civilization will we have? Do Negroes want this? Can the cities alone support the burden of Negro need? What do northern Negroes demand and what responsibilities are they prepared to assume? Will the election of 1964 turn on the race problem and, if so, will this obscure or illuminate the nature of this crisis in American civilization?

Every story, great or small, is a story of individuals and individual decisions; and this story can begin, as this reporter began it, on a Saturday afternoon driving through Los Angeles, Calif. I was following a blue, rust-streaked sedan that was weaving with the stop-and-start uncertainty of a stranger looking for something, when I suddenly realized that the driver was looking in the wrong place.

The driver was a Negro; and he was four blocks east of Alameda Street. The children in the back seat pressed their noses against the window, peering at the palm trees of the Promised Land. But the Texas license plate said the family

CONTINUED

NEW YORK

PHILADELPHIA

DETROIT

Racial outlook for six major U.S. cities is projected against their skylines, here and on page 106. Solid line at top of each graph shows percentage of Negroes in each city by 1980 if they continue to increase at the 1940-1960 rate. Broken lines represent more conservative estimates of city planners.

A buff is enough with

With your very first Kiwi shine you get a built-in reserve. That's because Kiwi polish puts a reserve shine right into the leather of your shoes. Just a buff is enough! Shoes come back bright as new. That's why the shine you get lasts twice as long when you buff the Kiwi way. Buy Kiwi, today! Also available in Canada.

WORLD'S LARGEST SELLING SHOE POLISH

KIWI

(KEE-WEE)

THE IDEAL GIFT—KIWI SHINE KITS

Compact. Handy. Perfect for everyone, from those who polish at home to world-travellers.

Within two decades, Negroes may be in the majority in most of the largest U.S. cities

NEGROES
CONTINUED

was migrant, too newly arrived from the South to know that in Los Angeles the Negro boundary is fixed at Alameda Street. In the South, discrimination is as sharp as a knife-edge and every Negro knows where the cut comes. But in the big city it is subtler and it would probably take some time for Mr. Texas Sedan to get the message and rattle back across Alameda to the black ghetto if he wanted shelter for his family.

About a thousand Negroes like Mr. Texas Sedan come to Los Angeles every month from the South, mostly by auto. But I had also seen them come into Chicago, at midnight, up from Mississippi on the brown-and-orange special of the Illinois Central, and come into New York and Philadelphia on buses from the Carolinas and Virginia. And whether they come by car, bus or train, they all look as innocent, as hopeful, as puzzled as Mr. Texas Sedan and his wife beside him and the children in the back seat: singularly undramatic.

Yet they are the stuff of high drama—for they are history moving to a crest, feeling its way into an uncertain future, producing by accumulation these simple facts of change: Washington, D.C. is, today, almost 60% Negro in population. Within 14 to 16 years, if present population trends are arithmetically projected into the future, Negroes will be in the majority in Detroit, Cleveland, Baltimore, Chicago and St. Louis; and, in the decade following, in Philadelphia. Such arithmetical projections have, in the past, both underestimated and overestimated Negro growth figures in the big cities. But if, by the decade 1980–1990, which is almost tomorrow in the eyes of history, these unchanged trends do give America a civilization in which seven of her ten largest cities (all except New York, Los Angeles and Houston) have Negro majorities, then that civilization will be transformed.

One must look back to grasp the full dimension of the change in the nation's urban life and the direction in which it points—for this change surges from a national adventure that may, some day, be seen as romantically as the migration of the covered wagons. Until

CONTINUED

LOS ANGELES

CHICAGO

WASHINGTON

Among 10 largest U.S. cities, only Washington now has Negro majority—411,737 of 763,956 residents in 1960. By contrast, New York's 1,087,931 Negroes were 14% of total; Chicago's 812, 637 were 22.9%; Philadelphia's 529,240, 26.4%; Detroit's 482,223, 28.9%; Los Angeles' 334,916, 13.5%.

Arvin the most beautiful sound of time

ARVIN full-feature 5-tube clock radio

ARVIN BEAUTY! It's a pleasure to give or receive this slim-styled clock radio! Wrap-around, shatterproof cabinet with large clock face and luminous tipped hands adds a smart accent to your room.

ARVIN CONVENIENCE! So easy to operate! Drift off to sleep and let the Slumber Switch turn the radio off automatically. In the morning, "Wake-to-Music" or "Wake-to-Alarm." Smooth vernier top tuning provides handy, accurate station selection.

ARVIN PERFORMANCE! Finest radio reception is assured by Arvin's reliable copper photo circuitry. Powerful 5-tube performance.

ARVIN FULL TONE! Enjoy the rich sound of Arvin's big speaker, baffle-mounted in an acoustical shell behind full-front crystal.

ARVIN Model 53R27 . . . Off-White
(Model 53R28, Rose Beige). Sugg. retail $24.95

Shop for Arvin Quality Products at any of these fine stores:

True Value HARDWARE STORES
Indiana, Ohio, Ky., W. Va. Georgia, N. Car., S. Car.

V&S HARDWARE STORES
Indiana, Ohio, Ky., W. Va. Georgia, N. Car., S. Car.

RV HWI ROYAL VALUES
Indiana, Ohio, W. Va., Ky.

IVEY'S OF CHARLOTTE
CHARLOTTE

S&T STORES HARDWARE STORES
Indiana, Ky.

PEARLMAN'S FURNITURE STORES
ASHEVILLE

DAVISON-PAXON CO.
ATLANTA

GETZ Jewelers
CINCINNATI

BYRUM & BATES
GREENVILLE

H. & S. POGUE
CINCINNATI

REX RADIO & TV INC.
DAYTON

GOODMAN JEWELERS
INDIANAPOLIS

SMITH'S JEWELERY INC.
INDIANA

VICTOR
INDIANAPOLIS

WASSON'S
INDIANAPOLIS

Arvin Products are also available at many other stores in your area.

Arvin®
America's largest specialist in the manufacture of quality radios
ARVIN INDUSTRIES, INC. • Consumer Products Division, Columbus, Indiana

Everywhere 'For Sale' signs mark the edge of the Negro frontier

NEGROES
CONTINUED

1940, 75% of U.S. Negroes lived in the South, the great majority of them functionally illiterate, primitive, excluded from society and so cruelly policed as to have no respect for law but fear. But World War II made the North into a great industrial furnace—and the draft of the furnace sucked Negro labor by the scores of thousands up the Mississippi valley, up the east coast to the forges, foundries and factories of the war effort. The postwar boom and the Korean war kept the furnaces blazing and the migration northward continued. In some years in the 1950's as many as 200,000 southern Negroes moved North or West to the big cities in search of jobs and freedom.

Where they pooled, Negro death rates fell and birth rates rose. In the 20 years 1940–1960, the Negro populations of New York and Philadelphia doubled (to 1,100,000 and 529,000 respectively); the Negro populations of Chicago and Detroit tripled (to 812,000 and 480,000 respectively), and that of Los Angeles multiplied by five (from 63,000 to 335,000). Though migration from the South has now slowed, the urban Negro crude birth rate—approximately 40% larger than that of whites—continues to swell their numbers. In Chicago, for example, where Negroes have risen from 278,000 in 1940 to approximately 900,000 today, their natural-growth rate is nine times faster than it was before the war. The fertility rate of Chicago Negroes increased in the 1950–60 decade three times as fast as that of Negroes generally. We are, in short, witnessing in our cities one of the great population explosions of all time.

Something has to give. And what gives is the neighborhood pattern in big-city living as Negroes, bursting out of inhumanly crowded slums, fleeing the smell and the rats and the noise and cackle, like flood waters under pressure, squirt and spill over adjacent neighborhoods. Street by street, block by block, neighborhood by neighborhood, solid black precincts crunch their way year by year through the hearts of our cities.

In 1956, on a similar survey, I remember that the white people in Chicago still hoped to hold "them" (the blacks) to a few small

THE PUBLIC WELFARE PROBLEM

Chart of welfare costs (for general relief and aid to dependent children) shows the disproportionate amount paid to non-whites. In Los Angeles County, for example, Negroes make up 7.6% of population, get 43% of relief funds.

CONTINUED

Packed with adventure–for you

The pages of LIFE are packed with travel ideas—spectacular color photographs and alluring descriptions of exotic locales and exciting activities from here to Fujiyama. Wherever you live, wherever you've been, whatever your budget, you'll discover fascinating new places to visit in LIFE. Articles and advertisements alike offer you a wealth of helpful suggestions: where to go, where to stay, what to see and do, best way to travel, prices. So, whether you're planning now or dreaming of "some day," whether it's to a State nearby or a Shangri-la afar, keep exploring LIFE. And to be sure your journey will be packed with adventure and satisfaction, see a travel agent and choose your destination, transportation and accommodations from those that you can see...

ADVERTISED IN LIFE

A white suburban noose tightens around a Negro inner city

NEGROES
CONTINUED

beachheads north of the Chicago River which would then, as an internal Mason-Dixon Line, divide the city into a white north and a black south. This fall I found the Negro beachheads north of the Chicago River had developed into a breakthrough.

Ninety-sixth Street was to be the line protecting the "perfumed stockade" of East Manhattan, the most fashionable all-white enclave on the island. But Negroes have begun to appear on the East Side as far south as the 80s. In Boston, "they" were supposed to stop at Franklin Park; "they" have by now completely outflanked the park in Dorchester and have closed in on Blue Hill Avenue. In Los Angeles, in Philadelphia, in Cleveland, too—everywhere the For Sale and For Rent signs on lawns and apartment houses mark the moving edge of Negro frontiers. And everywhere the problem is seen shortsightedly in terms of localities, of individual block-busters or block-moppers—not as an elemental force bursting dikes.

"Where are the whites going to stop running when they know they can't hide?" asks Loren Miller, the great Negro housing champion of Los Angeles.

The answer is, of course, as clear as the maps that chart Negro expansion: "they," the whites, are going to the suburbs. There, a white population explosion in the suburban ring matches the Negro population explosion in the central city.

In Chicago, in Philadelphia, in Boston—everywhere except New York City—the same pattern repeats itself; the suburban "white noose" tightens about an inner city that is becoming more and more rapidly Negro while, within the strangulating city, a turmoil begins that feeds on fear and hate.

To understand what is happening inside the major urban centers, one must look freshly at the city—for city-Americans behave in silent patterns which are familiar to all of us, yet totally at variance with what is publicly taught us about the metropolitan melting pot.

The melting pot melts different minorities at different rates. Also, from Boston to Los Angeles, most urban Americans live in neighborhoods of their own "kind," with people of their own origins and traditions. One usually leaves the "old neighborhood" to move up. Thereafter, most racial and ethnic groups in America sort themselves out by income and class. In the new neighborhoods they "mix" with "strangers" only as education grows, and then by seeking out people of kindred interest: businessmen with businessmen, professionals with professionals, union leaders with union leaders, politicians with politicians. The lower the educational level, the more people tend to cluster with their "own kind," seeking social life with those who live nearby.

What makes a neighborhood different from a ghetto is simply that a man can always choose to leave his neighborhood—but in a ghetto he is locked in.

When Negro leaders call their neighborhoods ghettos, they mean that they are locked in; and thus the black ghettos become, for sensitive and aspiring Negroes, prisons. Most Negro leaders are convinced that if Negroes were free to move anywhere they want, they—like most other ethnic groups—would prefer to live with their own and sort themselves out into the quiet and the noisy, the diligent and the shiftless. But Negroes are given no elbow room.

Most Negro communities expand only by crude pressure of numbers—the resistance outside usually determining the rate and direction of growth. Across the country Negroes usually gobble up Jewish neighborhoods first, then Italian neighborhoods. In the folklore of the big city, Negroes meet their toughest resistance in Polish or Irish neighborhoods, so that police watch the frontiers of a Polish-Negro or Irish-Negro neighborhood as a potential flash-line.

In the big cities, thus, two primordial emotions confront each other: one is that of the Negro who wants out, who wants room and dreaming space; the other is that of the white workingman who has the deep emotional need and hunger to live comfortably with others

CONTINUED

Three miles apart stand a model Negro district and a hideous slum

NEGROES
CONTINUED

like himself. For many a white workingman, his two-family house represents the dream-end of life. He plans to live on the lower floor, rent the upper floor and add the rent to Social Security or pension, finishing his life in modest contentment near his friends, watching his grandchildren grow up. For him, the Negro neighbor ravages the dream.

When the Negroes' tormenting need for housing rubs against the tormenting need of other American groups to live with their own kind, trouble comes; and very few men in the big city, as we shall see later, have had the candor to examine this problem in public and explore practical solutions that may meet both needs.

Any solution, or any approach to a solution, must begin with commonly agreed facts. Yet the facts attack any reporter who examines the Negro community with this paradox: the progress of Negroes in the North breathes hope into the meanest of men; at the same time the internal decomposition of Negro society frightens the most hopeful of men. In the big city things are better than ever for the Negro—and they are also worse.

The big city is a street called "John R" in Detroit—a dirty, trash-littered cord of filth running through the center of the Negro ghetto. John R. is the center of one of the two worst crime districts in all Detroit (the other is Twelfth Street, also an all-Negro neighborhood). But just three miles away is a district called Conant Gardens. There elm trees arch over the street, the white churches nestle on green lawns, teen-agers shyly court each other on porches; the smell of fall makes the air fragrant. This is the kind of suburb Longfellow might have envisioned as an American future. Conant Gardens is a working-class, lower-middle-income district distinguished for two reasons: it is the most crime-free precinct in the most crime-free district in the entire city of Detroit; and it is also 100% Negro. What makes the Negroes of Conant Gardens such superb citizens, and the Negroes of John R. such a menace to society? No one can answer more adequately, as we shall see later, than to say that these outer differences measure the distance between self-respect and despair.

In the big cities of the North, Negroes have found success and

CONTINUED

NON-WHITES WITH COLLEGE DEGREES

TOTAL NON-WHITES AGE 25 AND OVER

Number of college-educated non-whites (above) has risen to a still inadequate 3.5% of the adult non-white population (among whites it is 8%). Nevertheless the number of college graduates is rising rapidly at faster rate than non-white population (right).

The new chili made with "kettle-braised" beef!

"Kettle-Braised" Beef—Here's lean beef, specially prepared and then gently braised in steaming kettles. Careful cooking like this locks in all the rich juice and wholesome flavor of the beef.

Hearty Beans—Big, red and delicious—made for solid eating.

Special Seasoning—It's the Chef's own secret. He makes chili the way you like it—just right. No need to pep it up or tone it down. So put a lift in your next meal with Chef Boy-Ar-Dee "Kettle-Braised" Beef Chili with Beans. Deliciously exciting!

CHEF BOY-AR-DEE®

Automation knows no prejudice, but it still costs the Negroes jobs

NEGROES
CONTINUED

disaster at the same time. Success is the political power to claim in one recent year over 30 judgeships in New York City. Success is as tangible as Baldwin Hills in Los Angeles, with its slickly modern homes and their ground ivy, their fiber palms, their dichondra lawns. Success is Pasadena, with its small colony of Negro scholars, engineers, scientists. Success is education—in 1947 U.S. colleges and professional schools counted 124,000 Negroes; in 1961 they enrolled 233,000. Success is Negroes directing embassies, leading orchestras, commanding Army units. In the decade of the '50s alone, the number of Negro engineers jumped fivefold. Since 1940 Negroes have claimed government jobs more and more insistently—and won them, particularly in the big cities. In that period Negroes employed in government jumped from some 4.5% to almost 13% (in Philadelphia, to about 50%). Success has found the Negro in the big city and delivered to him not only a solid, educated middle-class but given him a leadership group of dazzling achievement in the arts, in writing, in politics, in sports and in their own community affairs.

But disaster also has found him in the city. The Negro who migrated to the North came chiefly to work at the heavy jobs—the steel mills, the packing houses, the assembly lines. For the past 10 years these jobs have been evaporating as automation has condemned scores of thousands of middle-aged Negroes to discard, and scores of thousands of their youngsters to a future that holds nothing.

In Detroit proper, for example, the largest employer of labor is Chrysler—and until late this summer, before the new-model boom, in the automated metals division of Chrysler, layoffs under union seniority rules affected every man hired after February 1948. Automatically and without prejudice the great mass of Negroes who migrated to Detroit in the '50s was eliminated. In Chicago, erstwhile "Hog Butcher for the World," the packing houses once employed 20,000 workers, heavily Negro. Today Chicago no longer butchers hogs for the world, for the packers have moved out to new and more efficient plants and their South Side workers will never be employed again. In Chicago the Urban League estimates that 18% of all employable Negroes are unemployed.

Generally, across the country, unemployment averages 5.6%, but

CONTINUED

NON-WHITES IN GOVERNMENT JOBS

TOTAL NON-WHITES EMPLOYED

Key role of municipal and federal governments in broadening Negro opportunity shows in this comparison: non-whites in government jobs almost tripled in 20-year period (above). Non-white employment rose only 44% (right).

THE

TIME READING PROGRAM

RTP

For the well informed, demanding reader, choosing a book to occupy valuable reading time can be time consuming itself—and often disappointing. Above are four deluxe paper-bound books, each as absorbing and informative as they are entertaining. And this is but one package in the TIME READING PROGRAM.

This Program offers you excellent, varied reading and the convenience of receiving your books in your own home. Every two months four volumes, similar in quality to those above are chosen by the Editors of TIME for their provocative and timeless character and their excellent writing. The subject spectrum ranges from fiction to politics, arts, science, history, philosophy and many others. A special TIME READING PROGRAM Preface, written by the Editors and a new introduction—often by the author himself—highlight these completely unabridged special editions.

Handsome additions to any library, these volumes are half again as large as the average paper back and bound in durable full color covers. They are set in large type face with ample margins.

As you can see, this is an unusual program. Four volumes are sent to our subscribers every two months. All four cost only $3.95 plus a small charge for shipping and handling. And you may return any or all of the books in each package. There is no obligation to buy and you may cancel at any time.

Your introductory package would include these titles:

Brave New World by Aldous Huxley
The Screwtape Letters by C. S. Lewis
The Bridge of San Luis Rey by Thornton Wilder
In Defense of Women by H. L. Mencken

Won't you fill in the coupon below for a free examination of these excellent books and mail it today?

TIME

TIME INC. BOOKS TIME & LIFE Building, Chicago, Illinois 60611

☐ Please send me these first four books of the TIME READING PROGRAM. I will examine them for ten days, then either return them and forget the matter—or keep them and send you $3.95 (plus shipping and handling). You will then enter my reservation to receive future sets on approval every second month at the same price of $3.95. I am under no obligation and I may cancel at any time.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone_____ State_____

(Available in U.S.A. only) 0146G

THE NEW LOOK OF STEREO

Model RC4335

New G-E stereo consoles can send hi-fi through household wiring to the kitchen...den...patio

Model SP20

or wherever you plug in this portable speaker.

Only General Electric offers this ingenious innovation: Porta-Fi.

It's optional on six new G-E stereo radio/phono consoles. Here's how it works:

A tiny transmitter in the console sends radio or recorded music through your standard household wiring.

To hear it, simply plug the portable receiver-speaker into any standard 110-volt outlet. Turn it on. Listen. That's all.

And Porta-Fi is a two-in-one system. For example, you may enjoy recorded music in the kitchen while the console plays FM/Stereo radio in the living room. Or follow a ballgame on the patio while the console plays records inside.

Again, only General Electric offers this innovation. Let your dealer demonstrate it for you.

ACCENT ON VALUE

AUDIO PRODUCTS DEPARTMENT, DECATUR, ILLINOIS

GENERAL ELECTRIC

What the white man remembers seeing is the trash and squalor

NEGROES

CONTINUED

among Negroes the figure is double that—11%. Next year, 1964, is not only an election year—it is 18 years from the baby boom of 1946, and the number of untrained and unskilled Negro adolescents will almost double. As late as 1948, in the adolescent years between 14 and 19, unemployment was worse among white youngsters than it was among Negro youngsters; but this summer, in our new technological society, 24% of all Negro youngsters were unable to find work, while this was true of only 9% of all white adolescents.

These statistics begin to live and breathe on the pavements of the ghetto: the wino on the street, lurching from side to side; the mid-morning drunk with his bottle in a brown paper sack, the three, four, five hopeless ones leaning against the corner post or sitting on the curb at high noon watching the world go by. And these, unfortunately, are the ones whom the white neighbors of the Negroes in the city see and remember. Ignoring Conant Gardens or Baldwin Hills or St. Albans, N.Y., and all the known evidence of Negro achievement, the emotions of white people fix on the spectacle of decomposition and its effects.

Here, alas, the reporter must contend with an issue that, when raised, so embitters Negro leaders as almost to hush friendly dialogue. But the inescapable truth is that, just as the challenge of the city has led many Negroes through education to breathtaking achievement, just so has the challenge of its industrial civilization caused many others to collapse in squalor. And one must report squalor if one is to begin identifying problems.

Crime, of course, is the most immediate charge against the Negro community. In the past five years Negro crime rates in the cities have risen four times as fast as the white crime rate—which is rising too. Some hitherto unpublished figures for the rise in Negro crime in urban areas over the five years 1958-62 read: murder, up by 25%; robbery, up by 32%; larceny, up by 43%; forcible rape, up by 13% (narcotics, down 28%). More than half of such Negro crimes are perpetrated against fellow Negroes, much of their wrath at the world being spent on each other.

What is more disturbing to those who plan the future of the big city are the pathetic and frightening figures on out-of-wedlock births. In general, across the country, Negroes bear 10 times as many babies out of wedlock as do white families. Nationally, one fifth of all Negro children are illegitimate. But in the big city this figure soars—so that in central Harlem more than a third (37.5%) of all children are born out of wedlock and in Chicago the figures come to 27.3%.

Where one can analyze the problem—and pitifully small work of analysis has been done—it is not at all a calculated pattern of brood mothers scheming to bring up babies on relief. It is rather a pattern of the drifting, unemployable Negro male who abandons his mate as soon as she becomes pregnant, because he cannot support her; of the lonesome southern-born girl in the big city, too ignorant to consider what a night's warmth will cost in the future. Still, however innocent or pathetic are the

CONTINUED

NON-WHITES HOLDING WHITE COLLAR JOBS

Non-whites holding white-collar jobs have risen 150% in 20 years, while total of employed non-whites has expanded 44%—a sign that a Negro middle class is emerging.

COMPARISON OF FAMILY INCOME

Graph shows sharp difference between family income of non-whites (shaded area) and whites (dotted line). Differing pattern of white and non-white family income is emphasized by scale which shows income in $500 steps up to $5,000, in bigger jumps for higher income categories.

reasons for such out-of-wedlock births, they pose a real, pragmatic problem as their number increases steeply. The city must become father and provider for such children; and if one generation of illegitimate children proceeds to breed another and larger generation, the perspectives are endlessly gloomy. In Chicago, for example, it is estimated that the city spends $7,000 to raise each such child to the age of 17, and last year Cook County was supporting 51,000 such illegitimate Negro children. In New York City, last year alone, the number of illegitimate Negro children increased by 10,000.

There begins to swirl, thus, in the ghettos of big northern cities, a pattern of twin cyclones—an upper cyclone carrying some families up in aspiration and ambition, another cyclone carrying others down to decomposition. In the big city the Negro community begins to take on a weird hourglass configuration: an educated middle-class at the top and a "subculture" of despair at the bottom: Negroes beginning to "make it" (only 5.7% of Negroes earned more than $5,000 in 1948; by 1961 this figure had grown to 28.4%) at the top; and at the bottom Negroes in hopeless misery. The Negro community, in short, lacks "structure."

The needs of these two groups of Negroes are as different as the needs of whites who go separate ways of life. But both groups are teased by the dreams and visions offered by the white man's culture, thrust on him by the white man's television every night—and both groups are tormented at their own levels by the frustrations that come when they try to touch what those dreams offer.

"You sit there," says Alex Fuller, a vice president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. in Detroit, "and you listen at night to these people selling suburban real estate: 'Come see Goldenwood Manor,' says the announcer, 'where the water of your swimming pool turns gold in the moonlight at night.' You sit there with your kids, listening to this manure, and as they grow older, you wonder."

"She says," reports a Chicago relief worker of her client, "'I'm 16. I'm pretty. Why can't I have nylons like the other girls? I need a new compact. I need a dress.' She sees it on TV, and she wants it and she's going to do anything to get it."

"For the middle-class Negro in Chicago," says Professor Ray Mack of Northwestern University, "there's no way out. The movable generation can't move. There's no Beverly Hills or Scarsdale or Highland Park waiting to take him. The middle-class American Negro—it's his kid that gets beaten up by the lower-class Negro. It's he who pays the price of the ghetto. He's followed the rules, he's gone to school, he's got a good steady job. But he can't leave. He's won in the sweepstakes—but when he goes to the window, he finds they won't pay off on his ticket."

It is this conjunction of educated Negro leadership and Negro working-class misery that gives the Negro problem of the North its punch, its confusion and its menace. For, just as much as ordinary

CONTINUED

Never before such precision-jeweled accuracy and such luxury styling–from only

NEW CARAVELLE is the biggest watch value for your money—bar none! Only Caravelle gives you all these fine-watch features in a low-cost watch:
1. Fine precision-jeweled movement.
2. Luxurious good looks that last.
3. Electronically timed for accuracy.
4. Over 50 quality inspections.
5. Rugged dependability.
6. The most wanted styles—even dress-slim watches—all created by Bulova designers.

10.95

Wear CARAVELLE a product of BULOVA

Caravelle Watch Division of Bulova Watch Co., Inc. *Plus tax, waterproof when case, crystal, crown intact.

Away Go Corns

1. Super-fast relief
2. Quickly removes corns
3. Prevents corns, sore toes

This wonderful 3-way action of Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads makes it needless for you ever to suffer from corns. Be foot-happy—get a box today!

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

CONSTIPATED?

Doctors recommend Milk of Magnesia

MINT-FLAVORED PHILLIPS' TASTES GREAT

BEST HOSIERY BUYS
Men's • Boys' • Misses' • Children's Tripletoe® Musketeer®
BULLUCK HOSIERY, Inc., Empire State Bldg., N.Y.

Science Shrinks Hemorrhoids New Way Without Surgery Stops Itching–Relieves Pain

Only Preparation H Contains New Healing Substance That Now Makes it Possible to Shrink Hemorrhoids Without Surgery.

A world-famous research institute has found a new healing substance with the astonishing ability to shrink hemorrhoids without surgery. It relieves itching and pain in minutes and speeds up healing of the injured, inflamed tissues.

In one hemorrhoid case after another, "very striking improvement" was reported and verified by a doctor's observations. And most amazing of all – this improvement was maintained over a period of many months!

In fact, results were so thorough, that sufferers were able to make such statements as "Piles have ceased to be a problem." And among these sufferers, were a wide variety of hemorrhoid conditions, some of 10 to 20 years' standing.

All this was accomplished without the use of narcotics, astringents or anesthetics of any kind. The secret is the new healing substance (Bio-Dyne®) which quickly helps heal injured cells and stimulates regrowth of healthy tissue again. It is offered in ointment or suppository form called Preparation H®.

In addition to actually shrinking hemorrhoids without surgery, Preparation H lubricates and makes elimination less painful. It helps prevent infection which is a principal cause of hemorrhoids. Just ask for Preparation H Ointment or Preparation H Suppositories (easier to use away from home). Any drug counter.

To the frustrated Negro leader, the whites become a conspiracy

NEGROES
CONTINUED

people need jobs, a certain number of men in every group need to lead. It is a hunger in them, as song is a hunger in the musician and creativity is a hunger in the heart of the artist. And the Negro middle-class, for all its achievement, has been —and remains—as excluded from general leadership as the Negro workingman is generally excluded from the skilled unions. Most Americans with a leadership urge express it in private business and industry, where the nation's executive talent so brilliantly flourishes. But this world of private enterprise is largely closed to leadership Negroes by prejudice, and only rarely have Negroes tried to penetrate it, as other groups have done, with ventures of their own. Thus Negro leadership talents turn inward. And as their educational levels, horizons and abilities rise, they find they can lead only one way—against the common enemy they perceive in all white people.

The most bitter—and perhaps the most eloquent—of these talented Negro leaders have arrived thus at what can be called the conspiratorial theory of American life: that there is a conspiracy, somewhere, to lock Negroes in ghettos and exclude them from the general white life of the metropolitan center. When asked to pinpoint the "conspiracy," they can occasionally finger a racist like Mayor Orville Hubbard of Dearborn (Detroit) Mich., ex-Marine, ex-unionman, who believes in "complete segregation one million percent on all levels." (His police wagons carry two signs—one of them his euphemistic racist slogan, "Help Keep Dearborn Clean"; the other, just below it, "Be Nice to People.") But generally when one seeks for evidence of this conspiracy in the North, the charges dissolve into the anonymous "they." For the white "they," just as the black "they," have conspired at nothing, planned nothing. "They," both white and black, have been—and continue to be—incredibly irresponsive to each other's real needs and fears.

Dr. John A. Morsell of the N.A.A.C.P., who is one of the most thoughtful Negro leaders of this country, likes to explain the race demonstrations of the past year by analogy with nuclear physics. "It was only a question of time," he says, "when it was going to happen. At a certain point when you enrich a mass of uranium enough, it becomes fissionable. When you add enough educated people to any contained group, when you add enough leaders—then you get a fissionable mass and it goes off by itself. The year just happened to be 1963."

The growing mass of Negroes in the northern urban centers is already fissionable. By 1970, estimates the Urban League, 18 million Negroes (more than the entire population of Canada) will be living in the big cities of the U.S. Unless their demands are met—and unless they meet the demands of their white neighbors—we face a continuing moral and constitutional deadlock new in the history of our country. It is, therefore, vitally important to scrutinize, as we shall next week, the demands that the Negro leaders are leveling against white society, and their dilemma in leading their own people; to measure how greatly the presidential election of 1964 can complicate, by partisan politics and political requirements, the tentative search for solutions; to consider how greatly that election turns on the present civil rights bill before Congress; and, finally, to report the general consensus of men of goodwill as they reflect on where and how American life has wounded the Negro most deeply—and what responsibility Negro as well as white leaders must bear in healing those wounds.

NEXT WEEK PART II
Negro Demands
ARE THEY REALISTIC?

Letters

11/24/63
NYT Mag.

A YANKEE'S VIEW

TO THE EDITOR:

Let me state my respect for Don Barrett's intelligence and the coherent expression of his views as portrayed by Margaret Long, in "A Southern Teen-Ager Speaks His Mind" (Nov. 10). Yet, I find it criminal that a person of high intelligence should make emotional distinctions between "good Nigra and bad Nigra" and "good Yankee and bad Yankee." When Barrett cites respect for Negroes of high I.Q. he should note that studies and experiments have shown that I.Q.'s of uneducated, illiterate people can be raised considerably.

I am a Yankee, not much older than Barrett, who has lived in and traveled through parts of the South (incidentally without ever having taken part in any freedom rides). When he draws his Mason-Dixon line, I would like to mention that I have been called "nigger lover" by other "Yankees" of similar background. I have scrapped with Negro boys in schoolyards, and I have been taught by Negro teachers in schools. When I look at Negro society in Harlem and other slum neighborhoods, I don't see a savage race which will take another few hundred years to reach the whites (as even my own brother believes), but I see a people, who, for so long, have been told how low and worthless they are, that they have begun to accept it.

When he praises the high degree of white civilization at the time Negroes were "eating each other in Africa," I suggest he read Jonathan Swift's essay, "A Modest Proposal," in which the satiric suggestion of children as a delicacy was not far removed from the beggarly conditions throughout Europe.

If only Mr. Barrett would be able to study history more coolly, if only his brain wouldn't so easily be clouded with fire and smoke!

What I have previously termed his "crime" is not his alone; it is a failing in us all with which we will forever have to contend.

ROBERT FOX.

New York.

'YOUTH'S REACTION'

TO THE EDITOR:

What is incomprehensible to me personally is that all over the world young people usually can be found in the advance of new movements and efforts at social reform, but here in this country the young people are more reactionary than their grandparents.

Don Barrett says he "was not much impressed" by the Negro march on Washington. "It wasn't any different from what I see Saturday night in Lexington when they come to town to get drunk and cut up, except they're happier here in Lexington."

Whatever the faults of the march, to allow this boy to compare it to a happy Saturday night in Lexington, Miss., is a joke. IRENE SAYLOR.

New York.

'PROGRESS BARRIER'

TO THE EDITOR:

Miss Long disclosed a major obstacle to racial progress that I had never really comprehended. There are two different worlds within the United States which must come to terms with each other before any of their mutual problems can be solved. With a new view of both sides, I think it will be easier to know where to find the main barriers of prejudice and how to attack them. MARTHA SCOTT,

Wilson College.

Chambersburg, Pa.

'LOST GENERATION'

TO THE EDITOR:

Margaret Long's interview dramatically exposes the lost generation of Americans. The ideals of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; equal opportunity; freedom from oppression, and many other phrases which describe our American ideals are lost in meaning to so many people. All over the world we Americans loudly declaim oppression. We decry all forms of it in other nations. We belittle the Russians and the Red Chinese and speak out loudly against what we consider to be denial of man's basic human rights. We berate the Germans for their lack of understanding and violent murder of the Jews, and we express a surprise when their youths fail to understand why Eichmann was wrong. Yet here in America——.

Why have the ideals, the despairs, the hopes, the dreams of our Founding Fathers been pushed back into the crevice of history and out of modern-day American traditions?

ALMA ARMSTRONG.

New York.

'WHY WORRY'

TO THE EDITOR:

It is difficult to accept the idea of the militancy of young white Southerners, as expounded by Margaret Long, after looking at the picture of attractive young people who all seem to be having a wonderful time.

The charming young man interviewed has obviously had all his ideas handed down to him. The beautiful myth of the purity of Southern womanhood doesn't hold up with the oft-expressed fear of miscegenation. There seem to be very few Negroes without some "white" blood and though undoubtedly most of it came from the paternal side, why should anyone worry about Southern women if they are so inherently pure?

HELEN R. SIMON.

Warren Township, N. J.

'WORST SYSTEM'

TO THE EDITOR:

The article by Margaret Long is yet another indication that Mississippi's educational system is the worst in the United States. Although the article is entitled "A Southern

(Continued on Page 141)

Letters

(Continued from Page 22)

Teen-Ager Speaks His Mind," Don Barrett has obviously not learned how to use his. His "opinions" are feeble parrotings of the Southern aristocratic tradition, an essentially 19th-century tradition which the rest of the world has largely abandoned.

Barrett's words would seem to indicate that the "educated" Mississippian can have a mind as closed as that of the most illiterate.

ALICE E. PRICE.
JANET E. ST. CLAIR.
SARAH E. MCPHERSON.
MARILYN R. MOSES,
University of Rochester.

Rochester, N. Y.

'MISGUIDED'

TO THE EDITOR:

I am deeply saddened, indeed, to see an "intelligent" young man with such ingrained prejudice; so misguided.

Did you say he had 96-average in high school?

COUNCILLE E. BLYE.

Gainesville, Fla.

'NOT TYPICAL'

TO THE EDITOR:

Coming from Virginia and having traveled widely in various other parts of the South, I can honestly say I have never once heard such an extreme and narrow-minded viewpoint confirmed by Southern youths. I feel that Mr. Barrett has exaggerated the problem and the prejudice through his own limited background and experience and has done more to evoke publicity than to present an accurate picture.

I was especially alarmed upon concluding the article to hear the author present his segregationist mood as the epitome of young Southern feeling—"in love with life long gone, they stand embattled, fighting change with talk of old times, planter-rulers, and good servants happy in subjection." I realize that there are a few youths who advocate Barrett's extremist opinions, but they can never exemplify the bulk of Southern youths, many of whom may disapprove of the integration movement but are more inclined to accept the change with little dispute as a necessity of American social life.

KAREN COURTNEY,
Vassar College.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

'LACKS SPIRIT'

TO THE EDITOR:

Where Don Barrett says he is more proud of being a Mississippian than an American, I get the idea (from what he said) that he doesn't have any American spirit.

This country is not perfect, and it won't be, until a couple of million people like him have changed their ideas greatly.

DONALD J. ISLER.
(age 11)

New York.

Life Magazine
Nov. 29, 1963

Part II

The angry U.S. Negro's rallying cries are confusing his just and urgent cause

POWER STRUCTURE, INTEGRATION, MILITANCY, FREEDOM NOW!

by THEODORE H. WHITE

In the American South the Negro has a relatively simple goal: to wring from hostile white men an end to legally imposed indignity. But in the big cities of the North, where Negro Americans increasingly seek their future, no such simple objective rises from the dialogue between white and Negro leaders. The nature of America's future civilization depends on clearing up the bitter tangle of misunderstanding between whites and Negroes; yet the noise of the present dialogue deafeningly confuses the real issues they pretend to discuss.

The historian of the future will, of course, see the ferment and change caused by city Negroes more clearly than we do today. His report will start, as ours must, with an account of the centuries-old injustice of the white man to the black, of the crippling of emotion which every Negro suffers every day as he tries to live in a white world that prefers to ignore his existence.

With the advantage of hindsight, the historian of tomorrow will coolly strip the noise from the action to measure how well or ill Negroes fared in this episode. But those Americans who try in this decade—now—to meet Negro demands live with a dilemma of understanding. The problem is compounded by the reluctance of well-intentioned whites to bring up harsh but inescapable facts. No one can describe this dilemma better than to offer for consideration four of the key words or phrases of the bitter dialogue—each reflecting one facet of the many-faceted confusion.

MILITANCY is a word that today reflects a special posture or a type of person. A Negro leader must be known—first and above all—among his own people as a "militant." Not to be "militant" exposes a Negro to the charge that he is an "Uncle Tom." Once known as an "Uncle Tom," his career is over.

"Militancy" thus makes the public confrontation between the races chiefly a dialogue of black demand on white guilt. On occasion the "militant" Negro can be a man of incandescent, self-denying heroism—a Martin Luther King. But the "militant" Negro can also be one who substitutes pure flamboyance for leadership. Congressman Adam (We-Got-the-White-Man-on-the-Run) Clayton Powell is, for example, the single Negro most strategically placed (as chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor) to operate on two of the greatest problems of his people: jobs and schooling. Not a hint of creative thinking or leadership in these supremely vital fields has come from Powell. Yet, as New York's leading "militant" Negro, he is politically invulnerable in Harlem. Powell called for "a Birmingham explosion in New York City" this fall.

"The word 'militancy' detonates such a charge," says one Negro leader, "that you simply can't afford not to be a 'militant.' Of course, this has a crippling effect on strategy. You ask in a closed meeting, should we go all the way, even to insurrection? And everybody says, no, we haven't got the force. If that's so, shouldn't we try to make progress with the help of the best elements of white society? But if you say that, it sounds as if you won't do anything unless you're sure of white support. You're not 'militant'—so where are you?"

It thus takes far more courage for a Negro leader in the North to compromise in the open with white leaders on a given program than for him to hold firm as a "militant." A charade then ensues whereby "militant" Negro leaders gather at various city halls; sympathetic white leaders listen to their demands and respond with promises that sound as if they were written by the Negro abolitionist Frederick Douglass. And then, as the promises slowly vanish in a blur, the banners wave and the audience chants: "Freedom now!"

FREEDOM NOW! is a mood phrase that links the militant leader to the passions of his followers. It is almost as difficult to quarrel with this phrase as to denounce The Star-Spangled Banner or Caroline Kennedy; it is as impossible to reply to it as to the question, "Have you stopped beating your wife?"

But "Freedom now!"—no matter how wonderfully it lends itself to the emotional mood of orator and crowd, no matter how bravely the placards wave the phrase above good people softly singing We Shall Overcome—is a phrase with explosive potential. For the problems of bad housing and education, unemployment and lack of opportunity cannot be solved anywhere near fast enough to satisfy the cravings generated by orators who chant: "We want it now! We want it all! We want it here! Freedom now!"

By wiping out reasonable public discussion of steps and procedures, the phrase "Freedom now!" blinds rather than clarifies. It could conceivably deliver leadership of the Negro community to demagogues who, if they insist that "now" is 1964, will force the major parties to polarize on this demand to the peril of both Negro and white.

Only when one attempts to pin down what "freedom" really is does one begin, for the first time, to grapple seriously with the Negro

CONTINUED

SO GIVEABLE

when it's an

IONA

GIFT

OTHER IONA GIFT IDEAS

ICE CRUSHERS
KNIFE and SCISSORS SHARPENERS DRINK MIXERS

IF IT'S MADE BY IONA
YOU CAN TRUST ITS QUALITY

IONA
MANCHESTER, CONNECTICUT

dilemma. For, the definition of "freedom" becomes "real integration," and the word "integration" itself remains to be defined.

INTEGRATION is a word of substance that covers goals and ends, but no one has ever defined it except as the opposite of "segregation." Segregation originated in the South as a system of laws which imprisoned a man by the color of his skin at birth. From hospital waiting room, through school and work, to the grave, segregation shut Negroes out of community life. This system, long recognized as morally wicked, is now—thankfully—illegal. In the northern city it has been outlawed almost as long as the whipping post and thumb rack—though replaced by a system of white hypocrisies and subtleties which erects before Negroes an invisible web of prejudice that excludes them from the promise explicit in the laws.

"Segregation," being a legal term, can be outlawed by courts, supported—if necessary—by armies. But courts cannot define its opposite, "integration," nor can armies enforce what courts cannot define. Thus confusion—since "integration" has as many meanings as it has champions.

"Integration" can mean, for example, jobs. But in jobs it can be a demand as solid as opening locked unions to fair opportunity for Negroes—or as silly as the unblinking complaint, on opening night, by pickets that Cleopatra, an African heroine, should have been played by a Negro rather than by a white woman—Elizabeth Taylor. "Integration" can also be applied to the symbolism of American life—it can support the insistence of Negroes that TV, movies and stage begin to show the Negro in true achievement rather than as permanent servingman; or it can invite the absurd proposal of some Los Angeles Negroes that they organize a protest march of 10,000 if no Negro girls are included among the beauty queen finalists for the Tournament of Roses parade on Jan. 1, 1964.

Chiefly, however, "integration" enters the public dialogue in two areas of real demand: schooling and housing. Yet "integration" as applied to schools in the North defines an emotion, not a program.

"We all marched together in Washington last August, but when it comes to being together with whites in their home neighborhoods, it's different."

WILLIAM PATRICK JR.
Detroit City Councilman

No one has yet constructively and pragmatically defined what "integration" in the schools requires. Clearly, by the historic decision of Judge Irving Kaufman in New Rochelle, N.Y., separation of children by color, when purposefully practiced by school boards in the North under hypocritical cover phrases, is as illegal as the South's openly acknowledged practice. But, equally clearly, parents are not inevitably bigots if they prefer to have their toddlers attend schools in their own neighborhoods. In between these two clarities, however, is the large expanse of gray battleground where "integration" triggers off automatic demands on the school system.

Enough survey work has been done to show that Negro parents, like white parents, are more interested in the quality of education than in the chromatic proportions of the classroom. Yet in every city so much emotion is spent weighing the numbers, the percentages, the admixture of black with white, that Negro leaders have convinced far too many of their own people that Negroes sitting together in one classroom retard each other's education. In cities like Washington, D.C., where 80% of children in public schools are Negro, or areas like Manhattan, where 69% are Negro and Puerto Rican, "integration" could be achieved only by the most mechanical and arbitrary importation of white children from distant areas.

So in the name of "integration" some Negro leaders, notably in Los Angeles and New York, are demanding that white children be transported into Negro slums to achieve the proper chromatography. In New York the most advanced proponent of this impractical proposal is Dr. Edward Lewis of the Urban League. Talking to this good and genial man, one has difficulty believing he takes his own demand seriously. One has the feeling that he would like to get off the hook but that he is hung there by the word "integration" and the need for "militancy." Few Negro leaders in New York dare denounce the idea publicly for fear they will be blasted by others of their race for being against "integration." Meanwhile white parents can be tormented by a magnificently emotional appeal: "Integration means your kids will be forced on buses and shipped to Harlem schools with all those illegitimate and backward kids."

The kind of confusion set up by the word "integration" as applied to education is best reflected in a conversation with a bitter young Negro student leader in Chicago who began by listing as his No. 1 demand of American society: "separate but superior education for Negroes—if we could get it." Then, after increasingly emotional talk for an hour, he took up the matter of cross-busing white children into Negro districts and said, "The white kids got to pay for what their parents did to us. Even at the age of 6, they got to pay—because they're going to pay one way or the other. Besides, it'll be good for them."

"Integration" as applied to housing leads to hypocrisy. Outside of New York there is no substantial evidence that any neighborhood of mixed colors, if left unprotected against the pressure, has ever been successfully and permanently stabilized against the torrent of in-migrating Negroes. If there is any consensus in the heated race confrontation, it is this: in the crowded central cities, given the bursting need of Negroes for housing, Negroes can be introduced to white neighborhoods in orderly fashion only by quotas or, as the University of Chicago nicely puts it, "managed integration."

This somber judgment was shared by at least 50 of the 60 white and Negro leaders to whom this writer has spoken in the past few months. But almost no one will speak this judgment aloud. Alone among public agencies, the New

CONTINUED

PART II

MY SIN

...a most provocative perfume!

LANVIN

the best perfume Paris has to offer

Purse size $3; Spray Mist $5; Toilet Water from $3; (plus tax)

"Emphasis should be on superior or compensatory education, integrated or not. You can do irreparable harm to some Negroes by simply busing them to white schools."

PHILIP M. HAUSER
Sociologist

NEGROES
CONTINUED

Jersey Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights has this fall courageously spoken up for "benign quotas" to lead Negroes out of their ghettos in orderly manner. In Chicago, Saul Alinsky, one of the Negroes' great white champions and a man who favors quotas, has said, "An integrated neighborhood—that's a neighborhood between the day the first Negro family moves in and the last white family moves out."

But elsewhere public statement and private view contradict each other. One of the most respected of American Negro leaders recently testified officially to this view: "I think any quota is odious, and I don't know how you maintain a quota." But the same man told me privately this fall that he feels quotas have "pragmatic value." White officials in New York City who deny publicly that any quota system exists in the public housing system will tell you, privately, how they work to maintain a balance.

Yet for all its haziness the word "integration" does, somehow, represent a genuine goal—the day when whites and Negroes will enjoy equal opportunity in the nation's life, will "communicate" with each other, will ignore the color of their skin and become friends. This greatly desired end will not, naturally, come about by itself; thus both strategy and tactics are necessary—and both of them are knit into the operational phrase of the present Negro unrest: "power structure."

POWER STRUCTURE is the commonest phrase on the lips of every Negro thinker and political analyst. Where the phrase originated is known only to scholars, but today it emphasizes the gap between two different visions of reality.

The word "power," to white politicians, means votes, police, armies, a government's power to compel. But as Negro leaders use the phrase, it means the entire structure of American life. Whoever has any privilege (either public or private) to give or withhold is part of the "power structure."

To Negroes "power structure" means not only government but the men who control the banks, industry and insurance companies; the men who control newspapers, magazines and television; it means the schools and their administrators; it means the churches and their hierarchies; it means the labor unions and their leaders.

Of these elements of the "power structure," Negroes have leverage only in one: government. This leverage they have won by translating the growth of Negro population in the big cities of the North into solid blocs of votes that swing six to eight of our greatest states one way or the other. Exploiting this strength, Negro leaders insist that government use its leverage on all the other elements of the "power structure," private and public. They propose that government press itself into every area of decision, that it penetrate and dominate everywhere that discrimination in any form is practiced.

All Negro leaders, whether of the intransigent radical fringe or the most docile and mendicant timidity, demand that the "power structure" be opened to include them at every level, right up to the policy-making summit. This, they insist, is the most important single transaction of this generation of Americans—the single overriding priority for all the nation's effort.

One should pause over the phrase "power structure" because it leads directly to the hard, true needs of the Negro community: the often-repeated trinity of demands—jobs, housing, education. And none of these problems, Negroes say, can be cured except by pressure on the "power structure." In New York City, for example, it is estimated that the construction unions control over 100,000 jobs. At the present rate of admitting

CONTINUED

Milk of Magnesia is the laxative doctors recommend and Lots of people think the mint flavor in Phillips' Milk of Magnesia is the best thing that's happened to laxatives in a long time. It makes the world's best laxative the best tasting, too.

Even more important, doctors recommend milk of magnesia. We asked thousands of doctors, "Do you ever recommend milk of magnesia?" The overwhelming majority said, "Yes!"

Like regular Phillips', Mint-Flavored Phillips' is both a laxative and an antacid, so it relieves both irregularity and acid indigestion. Yet it's so gentle, it's ideal for all ages.

So get Mint-Flavored Phillips' Milk of Magnesia and prove to yourself that the world's best laxative is the best tasting, too!

REGULAR OR MINT-FLAVORED

SHE LIGHTS THE PIPE

YOU LIGHT THE FIRE

AND LEAVE THE REST TO

Evans
HAND TURNED Slippers for Men

CHEROKEE® (above) — Fine saddle leather with padded sole. Also available in Black with red leather lining. BRAID (below)—Genuine hand turned. Cut from fine kidskin with foam padded sock lining. Also available in Black or Burgundy.

SLIPPERS ILLUSTRATED $7.95 AT BETTER STORES EVERYWHERE

I dare say that 85% of all Negroes do not adhere to nonviolence. . . . They are allowing the nonviolent movement to go ahead because it is working.

JAMES FORMAN
Executive Secretary of S.N.C.C.

NEGROES
CONTINUED

apprentices in, say, the Steamfitters Union, if Negro applications are accepted beginning right now, it will be eight more years before the first Negro fills an opening as apprentice in that union. This, Negroes point out, is patently unfair and completely unrealistic; they argue that the union must be forced open to them now, preferentially or not.

Negroes in big cities across the country also want to pressure the "power structure" to force open the schools, public or private, to their students—or to force into their schools the best teachers available. As for housing, federal financing for more than 30 years supported the "power structure" of real estate developers who insisted that new suburban dwellings be covenanted against Negro occupancy; why, then, should not federal power now be used, asks Loren Miller, the Negroes' outstanding housing expert, to break open those suburban rings that trap Negroes in their urban ghettos?

The Negro community has needs as urgent as hunger, as hard as rock—yet the rhetoric of today's dialogue hides the reality. There is, for example, the clear national need that human beings eliminated by automation from industry, black and white, should not be dumped on the slums of our cities like animal refuse awaiting garbage removal. This urgent need can be expressed in several ways.

It can be expressed in the words of Louis Martin, a Negro journalist, who says, "After the civil rights bill goes through, what next? We have to take care of the guy out of work. He's mad. He won't lend himself to morality. This guy being tossed out by automation—you have a quarter of a million of him in the big cities. If you let him linger in poverty too long, you're developing another kind of culture in the city, a culture you can't reach with nonviolent preaching. I say you've got to take a billion dollars a year, if necessary, and toss it into the pool and say that any Negro—or any white man—who makes less than half the national average income ought to be able to find government work. I say that this basically illiterate guy has got to have another choice besides crime or relief."

Martin is now deputy chairman of the Democratic National Committee and is, therefore, relatively free of the pressures of interior Negro politics. Inside Negro politics, however, few men can speak of the problem as one shared by both races. Instead they speak in the dogma of the civil rights movement, of "reparations." As voiced by the National Urban League in its demand for a national "Marshall Plan for Negroes," the concept of equal opportunity must be expanded to include the "concept of indemnification"; and there is the warning that, if such sin-gold is not paid by white Americans to black Americans, the "power structure" is inviting "social chaos."

The inflammatory language of the indemnification proposal illustrates a troublesome political paradox. The Urban League, led nationally by the brilliant Whitney Young and in Chicago by the distinguished Edwin C. Berry, is perhaps the wisest and most responsible of Negro civil rights groups; it knows best the internal problems of the Negro community in the city; it is most willing to accept Negro responsibility for what must be done—and is consequently suspect among extremists within the Negro community as "a front for the white men." The Urban League must, thus, advance its share of extreme public demands—and, once these demands are voiced, all other groups, in order to be "militant," must back them too.

This militancy of language—supported by moral indignation yet coupled with total confusion about what practical steps must first be

CONTINUED

Never before such precision-jeweled accuracy and such luxury styling-from only

NEW CARAVELLE is the biggest watch value for your money—bar none! Only Caravelle gives you all these fine-watch features in a low-cost watch:
1. Fine precision-jeweled movement.
2. Luxurious good looks that last.
3. Electronically timed for accuracy.
4. Over 50 quality inspections.
5. Rugged dependability.
6. The most wanted styles—even dress-slim watches—all created by Bulova designers.

10.95*

Wear CARAVELLE a product of BULOVA

Caravelle Watch Division of Bulova Watch Co., Inc. *Plus tax, waterproof when case, crystal, crown intact.

"Housing alone won't solve the Negroes' problems. Their delinquents are like others. Most have never met an adult they can trust. Only families with love and security can provide stability."

GEORGE EDWARDS
Detroit Police Commissioner

NEGROES
CONTINUED

taken—has brought into the crusading Negro movement a fringe of extremist followers, white and black, moved by many other inspirations, both domestic and alien.

Some of the wildest civil rights militants are descended from America's native radical tradition, which goes all the way back to the Boston Tea Party, to Thoreau and the Abolitionists, and descends through Populists and Wobblies to the radicals of the '30s. These are people learning, with zest and wonder, how delicate is the meshing of big city civilization. Their sit-ins and demonstrations have kept police forces across the nation strained for months. They have dumped garbage on City Hall in New York City, picketed a Chicago newspaper whose editorials they disliked, closed up construction sites in Philadelphia. Some of the leaders and participants in the civil rights movement insist that direct action, whether it works or not, is the only form of therapy which can reach Negro despair. Others find a simple joy in what can be done by mischief: "What if," mused a Chicago direct-actionist, "we all went into Marshall Field's, by the hundreds, and ordered parcels shipped C.O.D. all over town? I'll bet we could wreck them if they didn't negotiate with us."

The most remarkable thing about this past summer's protest demonstrations has been the ability of responsible Negro leadership under the most desperate cross-pressures to keep such extremists under control.

The central and most responsible vehicle for direct action in the country is the Congress of Racial Equality—CORE. CORE is led by some of the highest-minded, most dedicated men of the Negro movement—and it believes, with magnificent simplicity, that it alone can decide for its members which laws they shall obey, which disobey. Disciplined and well indoctrinated in the techniques and philosophy of civil disobedience, CORE represents a thoroughly American, though thoroughly disturbing, tradition of protest by direct action.

There are other direct-action groups—sometimes organized, sometimes not—who are far less reputable. For example, in Detroit this summer a local, unaffiliated university group called UHURU (an African word for "freedom") on its own initiative sat in at City Hall to demand, among other things, that the mayor immediately arrest the prosecuting attorney of Wayne county and appoint a Negro chief of police.

Still more sinister groups are also interested in direct action. One is the Communists, who again are trying to mount an important penetration into American politics. One staff member with definite Communist ties was uncovered in Martin Luther King's southern office this summer and was fired; but a continuing outside Communist effort—so far frustrated—to penetrate King's leadership circle is known to exist. National officials of CORE have already warded off Communist infiltration in chapters in Pittsburgh and in San Francisco; but Communist efforts to penetrate the Los Angeles group remain of concern to them.

A more serious penetration by unidentified elements is believed to have been made in S.N.C.C.—the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee. On two occasions—once in Jackson, Miss., once in Birmingham—agents of this group tried to convert a peaceful march into a violent Putsch on government offices; both times they were headed off by responsible Negro leadership acting in time.

One of the most chilling documents this writer has seen recently was the draft "battle plan" discussed by S.N.C.C. (and rejected by Negro leaders) for use this fall in Alabama. It advocated a march on Montgomery in "nonviolent battle groups," with their own insignia and flags. These "battle

CONTINUED

"We assisted the GI after the war because he was out of the mainstream for four years. Negroes have been out of that mainstream for 300 years."

WHITNEY YOUNG
National Urban League

groups," trained in street-battle tactics, were to cut Montgomery off from all communication with the outside world—presumably to provoke "nonviolent" combat between Alabama and the U.S.

It cannot be overstressed that such lunatics and aliens are, at the moment, no more than irritants in a vast and inspiring thrust of Negroes toward dignity. But the confusion in the dialogue over civil rights magnifies what these irritants can do. Consider the riots in North Philadelphia on the weekend of Oct. 28. They were triggered off, after a Negro was shot by a policeman in self-defense, by one car roving the Negro districts with a loudspeaker and calling for "an eye for an eye" retaliation. The loudspeaker-equipped car was proved, on later investigation, to have been manned by a member of a Communist splinter group. But several hundred angry Negroes took to the street in response to the call.

As they try to sort out historic, long-range problems from short-range tactics, the Negro leaders face their largest dilemma in the elections of 1964. A quick analysis of the last presidential election explains both their dilemma and their power.

Of Kennedy's 303 electoral votes (Nixon received 219), 57 came from states of the Old South. But no less than 100 more of Kennedy's electoral votes came from states where his majority was less than 51%, shading down to margins so thin as to be an electoral twitch—indecision transfixed during a momentary count.

Under the discipline of conscience, Constitution and history, President Kennedy, in the role of 1964 candidate, must now grimly contemplate sacrificing as many of those 57 southern electoral votes as are necessary to move this country forward in race relations. He cannot, however, afford to give up also the 26 electoral votes of Illinois (his 1960 margin—9,000 out of 4,757,000 votes cast), the 21 of Michigan (1960 margin—67,000 out of 3,318,000), the 12 of Missouri (1960 margin—10,000 out of 1,934,000) and be re-elected President. Yet whether he gains or loses votes in such big city states (his prospects, it should be said, are much brighter in New York, Pennsylvania and California) depends almost as much on the Negro leaders as on his own behavior and performance.

For everywhere in the big city states the edge of friction cuts where Negro and white workingmen jostle each other—in jobs, in schools, above all in white working-class, home-owning neighborhoods. As a union man, the white worker has generally voted Democratic. But in local election after local election this fall season of 1963, wherever the Negro issue can be sensed in working-class votes—from Boston through Cambridge, Md. through Philadelphia—the white workingman has voted increasingly anti-Negro in defense of his neighborhood base.

As Negro leaders continue to press the white liberal leaders of the North (Republican and Democratic alike) for the demands that rise from the inner torment of the Negro community, they also press white liberal leadership further and further away from the white working class—and the working class itself toward the temptation offered by anti-Negro demagoguery. By pressing hard enough the Negroes can as thoroughly wreck or alter the nature of the present two-party system as did the Democratic radicals of the 1890s. (The battle cry of those radicals is oddly evocative of the Negro uprising of 1963: "If we can't all sit at the table together," said 'Ma' Jones of the Populists, "let's kick the legs off the goddam table and all sit on the floor.")

Much of the urgency with which Administration leaders and many Republicans endow the civil rights bill now before Congress comes from this perspective on the elections of 1964. If the bill is defeated, or filibustered to death, or

CONTINUED

Arvin America's favorite radio gift idea!

ARVIN 8 transistor portable radio in top grain cowhide

ARVIN POWER! There's power to spare in this handsome portable with 8 high-performance transistors plus diode and powerful 3-stage amplifier . . . pulls in distant stations with ease.

ARVIN LOOKS! Luxurious top grain leather case with leather slip strap handle is saddle-stitched for extra richness and beauty.

ARVIN CONVENIENCE! For easiest operation, set is equipped with on-off-volume control. Indirect drive tuning with slide rule dial permits clear, on-station tuning.

ARVIN BIG SOUND! Enjoy full, rich sound from Arvin's large Velvet Voice speaker with two-position tone control, backed by RF amplifier stage for top sensitivity.

GREAT GIFT IDEA FOR OUTDOOR ENTHUSIASTS!

ARVIN Model 61R58 . . . Chestnut Leather, complete with 4 long-lasting batteries, earphone and earphone jack.
Sugg. retail $34.95

Shop for Arvin Quality Products at any of these fine stores:

True Value HARDWARE STORES Ill., Ind., Ohio, Mich., Wisc.

HARDWARE STORES Ill., Ind., Ohio, Mich., Wisc.

RV HWI ROYAL VALUES IND., MICH., ILL., OHIO

L. FISH FURNITURE CO. ILL., IND., WISC.

HOME FURNITURE TOLEDO

Sentry HARDWARE STORES OHIO

LeRoy's JEWELERS CLEVELAND AKRON

Rose JEWELERS DETROIT

Wieboldt's CHICAGO

SUN APPLIANCE COLUMBUS

Arvin Products are also available at many other stores in your area.

Arvin® America's largest specialist in the manufacture of quality radios

ARVIN INDUSTRIES, INC. • Consumer Products Division, Columbus, Indiana

"There is deep bitterness and disillusion over the fact that whites can settle for the hypocrisy of tokenism as the price of social and racial peace."

KENNETH B. CLARK
Psychologist

NEGROES
CONTINUED

compromised to nothing, it will inevitably strengthen and feed the passions of the most extreme Negro militants, boil over into the presidential politics of next year, and thus divert the nation's attention from the far more complicated next step, which is the effort to solve the over-all problem of the Negro in the big city.

Is there any area of this problem in which men of goodwill, both white and black, do agree privately if not publicly?

Perhaps the most encouraging discovery this writer made in journeying across the country is this: that among themselves the more farsighted of Negro leaders have come to recognize that if they press responsibility for community behavior on the white, they must accept a black community responsibility too.

But they can only speak openly of their own responsibility, they insist, if the white man first moves to pick up his. The white power structure, they say, must first show by massive public and private effort its willingness to cope with the human fallout of automation, must demonstrate by massive public and private effort an intent to raise the quality of education and opportunity for Negro children. Then—and only then—they say, can Negroes face what they euphemistically refer to as their "housekeeping problem." In the discussions of "housekeeping," one of the words used by Negro extremists offers a helpful point of departure. It is the ugly word "castration."

When Negro intellectuals use the word "castration," they mean the lack of pride of so many Negro men which has come down from the days of slavery. Marauding white men and African black chieftains conspired, centuries ago, to tear apart Negro family life by buying and selling human bodies. For two hundred years thereafter in the New World, white men defiled the bodies of Negro women and violated the spirit of Negro men powerless to protect the women and children they loved. A great many American Negroes bear on their faces the signature of the white man's lust and ancestry; and so, the theory goes, the responsibilities of parenthood and family have become less important to Negro males than to white males.

To this historic "castration," say the Negro intellectuals, has been added the newer "castration" of industrial city life. Most of the brawn-and-back jobs for which Negroes originally came north are fast disappearing; in an automated world the robust, masculine heave of shoulder and muscle earns less. Negro women can become school teachers, collect tolls on highways, become clerks or secretaries. But for Negro males the doors are closing. In the U.S. three Negro women attend college for every two Negro men; among white people the proportion is just the reverse. In the big city, the father of the Negro family becomes less and less able to support his family—or to care for it. And fatherless babies grow up in a world with no family standards of decency, a burden and menace to all about them, white and black.

Many of the problems that beset the big city Negro are problems that plague other Americans too; and the purpose of the nation's politics is indeed to frame laws in which all people have equal opportunity to solve their problems. But the particular problem of Negro family life can only be solved by Negroes themselves.

In South Los Angeles last year, the Reverend Douglas Ferrell became the first Negro to win a seat in the state assembly from his district. His all-Negro neighborhood is a delight to the eye and, on Christmas week, white people drive through its streets to see the competition over Christmas decorations among blocks. Ferrell is no intellectual, but he has a shrewd answer as to why his neighborhood is so attractive while other all-

CONTINUED

DOCTORS KNOW:

Merely "shrinking" hemorrhoids is not enough!

Advanced new formula gives more complete, longer-lasting relief.... works 5 ways!

If you suffer from hemorrhoids, you have probably discovered that products which promise to "shrink" hemorrhoids do not always give prolonged relief. For as doctors will tell you, merely "shrinking" may not be enough to relieve discomfort.

That's why Mentholatum Laboratories set out to develop a more complete home treatment for hemorrhoids. The result is new M.P.O.—a remarkable medication which works five ways to give faster, longer-lasting relief. Here's how:

1. Starts to ease pain faster. M.P.O.'s advanced formula contains more pain-relieving ingredients, including Benzocaine, than the preparation you may now be using.

2. Shrinks hemorrhoids sooner. Quickly releases the proven vasoconstrictor, Ephedrine Sulfate, to reduce swollen tissues.

3. Speeds relief of embarrassing itch. M.P.O.'s medication is homogenized for faster absorption, faster relief.

4. Gives longer-lasting relief. An exclusive temperature-stable base enables M.P.O. to concentrate its soothing medication against inflamed tissue, thus assuring more prolonged comfort.

5. Fights danger of infection. M.P.O.'s formula includes the proven germ killer Hexachlorophene to combat bacteria.

M.P.O. is available at all drug counters in stainless ointment or suppository form. Satisfaction guaranteed, or money back.

The Mentholatum Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

circle of safety

It's really a family circle—for every member of your family has been riding on tires since birth! First, the tires on the baby carriage. Next, on the tricycle, scooter, and bicycle. And of course the car, the bus—and those pneumatic giants on planes. Remember the early car tires? Solid rubber. Then separate air tubes were put in hollow tires, and you enjoyed a gentler ride. Now tubeless tires give you both a soft ride and safety from blowouts. Yet tire research never quits searching for better design, stronger materials, improved tread—to bring you still safer tires that run quieter, look better, and take you more miles per dollar. How do you make sure you get the best tire for your car or truck or tractor? Pick a dealer who sells tires Advertised-in-LIFE. You'll not only get the tire best-suited to your individual needs but also assure your family's circle of safety.

ADVERTISED IN LIFE AMERICA'S AUTOMOTIVE SHOWROOM

"Negro youngsters must be encouraged to prepare for new job opportunities. They can no longer use discrimination as an excuse for lack of education and preparation."

THOMAS BRADLEY
Los Angeles City Councilman

NEGROES
CONTINUED

Negro areas just a few miles away are both an eyesore and a stench.

"The root of the problem," says Ferrell, "is despair. A man says to himself, 'I've been down so long till down don't bother me.' Something happens to him. Defeat sets in like a disease. It's like a cancer; it eats away his will power. He gives up. He wants to be with other people like himself, no matter what level he lives on. He's got no design for living, no pride, no courage, no ambition.

"What happens to make a neighborhood like ours? I'll tell you—somebody has got to 'want to want.' It begins with one individual usually. One man and his wife begin improving their house. And if two of them on one street start, it catches on."

Across the continent, in a setting as different from South Los Angeles as a trash barrel is from a palm tree, stands a grime-coated, red-brick building on Harlem's 135th Street. Within this building an experiment is being conducted by three Negro intellectuals—Kenneth Clark, Cyril Tyson, Kenneth Marshall—men as different from the Reverend Douglas Ferrell as the settings they inhabit. But their reading of their people is the same. The Harlem experiment, called HARYOU (Harlem Youth Opportunities Unlimited), is supported by New York City and the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency, and it is the most successful exploration of Negro youth problems done in this country up to now.

Though HARYOU has no final answer yet, it has learned this: little can be done for Negro youth from the outside; but almost anything can be done with Negro youth. Given hope, leadership and opportunity, they can confront and tackle—as they are already doing—the dope pushers, the hustlers, the winos, the despair within their community with the same fervor they have shown in mobilizing their resources against the white enemy downtown. One of the oddest discoveries made by the HARYOU leaders in talking to their Negro youngsters is that some of the most popular teachers in the much-denounced schools of Harlem are the toughest teachers—those who insist that the children toe the line and measure up to the work. Such teachers apparently care.

"What these kids need," says Cyril Tyson, the talented director of the project, "is to begin to look at themselves in different ways, not the way they've been taught to look at themselves. They need what all Harlem needs—structure and discipline. Money alone isn't the answer—it's what you do with it. We're trying to use the internal resources of Harlem to create a new kind of community, something with self-sustaining inner energy."

HARYOU is some 2,800 miles from Los Angeles. Yet, if there were a consensus that stretched over white and Negro leaders from New York to California—covering almost every city in between, including cops in uniform, clerics in collar, sociologues with surveys, politicians in office—it would be this: before the big city and the Negro community finally adjust to each other, despair must be pushed back to give room for dreaming. Only then can Negro family work be reconstructed and responsibility within the family established. And if there is any one point where the cycle of despair must be broken, it lies in the juvenile-adolescent years, where hope and education must be made to take root.

But the white man of any city is, alas, badly equipped to bring the healing quality of hope into the Negro ghetto of the big city. History has pressed white man's cruelty so vividly on Negro minds that the friendliest of Negroes find difficulty in trusting white people. The white man in the slum is the enemy; he is the cop; the relief administrator; the boss; "the man." The white man must open the gates of opportunity, keep them open, beckon the Negro in—but only Negroes can lead their communities through those gates to hope and respect.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 93

One calls thus, finally, on the mayor of America's largest city, New York's Robert Wagner. Now in his third term, Mayor Wagner has changed from the pudgy, benign man elected in 1953 to the rather gaunt and perpetually exhausted official he is today. No one has ever accused Wagner of blinding eloquence, but warmth of heart, patience and growing courage have slowly established him as one of New York's greater mayors.

After an hour's talk of Negro problems, of jobs, of housing, of commitment, of all that the city is trying to do, the mayor ends by talking about children: "That kid in Harlem who lacks skill, that kid who lacks the will to go on. He just isn't going to rush into a youth worker's office and say, 'I want to be trained.' You've got to go out and talk him into coming in. And that can't be done by government. Government has to have help. It's got to be done by leaders in the local community. Those kids in Harlem—they're discouraged, they're living off the bottom of the well; somebody's got to give them the spirit to climb up into the sunshine."

It is morning and the mayor is still in bathrobe and slippers, wearily facing the trip downtown to City Hall. At City Hall statistics and budgets will confront him; at City Hall, he knows, it is estimated that the Negro community requires two and a half times as much expenditure from the city for each Negro child as does the white community for a white child—and children eat up more than half of the city's entire $3 billion annual budget.

The sun in Gracie Mansion is warm and bright; the mayor knows how limited is the power of the city to deal with matters of spirit and hope. Yet he must do his part. He bends his head and doggedly faces the unpopular decision: "We're just going to have to spend more, a lot more. That's the job of the elected official—to go out and explain why we need the dough."

All over the country, in every big city, councilmen and mayors, congressmen, governors and greater officials know that they must now go out and explain why they will need "more dough." And they must explain the problem knowing that all the money in the world will not be enough. For, as Mayor Wagner put it, the job the nation faces on the urban frontier is not a job for government alone, nor for whites alone—or blacks alone.

It is a job, first, of thinking, of examining where American life must change as well as where it must be guarded. It is a job of sorting out the short-range problem of guaranteeing opportunity for the Negro and separating it from the long-range problem of reaching commonly accepted standards of behavior and morality in the big city. It is a job as practical as apprentice-training, as delicate as the rules of love and marriage.

No other free system of politics has ever before coped with problems of spirit and of reality so complex. History offers no other precedent to guide Americans—except their own. In America the children and grandchildren of immigrant hordes, acceptable nowhere else in the world, joined to transform existing tradition and create one of the wonders of Western civilization—the self-governing American city. The agony of the tongueless immigrant arriving in the strange land has never been adequately chronicled—nor the agony of the city that received him. But we know that the adventure succeeded. The immigrant, finally recognizing what he must learn, learned to strive; and the city, responding to his effort, finally accepted him for the rites of citizenship. The Negro's problem with the city and the city's problem with the Negro are, today, far more complicated. But the first step to solution must be found, surely, in the tradition of the American city itself.

"Wherever there is reasonable acceptance by the white leadership, you will find responsible response on the part of the Negro leadership."

ROY WILKINS
Executive Secretary, N.A.A.C.P.

Current
11/63

R & R Rel.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY FOR NEGROES

ARE NEGROES LIKE OTHER IMMIGRANTS?

In a book entitled, Beyond the Melting Pot, Nathan Glazer and Daniel Patrick Moynihan analyze New York's ethnic groupings. The following excerpt on the Negroes was written by Mr. Glazer, who is now professor of sociology at the University of California, Berkeley.

Nathan Glazer

"Much has been written about the failure of the Negro to develop an entrepreneurial class. In the early 1900's, Booker T. Washington and W. E. B. Du Bois, one an accommodationist and the other a militant, both exhorted the Negro to go into business, to develop wealth and power. Today Negro business is if anything less important than fifty years ago. The catering business, in which Negroes played a role of some significance in the late nineteenth century, has declined and fallen into other hands. The only important forms of Negro business are beauty parlors, barber shops, the preparation of special cosmetics, and undertaking parlors. Negro insurance companies (which once developed because Negroes found it hard to get insurance from established companies), banks, the Negro press, Negro real estate, whatever their importance symbolically, are of small importance economically in supplying jobs, economic contacts, skills. Perhaps one may make an exception to some extent for real estate, for a sizable amount of savings has been invested in houses and business property, and there are now a good number of real estate brokers. . . . And yet, this is for the most part all on a remarkably small scale. . . .

"There are some obvious explanations for lack of Negro businesses. Negroes emerging from slavery had no experience with money, and had no occasion to develop the skill in the planning and foresight that even the smallest businessman must have. In this respect, the European peasant, whose standard of living may have been as low as a slave's, was better off, for he had to market his produce and manage a small stock of money and goods.

"The upper class of slaves, the house servants who might have been given some small education, had as models the lavish expenditure of a plantation society, and it was easier for them to observe the processes of consumption than those of production and marketing. The freed slaves and later the migrants to the North were absolutely without financial resources, even the scanty sums needed for tiny businesses. They met unbending prejudice and discrimination in their efforts to get stock, capital, or space for rent.

"Yet surely there were in the great Negro city that grew up in Harlem in the 1920's opportunities for the business-minded to get a foothold by serving their own, as so many ethnic groups had done before them. But other factors came into play to inhibit the rise of Negro businessmen. One of them was that the Negro, while a migrant, was not like the immigrants bearing a foreign culture, with special needs that might give rise to a market. There was no local demand for a Buitoni and a La Rosa to make pasta, for a Goodman and a Manischevitz and a Schapiro to supply matzos and kosher wine. The only demand was for undertakers, hairdressers, and cosmetics. As we know, in time these small beginnings in supplying members of one's own ethnic community might grow into sizable enterprises which laid fee on a world of customers that extended beyond the initial ethnic base.

"Perhaps another way in which Negroes differed from European immigrant groups was that they did not develop the same kind of clannishness, they did not have the same close family ties, that in other groups created little pools for ethnic businessmen and professionals to tap. There was little clubbing together of the South Carolinians versus the North Carolinians versus the Virginians—life in these places was either not different enough, or the basis of the differences was not attractive enough, to create strong local groups with strong local attachments. The Negro family was not strong enough to create those extended clans that elsewhere were most helpful for businessmen and professionals.

"Negroes often say, 'Everyone else sticks together, but we knock each other down. There is no trust among us.' This is a stereotype and probably has the same degree of truth that most stereotypes have, that is, a good deal. Without a special language and culture, and without the historical experiences that create an élan and a morale, what is there to lead them to build their own life, to patronize their own? The one great exception to this is the Negro church, and it is perhaps no accident that tight church-like groupings among the Negroes have often branched out into business enterprise, as was true of Father Divine and Daddy Grace and is now true of the Nation of Islam.

"In the end, the most important factor is probably the failure of Negroes to develop a pattern of saving. The poor may have had nothing to save; but even those better off tend to turn earnings immediately into consumption. The reasons are clear enough to anyone sensitive to the frustrations under which almost all Negroes in America live. They are sufficient to explain the search for pleasure in consumption which makes the pattern of saving and self-denial so rare. . . .

"But if problems of incapacity for business prevailed among Negroes coming up from the South, it did not among that large part of the Negro population of New York that comes from the West Indies. We cannot help, when we talk about any group, obscuring differences that are important within it. When we say 'Negroes,' we speak of those born in the city as well as those coming from the South, the middle class as well as the lower class, the native-born as well as the foreign-born, the light-skinned as well as the dark, the speakers of French and Spanish as well as those who speak English. To the external white eye all these distinctions seem of no importance. This tendency to create a group by perceiving people as being all one occurs not only in the case of Negroes—very different groups of Jews were merged by the perception of the outer world, more than by their own self-perception of similarity. But this process affects Negroes more harshly because the outer world makes so few distinctions among them."

Negroes from the West Indies "were viewed from the beginning by native American Negroes as highly distinctive—in accent, dress, custom, religion (they were Anglican), and allegiances (they celebrated the King's birthday). Distinctive as they were, they were forced to live in the same quarters as other Negroes. Furious at a prejudice far greater than that among whites in their home islands, they were helpless to do much about it. Many, as a consequence, turned radical. Negro Communists and labor leaders, it has been said, were disproportionately West Indian.

"But the West Indians' most striking difference from the Southern Negroes was their greater application to business education, buying homes, and in general advancing themselves. James Weldon Johnson (whose parents stemmed from the British West Indies) described them in 1930: they 'average high in intelligence and efficiency, there is practically no illiteracy among them, and many have a sound English common school education. They are characteristically sober minded and have something of a genius for business differing almost totally, in these from the average rural Negro of the South.' They contributed disproportionately, all observers have agreed, to the number of Negro leaders and accomplished men. Claude MacKay, himself a Jamaican, pointed out that the first Negro presidential elector in New York State, the first elected Negro Democratic leader (Herbert R. Bruce, in 1935), one of the first two Negro municipal judges, were West Indians. Marcus Garvey, who in the 1920's, led one of the greatest Negro political mass movements in American history, was a Jamaican. A sociologist wrote (in the only book-length study ever made of the foreign Negro in America) in the late 1930's, 'It is estimated that as high as one-third of the Negro professional population—particularly physicians, dentists, and lawyers—is foreign-born.' The ethos of the West Indians, in contrast to that of the Southern Negro, emphasized saving, hard work, investment, education. . . .

"The West Indians have by now pretty much merged into the American Negro group, and their children do not feel themselves to be particularly different. They never found it possible to create a separate residential area. They are citizens, have given up the Queen, and lost their accents. The group might have been maintained by renewed immigration which reached a thousand a year from Jamaica alone after World War II; but the new McCarran-Walter immigration law of 1952 radically cut the numbers eligible to come in from the British West Indies, and the stream was deflected to England, thus becoming indirectly responsible for the development of a new, large Negro community there. . . .

"No one has studied why the West Indians were superior in business-enterprise and educational achievement to the native Negro. Very likely the fact that they came from islands which were almost completely Negro, and in which, therefore, Negroes held all positions in society except the very highest, inhibited the rise of a feeling of inadequacy and inferiority, and gave them the experiences and self-confidence that Southern Negroes on the whole lacked. . . .

IS DISCRIMINATION THE WHOLE STORY?

"Aside from all the problems we have discussed, the facts still show that Negroes, at the same levels of education as whites, do not get as good jobs, as high incomes. These are still the crude, brute facts of discrimination. And yet the same facts can be responded to in different ways. The Japanese in California before the war found it impossible to get good jobs outside the Japanese community; Jews until the Second World War took it for granted that they would find few jobs in engineering or with large corporations. But at the same time, Japanese attended college in phenomenal numbers; they became the best educated racial group in California. Jews did the same. This meant frustration for Japanese and Jews who could not find jobs for which they had trained and were qualified. Graduate Jewish chemists peddled cosmetics that they had concocted and bottled, graduate Japanese technicians worked as busboys.

"But this overtraining also meant that when the barriers came down these groups were ready and waiting. The Negro today is not. It is true his experience has been more frustrating, prejudice more severe, personality damage more extensive. And yet in some ways the situation is better; never has there been more opportunity for education and training at government expense, never has there been a more favorable environment for minority students in colleges. . . .

"We do not propose a single explanation of the problems that afflict so many Negroes; obviously, if the schools were better, the students' performances would also be better. If housing and job conditions were better, there would be less illegitimacy. If the police were fairer, there would be [fewer] arrests of Negroes. If Negroes had better jobs and higher incomes, fewer of them would be sentenced, fewer criminals would be made in prisons and reformatories. All these things are true. And since it is easier to do something about education, housing, jobs, and police administration than many other things, there is where we should put our emphasis, and there is where we begin. But I think it is pointless to ignore the fact that the concentration of problems in the Negro community is exceptional, and that prejudice, low income, poor education explain only so much.

"Migration, uprooting, urbanization always create problems. Even the best organized and best integrated groups suffer under such circumstances. But when the fundamental core of organization, the family, is already weak, the magnitude of these problems may be staggering. The experience of slavery left as its most serious heritage a steady weakness in the Negro family. There was no marriage in the slave family—husbands could be sold away from wives, children from parents. There was no possibility of taking responsibility for one's children, for one had in the end no power over them. One could not educate them, nor even, in many cases, discipline them. . . . What slavery began, prejudice and discrimination, affecting jobs, housing, self-respect, have continued to keep alive among many, many colored Americans.

"This is the situation in the Negro community; it will be the situation for a long time to come. The magnitude of the problems in the lower-class and disorganized sector of the population is so great that the middle-class element is inadequate to deal with them, as other middle-class elements, of other ethnic groups, dealt in the past (and deal today) with their problems. Consequently, while the problems of other groups are in large measure their own, the problems of the Negro community become the problems of all of us. It is true (as is often pointed out by sociologists) that we do not hear of Jewish illegitimacy or juvenile delinquency because the community is so blanketed with institutions that it gets them before the public agencies do. But this works only because the proportion of problem-solvers to problem-producers in this community is so large. . . .

"[Thus] it is not likely that we will see a massive self-help effort. For one thing, the middle-class Negro, separated by a thin line from the lower-class Negro, is often too busy maintaining his own precarious adaptation to offer sympathy or assistance. But more important, it is not possible for Negroes to view themselves as other ethnic groups viewed themselves because—and this is the key to much in the Negro world—the Negro is only an American, and nothing else. He has no values and culture to guard and protect. He insists that the white world deal with his problems because, since he is so much the product of America, they are not his problems, but everyone's. Once they become everyone's, perhaps he will see that they are his own too." (Beyond the Melting Pot)

R&R Rel

Trans-Action
November, 1963

Is the White Southerner Ready for Equality?

by Raymond W. Mack

Two major issues with which the Kennedy administration must grapple bear a relationship to one another which is not visible at first glance. Significant progress in race relations—a matter of utmost urgency in both domestic and foreign policy—is closely linked to the whole question of federal aid to education. Neither civil rights legislation nor court decisions can provide a panacea for the problems of inequality between the races so long as we tolerate massive educational inequalities among the states.

In general, resistance to desegregation is highest where level of education is lowest. Industrial regions attract more people with more schooling than non-industrial regions. Rural areas have lower average educational levels than urban areas, and rural people find rapid social change less congenial than urbanites do. The doctrine of massive resistance to the Supreme Court's desegregation decision has its roots and strength in the least industrialized, most rural portion of the United States, the region where levels of formal education are lowest: the South.

During my brief tenure as assistant professor of sociology at the University of Mississippi a decade ago, I was struck by the sharp division of the faculty into two groups. Some — mostly young men, newly appointed, many in their first teaching post—oriented their thinking and their work toward the day when they would leave. The others were there to stay.

Those intending to leave were not a disgruntled or unhappy crew. They were scholars with a cosmopolitan view of the boundaries of their profession. To them, what was happening in physics or in psychology was more relevant than what was happening in Mississippi. They subscribed to national professional journals and presented research papers at national meetings.

Regional Boundaries

For those who would stay put, the world was local, not cosmopolitan. Their significant "reference groups," as sociologists would say, were Mississippi and the South. I do not mean to make them sound like narrow, uneducated dunces; they were (and are) not. They were part of a university faculty, interested in painting, politics, music, writing, and the exchange of ideas. But their dinner party discussions were likely to be devoted to topics with regional boundaries. What do you think of the new southern poet? Who are the most liberal southern Senators? Is the cultural life of Atlanta superior to that of New Orleans? What university has the strongest department of history in the South?

Even where they might come up with the same answers, the cosmopolitans and the locals phrased their questions differently. The former would ask who is the greatest contemporary American novelist; the latter would ask who is the greatest contemporary southern novelist.

The same choice of primary allegiance divided the student body. Most belonged to the group whose world was centered in Mississippi and bounded by the South. A markedly different few had their sights set on the time when, and the way in which, they would leave.

This division typifies the South as a whole. It represents the South's own problem, and the problem of the South as part of a larger nation. Some white southerners "pass" into the wider society. Others remain segregated within the only large, clearly-defined regional subculture in the United States. These locally-oriented people are behaving exactly like what they are: a minority group.

So accustomed are we to thinking of minorities in racial and national terms—Italian-Americans, Negroes, Orientals, Jews, Polish-Americans—that it is easy for us to overlook the existence, much less the problems of our largest minority: the white southerners. By most criteria sociologists use in defining and studying minorities, white southerners are a minority.

Southern Stereotype

A minority is stereotyped by the dominant group. Whether Jews, Negroes, or white southerners, they are thought of as a category sharing common characteristics and treated as a lump. Most Americans may expect one Oregonian to be different from another. But it is customary, even among editorial writers, columnists, and other intellectuals, to generalize about southerners. (Indeed, this is true to such an extent that it provides another example of the status of the American Negro as an "invisible man." When Americans say "southerner," they mean southern white.)

The southerner passes the ultimate test of the stereotype: people who do not conform to expectations are exempted from the category. Several times in social gatherings the turn of the conversation has led me to comment that my wife was born and reared in the South. The usual reassuring reply is, "Why, she doesn't seem like a southerner at all."

In the North, the statement "you don't seem like a southerner" is invariably intended as a compliment. It is like saying, "she's a Jew, but she's very quiet"; or "he's a Negro, but a real gentleman." However, such generalizations about southerners are made by people who describe themselves as liberals and would be offended if accused of holding a stereotype of a racial or ethnic minority. But there is no better evidence of the existence of a stereotype than the need to exempt individuals from membership in their social category.

A minority is self-conscious. They are aware of the fact that the dominant group in their society views them as inherently different. They have mixed feelings of pride in their origins and defensiveness about the characteristics which set them apart. Irish-Americans boast to one another and kid among themselves about being hard-drinking fighters while resenting that public stereotype of Irish uncouthness. No other jokes contain the mixed tribal tenderness and vicious anti-Semitism of Jewish stories about Jewishness.

They Used to Hate Us

Southerners, too, know that they are scorned by other Americans. But who waves the Confederate flag at football games? One would be hard put to find a more potent example of paranoiac chauvinism than the best selling (in Mississippi) automobile tags proclaiming: Mississippi—the most lied-about state in the Union. The cross borne in the Bible Belt was described poignantly by the late poet-sociologist Howard Washington Odum of the University of North Carolina: "They used to hate us; now they laugh at us."

The way of life of a minority is viewed by others not as conforming to a set of standards with a value of its own, but as a measurable deviation from the "right way," the standards of the majority. It is an annoyance and a bother when a Jewish holiday falls on the day of college registration. Jewish students must be registered the day before or the day after everyone else. They cause trouble. Somehow registration does not happen to fall on Christmas or Easter. Similarly, in a university whose English department harbors defenders of the Third Edition of Webster's International Dictionary and teachers of the "usage, not rules" school of English, students with a southern accent take special corrective work in the School of Speech to learn to speak "correctly."

No Southerner for President

A minority is excluded from full participation in the society's business. The "balanced ticket" dear to the hearts of New York and Chicago politicians is not only a concession to minority power; it is evidence that the minority lacks true access to the power elite. We debated whether or not we could elect a Catholic President. No one raised seriously the question of whether we could elect as President a man really labelled a southerner. John Sparkman with Adlai Stevenson made a balanced ticket. But when Lyndon Johnson decided to try seriously for the top office, he and his supporters spent months creating an image of him as a Westerner and a national leader.

It is true, however, that white southerners enjoy influence and power in Congress very greatly out of proportion to their numbers, and in this way they differ from other minorities. Southern Congressmen are elected by small tightly-controlled electorates from which many whites as well as most

White Southerner--

Negroes are excluded (although these are counted in the census for determining numbers of "representatives"). They easily build up seniority over representatives more democratically elected and in greater danger of being defeated; by being secure in their offices southerners have come to dominate the majority of standing committees that actually control Congressional business. Even this great power, however, the South uses as an embattled minority would—mostly defensively, to stop what it doesn't want and to extract concessions and special privileges.

For the southerners are a minority. We stereotype them. They see themselves as different, and take pride in their race history and their ghetto. We are prejudiced against them. We discriminate against them.

While we are involved in a national effort to abolish residual slavery and raise the Negro American to the level of a full-fledged citizen, we tend to use the word "southerner" to connote someone oppressing a minority. But this should not blind us to the fact that the oppressors are themselves a minority.

We are committed to equality for the Negro. What about the southern white? Is he ready? Are we?

Can They Be Assimilated?

The resolution of this problem, like any minority problem, lies in the answer to the question: Can they be assimilated?

Assimilating "southerners" into American society will be a tremendous job. (I am now using That Word to refer to locally and regionally oriented southerners. I am stereotyping and excluding those cosmopolitans who are already primarily Americans and only secondarily southerners.) The reason the South is hard to assimilate is not only that it has a distinctive history and culture. Goodness knows, southerners have participated in the country's crises; they have helped to make many and to solve others. The Mississippi National Guard, which was called upon to defend Mr. Meredith when he enrolled at Ole Miss, is proud of its record, and justifiably so. In the Korean War, it enlisted more volunteers and won more medals than any other state. But its pride is in the Mississippi National Guard, not in the United States.

The South has been largely excluded from the processes which made the rest of America. The South remains predominantly agrarian, with a high birth rate and a low level of formal education. It is the most rural section of an urban society, the least schooled segment of an educated society, the least industrialized part of an industrial society. Historically, as Philip M. Hauser says, the North and West have been the productive parts of the United States, and the South has been the reproductive part.

Penny-Wise Education

Since the Supreme Court desegregation decision of 1954, many people have become familiar with

Table 1. STATE SPENDING FOR EDUCATION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES

| Average Annual Expenditure for Education per Pupil | State | Percentage of Population 18 years of age and over with less than 6 years schooling |
|---|---|---|
| Less than $200 | Alabama | 19.1 |
| | Arkansas | 18.0 |
| | Georgia | 20.6 |
| | Kentucky | 16.2 |
| | Mississippi | 22.0 |
| | North Carolina | 19.3 |
| | South Carolina | 23.8 |
| | Tennessee | 17.3 |
| | Virginia | 15.3 |
| | West Virginia | 12.9 |
| $200-$249 | Florida | 10.8 |
| | Idaho | 3.9 |
| | Louisiana | 24.9 |
| | Maine | 5.5 |
| | Nebraska | 4.2 |
| | Texas | 15.7 |
| | Vermont | 4.4 |
| $250-$299 | Arizona | 11.7 |
| | Colorado | 5.5 |
| | Connecticut | 7.4 |
| | Kansas | 4.3 |
| | Illinois | 7.4 |
| | Iowa | 3.5 |
| | Maryland | 9.0 |
| | Massachusetts | 7.0 |
| | Michigan | 6.8 |
| | Nevada | 4.6 |
| | New Hampshire | 5.2 |
| | New Mexico | 14.3 |
| | North Dakota | 7.0 |
| | Ohio | 6.3 |
| | Oklahoma | 10.1 |
| | Pennsylvania | 8.1 |
| | Rhode Island | 8.7 |
| | South Dakota | 4.8 |
| | Washington | 4.0 |
| | Wisconsin | 6.2 |
| $300 or more | California | 6.7 |
| | Delaware | 7.7 |
| | Indiana | 5.7 |
| | Minnesota | 4.7 |
| | Missouri | 8.3 |
| | Montana | 4.8 |
| | New Jersey | 8.2 |
| | New York | 9.1 |
| | Oregon | 3.9 |
| | Utah | 3.3 |
| | Wyoming | 4.2 |

the social science data on Army Alpha tests of intelligence by race and region. Whites from Arkansas, Kentucky, and Mississippi scored significantly lower on these tests than Negroes from New York, Ohio, and Illinois. These research results do not mean that southerners are innately inferior to northerners, any more than similar contrasts should be interpreted to mean that urbanites are smarter than farmers or that Negroes are inferior to whites. They simply emphasize the consequences of unequal educational opportunities. Seven years ago, ten states spent less than $200 per pupil on education, and every one of the ten was a southern state. At the same time, as Table 1 shows, 31 states spent $250 or more per pupil, and not one of them was in the South.

The products of these regional educational inequalities are immediately apparent in other statistics. Only eleven states in the continental United States have a rate of adult illiteracy of over 15 percent. Again, every one of them is in the South. This is one reason that literacy tests for voting can be skillfully used as instruments of racial discrimination in the South. Tennessee is the only state of the old Confederacy where as many as a third of the Negroes of voting age are registered to vote; the figure in Mississippi is 5 percent.

Of the total population aged eighteen to twenty-four who were enrolled in college in 1960, we find nineteen states where the figure falls below 21 percent: the entire South, several border states, but only four states from all the rest of the country.

The social cost to the nation of this kind of inequality is documented in Melvin M. Tumin's study of what he calls "the hard core" of Southern resistance to desegregation. The outstanding characteristic of those most willing to resort to violence to defy the law of the land is a below-average amount of formal education. The violence-prone hard-core people belong to churches in about the same proportion as others and attend as frequently; they are as stable in residence patterns as their neighbors. But their earning power is significantly lower than that of their neighbors, and a much smaller percentage of them have completed

Table 2. THE NEGRO AND THE BALLOT IN THE SOUTH

| State | Percentage of Negroes of Voting Age Who Are Registered to Vote |
|---|---|
| Alabama | 12% |
| Arkansas | 31 |
| Florida | 28 |
| Georgia | 22 |
| Louisiana | 26 |
| Mississippi | 5 |
| North Carolina | 28 |
| South Carolina | 13 |
| Texas | 31 |
| Virginia | 20 |

Table 3. PROPORTION OF POPULATION IN COLLEGE, BY STATE, 1960

| State | College Population as Percentage of Total Population Aged 18-24 |
|---|---|
| Less than 20% | |
| Alabama | 15.0 |
| Arkansas | 16.5 |
| Delaware | 18.9 |
| Florida | 16.0 |
| Georgia | 12.8 |
| Kentucky | 16.7 |
| Louisiana | 19.1 |
| Maine | 14.9 |
| Maryland | 19.4 |
| Mississippi | 17.1 |
| Nevada | 16.2 |
| New Jersey | 18.8 |
| New Mexico | 18.3 |
| North Carolina | 14.6 |
| South Carolina | 12.5 |
| Tennessee | 18.6 |
| Virginia | 14.0 |
| West Virginia | 19.0 |
| 20% to 26% | |
| Idaho | 20.0 |
| Illinois | 24.1 |
| Indiana | 23.0 |
| Iowa | 25.1 |
| Michigan | 24.9 |
| Missouri | 22.4 |
| Montana | 22.9 |
| New Hampshire | 24.8 |
| North Dakota | 23.9 |
| Ohio | 21.4 |
| Pennsylvania | 21.4 |
| Rhode Island | 24.4 |
| South Dakota | 25.2 |
| Texas | 20.5 |
| Wisconsin | 23.3 |
| Wyoming | 23.5 |
| 26% and over | |
| Arizona | 28.1 |
| California | 32.1 |
| Colorado | 29.2 |
| Connecticut | 26.4 |
| Kansas | 27.3 |
| Massachusetts | 31.3 |
| Minnesota | 26.7 |
| Nebraska | 28.0 |
| New York | 26.6 |
| Oklahoma | 27.2 |
| Oregon | 30.7 |
| Utah | 37.9 |
| Vermont | 30.0 |
| Washington | 26.7 |

White Southerner--

nine years or more of school. As a result, the wider society impinges much less directly upon them; they are less influenced by the mass media of magazines, newspapers, radio, and television.

From Bad to Worse

The trouble with a serious imbalance regionally in education and income is that it tends to feed upon itself. What is bad becomes worse precisely because it is known to be bad. A recent study by Russell Middleton, University of Wisconsin, shows that most department chairmen in southern colleges and universities believe that their recruiting of staff is hampered by the images scholars have of the South. Middleton's survey of doctoral candidates about to enter college teaching shows that the South is the last region where scholars choose to work. He concludes that "for the immediate future the prospects for higher education in the South are dubious."

They are likely to remain so until we accept the need to correct inequalities in the educational opportunities available to Americans regardless of race, color, or region. It is difficult to see how we can achieve this if we cling to pathological fears of federal aid to education instead of using our federal government for what it is and should be: an instrument of our own will and destiny.

Americans have chosen to attack courageously the problem of unequal opportunities for Negro citizens. The task of redressing this shameful situation might be expedited by turning our attention at the same time to another culturally deprived minority.

---

Raymond W. Mack is professor and chairman of the sociology department at Northwestern University. He has written many articles on social class, race relations, indutsrial conflict, and occupational specialization. His most recent book is Race, Class and Power. He is associate editor of Sociological Quarterly.

WE SAY IT AGAIN . . . If you are publishing a trade journal, industrial publication, newsletter, newspaper, magazine, or any periodical, our articles are available for your free use. You don't need to write for our permission. We want our articles about social science to be circulated as widely as possible, so they are free for use in all publications except books and anthologies. We do require two things, a credit line "reprinted from Trans-action, published by Washington University, St. Louis," and a copy of the issue in which the article was reprinted.

Political Types--

(continued from page 27)

field achieve a game and entertain a common but diverse audience. A single authority is not necessary.

The best example perhaps is science. There is no generalissimo giving orders to scientists, nor even settling disputes among them. They have instead a self-correcting method and discipline which all legitimate scientists follow, a general goal, and a highly desirable social product. Tasks are set, a division of labor is assigned, adequate communications exist, and workable methods to seek out and eliminate error are in force—all without generals or jails.

The Model of Science

We consider science the most rational and free pursuit in our society—and also the one most likely to search out the truth. But in looking for the ideal model of rational administration our "organization theorists" are turning not to science —nor even to other models of a free give-and-take through which a common direction is hammered out—but to the increasingly closed society of the modern corporation.

Today's corporation, however, seeks to become, not a growing arena for contending forces and change, but an entity that will survive, however statically, providing a haven and way of life for its members. It does not compare to science as a model for administering our pluralistic democratic society, or for fulfilling that ideal stamped on every American coin—E Pluribus Unum—which is variously translated, but means unity through diversity.

Look 12/17/63
R+R Rel

The author, a native of California, discusses the wide gulf between what he believes to be right and how he actually behaves when he meets the Negro as an employee, a boss, or simply an acquaintance whom he hesitates to invite to a party in his home.

A WHITE MAN LOOKS AT THE NEGRO

BY GILBERT CROSS

I'M WHITE. I live in New York City where the paths of the black man and the white man must often cross, whether they want them to or not.

Not long ago, I visited a Negro nightclub and, for once, I found myself a member of a scorned minority. My overtures at friendliness were haughtily rebuffed. I realized afterwards that my clumsy eagerness to be accepted by the Negroes there was a form of condescension, and they recognized it.

There was condescension also in my studied cordiality to a lone Negro who happened to be seated next to me in a restaurant, in our discussion of the race problem, and in my promise to have him over to my place for dinner soon. There was cowardice in my subsequent preoccupation with how I would arrange the guest list, and brief the guests, so as not to embarrass me. There was a real sense of guilt that I was not having him over as a friend or a man with an interesting mind, but as a Negro—a curiosity.

A few weeks later, I was the one who was briefed, by a careful hostess. A mutual friend of ours, a white girl, was going to bring her Negro boy friend to a cocktail party. Despite the briefing, when I saw her walk through the door with her Negro beau, I felt a sudden backlash of anger: at her, for betraying a life and a code we both knew; at him, for trying to intrude upon us.

These personal episodes, and others like them, have made me wonder about the strange and often contradictory mixture of tolerance and prejudice, anger and idealism that governs or rather confuses my reactions to the Negro, and his struggle to win a place in my world.

Why am I so condescending? Why so frightened? Why so angry when a Negro touches my life?

I was born and raised in California. My father was and still is a minister, and in the city where we lived, I do not think there was any man more active than he in supporting Negro organizations in their struggle to advance their race. As a little boy, I was proud that my father was so idealistic. I thought this put us a cut above the neighbors. Yet I do not recall that a Negro ever sat at our dinner table, and we children always knew, without ever being told it, that any but the most casual of friendships with a Negro child was simply not for us.

For several years, my father conducted a radio program, and this made it necessary for him to travel often with the members of a Negro quartet. Time after time, he came back from his trips storming in indignation at the hotels that had refused to house the Negroes. I remember how he tried to impress upon us children how neat the singers' homes were, and what clean, bright and well-bred children they had.

Yet, looking back, I guess what must have impressed itself upon my young mind was that there were a great many hotel clerks in this world who really did think there was something wrong with the Negro, no matter what my father said. And I still remember the look of shock and outrage on my father's face when he heard that a former member of the quartet had married a white girl.

So prejudice comes early, and quietly, more through things unsaid than those that are said. But the fact of prejudice does not explain its power. Why is the white man so afraid to have a Negro touch his life?

Sociologists I have asked about this claim that it is not so much because of the white man's opinion of the Negro as it is the presence of the Negro, which threatens the white man's opinion of himself. A lady who lives in East Flatbush, Brooklyn—an orderly, pleasant, middle-class white neighborhood—filed suit recently to prevent her son from being transferred to a junior high school on the edge of Brownsville, a neighboring Negro-Puerto Rican slum. She explains her feelings this way:

"My husband was a Brownsville boy. Even when he grew up there, it was considered a slum area. He was the son of immigrant parents, and has worked his way up. After we married, we lived in Bedford-Stuyvesant until a lower-class element came in, and it became unbearable to walk the streets. We took a basement apartment in East Flatbush just so we could live in a nice area. We worked ourselves up so we could afford to buy a home.

"If you move to East Flatbush from Brownsville, you are considered on your way up. I feel it is unfair, when you have worked your way up, to have to send your children back."

I think this kind of "status feeling" plays a bigger part than most people realize, or like to admit, in keeping the bars of prejudice high, even for those of us who have not just escaped from the slums.

Not long ago, an Ethiopian lawyer applied for an extra room in my apartment that I was offering for rent. I found myself brushing him off with vague, guilty excuses. I did not think about the sort of person he was. I wondered: What would the landlady say? What would the neighbors think? What would I say to my friends? But when one of my friends, in a holier-than-thou tone, accused me of discriminating, I got mad.

continued

It is this angry, guilty conflict, between the conscience of the white man and his feeling about his standing in the world, that complicates efforts to help the Negro solve his problems. Once, a Negro girl was assigned to me temporarily as a secretary. She worked so hard and seemed so willing that I said, with what was probably typical white-man condescension, that she deserved a chance, so I took her on as my regular secretary. But I soon found that her segregated schooling meant that she had never learned to think independently and show initiative. And she was in such a desperate hurry to improve herself that she was furiously studying shorthand before she had really learned to do the typing well.

But I am afraid she was not the only one who was found wanting. Several times, she reported to me that when she delivered papers to the offices of certain business associates of mine who were Southerners, they seemed appalled that my secretary was a Negro. I still remember the strange little fear that crawled up inside me when she said that, the fear that I would be downgraded in my colleagues' eyes because of her, that they would think I was some kind of nut or social reformer. After that, there were times when I took the papers to those offices myself.

When the colored girl was denied a promotion because she had not mastered the work, she told people in the office she had been held back because she was a Negro. At the time, I thought that was a silly statement. Now, I'm not so sure. I suppose if we really got to the root of the thing, that was why she was held back.

It had seemed to me at the beginning, as I'm sure it had seemed to her, that once the door of opportunity was opened, all would be well.

I hadn't counted on the price that was going to have to be paid, by both of us, for the generations of lost opportunity. I thought then the price was too much to ask. Now I'm not so sure. Somebody has to pay.

Somebody has to pay. Somebody has to come to grips with the Negro's interlinked demands—jobs, housing and schools—not only in high-minded chatter at cocktail parties, in policies of the Federal Government, in stately editorials in the New York Times, but also in the unwelcome and difficult adjustments that he must make in his own daily life.

Somebody has to pay. But I can't resist the impulse to say that if I'm lucky, it won't be me. I'm not proud of that thought, but there it is. I don't want trouble, especially the kind of trouble that puts my feelings and my conscience so agonizingly at odds. I'll run from this one if I get a chance.

But will I get the chance? To be cold-blooded about it, finding a solution to the Negro problem is, for the white man, a problem not only of justice but of self-protection. If we don't allow the Negro to touch our lives peacefully, we risk having him mark our lives violently. So how much, and in what ways, am I willing to let the Negro touch my life?

First, I believe that a properly qualified Negro ought to be entitled to work for the company I work for, at a job as good as mine—or better, if he is good enough—and that I should be willing to work with him as a professional colleague. (I have found that work is, for me, a surprisingly color-blind activity. I respect genuine competence, rare as it is, and am glad whenever and wherever I find it.)

Whether I would accept the Negro easily as a direct superior or subordinate is another question. It occurs to me that if an order comes down from the top of an organization that a Negro is to be employed in a certain capacity, that makes it easier. Then there is some outside force to blame. If I have to make the decision myself, it's harder.

(I had a colored boss once. While I was still a student, I was hitchhiking through Arizona and ran out of money. To grubstake myself, I got a job picking cotton. The boss of the crew turned out to be a good-natured colored man, big enough to lick any of the rag-taggle of harvest workers the employment office had turned up. I looked at him. He looked at me. Each one knew what the other one was thinking. I needed the money, so I went to work, stooping through the cotton field, while the colored boss sat in the shade watching me with a twinkle in his eye.)

If a Negro is professionally qualified to work with me, then I think he would probably be qualified economically and socially to live across the street from me, and should probably be allowed to. If he moved in, I hope I would treat him courteously. (Superficially, at least, I would probably treat him too courteously.) Whether I would have him into my home as a guest would depend in part, I guess, on what sort of neighbor he turned out to be.

If my neighbors started to panic at the prospect of a Negro moving in, I hope I would show some leadership in trying to calm them. But if ten Negroes wanted to move in, no matter how well qualified they were, with every evidence of a real panic and a drop in property values, then I might well work behind the scenes to block them. Failing that, I would probably sell and run. These questions involve the lives of white people as well as black, and they are matters of practicality as well as principle.

> "My father was indignant when a hotel turned away Negroes, but he was outraged when a Negro married a white girl."

In terms of acceptance of the Negro, there is one point that seems to recur in my mind. It is not a nice one, but it is an unavoidable one: White men want the Negro they accept to look as "white" as possible. If they are going to let him into their world, they want to feel at home not only with his education, his manners, his dress and his habits of living, but with his physical appearance itself and not color alone. I find that I respond best to a Negro who looks like a coffee-colored white man.

I wonder if foreignness of feature, and its unconscious implication in the white mind of a kind of primal earthiness, does not count as much as or more than color itself in keeping the bars of prejudice high. And I wonder if a presumed primitiveness does not account for some of the terror and fury that flare when the Negro male strays across the color line, and the snickering recounting by white males of the purported extra attractions of the Negro female.

This issue gets close to the heart of a question that lurks in the mind of any white man who thinks at length about the subject of race: "Would I want my daughter to marry a Negro?" It happens that I am a bachelor. But the question has as powerful an effect on me, I think, as though I did have a daughter.

Some of my friends who live in well-heeled, well-educated suburbs outside New York City, where the Negro can be viewed from a very safe distance, deny in the name of principle any prejudice at all. But when it comes to the question of letting a Negro into the family, they plead the prejudice of society. "Not with standards what they are in this country," says one man (who has never entertained a Negro in his home). "I hate to say this. If this were Brazil, I wouldn't mind."

But in a nearby community, an enthusiastically liberal mother, who has long worked for integration and tolerance, and has frequently entertained Negroes as friends, faced the problem much closer to home when her daughter wanted to date an intelligent, charming Negro boy. It was not a case of romance. The daughter simply wanted to prove a point, to show that she had the courage of her mother's convictions.

"I had kittens," admits the mother, "and the only reason I felt that way, I'll be honest, was because he was of a different color."

I'd have kittens, too, and whether this would be because of abject social cowardice or some deep, instinctual bar, I can't say, and I really don't care. I just don't want it.

But quibbling about interracial marriage is, too often, just a good way of avoiding the much less explosive, much more immediate steps that can be taken, in gradually weaving the life of the black man into the fabric of the white man's world. The simplest step, the easiest and, perhaps over the long run, the most fruitful in terms of avoiding trouble and laying a groundwork for understanding, is simply for the middle-class white man to go to the trouble to make the acquaintance of a few of his counterparts of the other race.

Yet, even here, there is a curious personal aloofness toward the colored man, an instinctive withdrawal from him, even by the white men who seem to care about him most. It could almost be called "apartheid of the heart." A teacher of social science who is making a career of studying Negro problems told me enthusiastically of the civil-rights campaign, "It's about the most important movement to hit this country since the Civil War, and not excluding the 1930's." I asked him whether he had attended last summer's Freedom March in Washington. He shook his head. "I gave some money," he said. "That was the extent of my contribution."

And as for myself, and my deep concern about the Negro, that colored man I met in the restaurant, the one I promised to invite to dinner: I pondered for a week or so the question of what to do about a guest list. Then I got busy with other things. I never called him.

FIRST OF A SERIES ANALYZING THE RIGHTS STRUGGLE

12/26/63 R+R/Rel.

A look at the Negro Movement

By Joanne Grant
(First of a series)

IN ITS THIRD YEAR the Negro freedom movement has sharpened its impact on the nation as a whole and, more importantly, has widened its influence in the Negro community, with more and more working people becoming involved. This development has been described by one observer as a change from a "battle of the elite" to a battle of the masses. With this new direction, many in the movement now wonder: Where is it going?

Questions are being asked and answers debated in meetings and conferences of the freedom movement.

- Should Negroes demand preferential treatment in education and jobs in partial repayment for 300 years of exploitation?
- What is the extent of the resistance of the white majority and how much can it retard or abort the Negro drive for freedom?
- Can the movement be captured, or numbers of white participants to gain its end?
- Can the movement develop methods to cope with the economic aspects of discrimination?
- Are the tactics, the nonviolent demonstrations, sufficient to the task?
- Can it develop enough political power to gain its ends?
- Can it gain its ends without a deeper struggle joined with other major issues troubling the country?

NEW EMPHASIS: When the movement began in 1960, it was college students who staged sit-ins at "white only" lunch counters in Southern cities. The new turn toward involvement of adults, working people, in the movement accompanied a shift in emphasis first from public accommodations to voting, then to jobs.

(Continued on Page 8)

Rights movement

(Continued from Page 1)

What next? One answer is that of John Lewis, chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Lewis says: "This must be a people's movement, not a leaders' movement. We must become radical enough to present a positive program to meet the needs of an oppressed people."

The development has already caused changes. For instance, a shift in emphasis from the courts to direct action. Even though legal action is extensive today the civil rights participants now are more often defendants rather than complainants. (This shift has taken place gradually since the 1954 Supreme Court decision outlawing segregated schools, when civil rights cases tended to involve one or more individuals suing to enter a school or desegregate a park or golf course. In 1963 the NAACP Legal Aid and Defense Fund reports it represented 10,485 peaceful protesters as defendants and handled only 120 cases in which complainants sued for desegregation of schools or other facilities.)

BASIC DEMANDS: The involvement of masses of people has meant that the movement must re-evaluate its aims and methods. But it is also the most important reason for the growing strength of the movement. It is also the cause of a sharpening of the movement's focus; that is, when the most deprived sections of the Negro population become involved in the struggle for equality, the demands become more basic. Thus the movement finds itself now not only re-evaluating aims and tactics but searching for solutions to the economic problem which face the masses of Negro people.

In the North the new goals are typified by demonstrations such as those at construction sites in New York's Harlem, and the current rent strikes, which are not demands for integration, but for improved living conditions. The Brooklyn Congress of Racial Equality has declared all-out war on rats, roaches, factories on residential streets and high food prices.

Langston in the Christian Science Monitor
"Well, I'd rather be marching to a job."

The campaign, called Operation Total Strike, will seek to spread a rent strike throughout Bedford-Stuyvesant, Brooklyn's Negro ghetto; rid the neighborhood of rats ("There are more rats than people in Bedford-Stuyvesant," CORE's Arnold Goldwag says), turn vacant lots into parks, end police harassment of residents, get traffic lights on 300 more street corners and force merchants to lower prices to match those in all-white neighborhoods.

BOYCOTT EFFECTIVE: In Philadelphia and other Northern cities the economic boycott has been used effectively to gain Negro employment and upgrading in companies which have discriminatory policies. The boycott has also been used effectively in Southern cities, such as Savannah, Ga., in campaigns for desegregation of public accommodations.

In the South, after the sit-ins and mass arrests of Negro students in many cities in 1960 and '61, there were gains on the legal front, and lunch counters in retail stores in more than 100 cities were desegregated. As advances were made in some cities, opposition hardened

POLICE BRUTALITY HAS BEEN A HALLMARK OF THE RIGHTS BATTLE
Columbia, S.C., cops drag off a Negro demonstrator

in others. Negro demands were pressed in places such as Nashville, Tenn., where a well organized student group led community demonstrations for an "open city."

With success in some areas and stalemate in others, civil rights groups turned from public accommodations to voter registration. In the fight for the right to vote conducted by field staffs and local chapters of the major civil rights organizations—NAACP, CORE, SNCC and Rev. Martin Luther King Jr's. Southern Christian Leadership Conference—and by local organizations, more and more people were touched by the movement.

In the Deep South this meant violence from segregationists. The Southern Regional Council recorded 64 acts of violence in Mississippi between January, 1961, and March, 1963. In Southwest Georgia churches used for mass meetings were burned, shots were fired into homes of voter registration leaders. But relentless as segregationist opposition was, it could not stop the drive, even though it held and used the weapon of starvation.

In Fayette and Haywood counties, Tenn., though hundreds of sharecroppers and tenant farmers were turned off the land, they lived in donated tents, started a handbag-making cooperative, and continued to register to vote. In Mississippi, where Herbert Lee was killed by a member of the Mississippi State Legislature, where SNCC worker James Travis was shot in the neck, where NAACP leader Medgar Evers was assassinated, 90,000 Negroes voted in an unofficial Freedom ballot for governor last month, and they continued to boycott downtown Jackson stores.

'READY FOR CHANGE': To the Southwest Georgia sheriff who says, "We want our nigras to continue to live just like they have for the past hundred years," there are Negro voices throughout the South who say with Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer, who was driven off a plantation for trying to register to vote in a Delta town: "As long as I can remember I have been ready for a change. I was beaten in Winona until I was hard as melon. People have been dying in Mississippi, and I'm tired. I'm in this fight now and I will not be stopped until there is a change."

It is such expressions of determination by a sharecropper, a tenant farmer, a member of a teen-age gang, which make the Negro drive for freedom different in 1963 from 1960, or from earlier struggles. When 300 Negroes in Selma, Ala., are no longer afraid to go down to the courthouse and stand in line all day to ask the man for a voter registration application, a substantive change has taken place.

This change is marked not only by the shift from public accommodations to voting and jobs, but even in the character of the campaign for voter registration. In Mississippi the vote drive has created because of the nature of the problem, and the kinds of people involved, a parallel drive to eliminate illiteracy. Negroes who could not read and write attempted to register in Delta towns to show that they want to vote. This campaign is described by James Forman, executive secretary of SNCC, thus: "The gains being won should not go over to the bourgeois Negroes. We want the people in the movement to get the benefits, to be able to exercise political power."

POLITICAL FRONT: A new emphasis was placed in the fall of '63 on political action. There was a focus on the civil rights bill by rights organizations and a recognition by Congress of the power of the Negro vote. Roy Wilkins, NAACP executive secretary, vowed that the NAACP would actively seek the defeat in 1964 of congressmen who failed to support civil rights legislation. Civil rights organizations supported Negro candidates in local elections—a city council candidate in Pine Bluff, Ark., and Slater King head of the Albany, Ga., Movement, who ran for mayor.

What seems to have been accomplished then, is an awakening of the ordinary Negro to a recognition of his ability to fight the system of segregation, a widening of the application of the call to "put your body in the Movement." What must now be confronted is the problem of poverty-level incomes. A recent study of the economic status of Negroes published by the Southern Regional Council reports that the median income of non-white families in Mississippi is $1,444, of whites $4,209; that 66.2% of Negro families and 22% of white families have incomes under $2,000.

Also to be grappled with is the pressure of the Negro drive for jobs versus staggering general unemployment. Negroes are demanding a greater share of the pie; but the pie simply is not large enough. Some in the movement do not see a solution to this problem as one of the movement's responsibilities. As Forman put it: "The civil rights movement's push for Negro jobs forces upon the country the question of full employment. Full employment is the country's problem; it is a national problem."

SOME DIFFICULTIES: Involvement of more working-class people in the struggle spells difficulties for the leadership in determination of goals and methods. Sometimes it is a question of restraining people outraged by some white act of violence. This was the case in Birmingham, when after the movement headquarters and a leader's home had been bombed Negroes burned stores, overturned cars, attacked police. Sometimes this angry thrust is blocked by timid leadership, when, some in the movement believe, it should be channeled into productive demonstrations, not stopped.

Whitney Young, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, wrote in Ebony, Sept., 1963: "Today, almost without exception, the leadership of the Negro's civil rights struggle is drawn from the middle-class group. The danger exists, therefore, that because of the widening alienation of the classes, each class may at times be working toward different goals. This is evidenced in support by working or lower-class Negroes for certain schools and public housing projects near or in their ghetto districts; and a resultant clash with middle-class Negroes who may oppose erection of such buildings because they regard them as strengthening segregation instead of weakening it."

But the civil rights movement is heading toward a time of decision in recognition of the needs of the working-class Negroes who are putting their bodies in the struggle.

R & R Rel.

The Psychology of Persecution and Prejudice

by

DAVID STAFFORD - CLARK

Reprinted from

VIEWS

Quarterly Review, Spring 1963

The Psychology of Persecution & Prejudice

by DAVID STAFFORD-CLARK

FOR THE PROPONENTS

I. THE CHIEF ENGINEER

" Shootin' is naught tae a Chinaman. They dinna min' daith, which way a white mon min's it. It's a scienteefic fack that a Chinaman has fewer nairves in his body than whit we ha'e; they canna feel pain. Nearer beasts than men, they are."

—From IN HAZARD by Richard Hughes.

II. BARRABAS

" . . . 'Tis a custom held with us
That when we speak to Gentiles like to you
We turn into the air to purge ourselves
For unto us the Promise doth belong."

—From THE JEW OF MALTA by Christopher Marlowe.

FOR THE OPPOSITION

III. SHYLOCK

" . . . Hath not a Jew eyes? hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, heal'd by the same means, warm'd and cool'd by the same winter and summer, as a Christian is? If you prick us, do we not bleed? if you tickle us, do we not laugh? if you poison us, do we not die? "

—From THE MERCHANT OF VENICE by William Shakespeare.

IV. DR. MILLER

" If you call a man a bug, it means that you propose to treat him as a bug, whereas if you call him a man it means that you propose to treat him as a man. My profession is to study men which means that I must always call men by their name; always think of them as men; yes, and always treat them as men; because if you don't treat men as men they don't behave as men . . ."

—From EYELESS IN GAZA by Aldous Huxley.

THE VERDICT

V.

" If we take people as they are, we make them worse. If we treat them as if they were what they ought to be, we help them to become what they are capable of becoming."

—Goethe.

THE LAST WORD

VI.

" I mean not to accuse anyone but to take the shame upon myself in common with the whole of my people."

—William Wilberforce.

THE theme of this essay, which is based upon a lecture originally delivered in the Senate House of the University of London at the invitation of the Council of Christians and Jews, is nevertheless concerned in its widest sense not primarily or exclusively with those special problems which trouble the relationships between Jew and Christian. It is concerned with intolerance of all kinds, and particularly racial intolerance, everywhere.

For wherever and however it is encountered, racial intolerance remains the same terrible thing, no matter what its source or whomsoever its victims; and so our first task must be to examine together the basis of prejudice and persecution in the relationship between man and man, and to trace this through biological and psychological evidence to its final and challenging implications, with their inevitably tragic outcome unless the facts are faced, the implications acknowledged, and previous assumptions and attitudes fundamentally altered.

LET us begin with a few facts. The biological homogeneity of the human race is undisputed. In the Bible (Acts 17, 26), we are told that God created all nations of one kind of man; and geneticists, anthropologists and biologists, would agree that man is of one species; but they would also agree that there are a number of races of that species. We must presently consider the precise implications of this statement: but what is immediately tragically and painfully apparent is that this division into racial groups has from time immemorial been the focus of so much inherent antipathy, cruelty, rancour, arrogance, hatred, spite, and all that sheer uncharitableness which so often mars the relationship of human beings with each other.

What do we mean by prejudice? As part of my preparation for this lecture I looked up the dictionary definition of prejudice, and of persecution, because although I thought I knew what they meant, I felt that an objective definition would be a good start. Prejudice has been defined as "An unreasonable, or unjustifiably adverse opinion without just grounds or sufficient knowledge". I can only say that although that comes out of Webster's Dictionary, I couldn't have put it better myself. Persecution: "To pursue so as to injure, grieve or afflict." Now those simple words, I submit, conjure up a very lively image in our minds of what those two states mean; of what it is to be the victim of prejudice, and of what it is to be persecuted. In the relations of human beings to each other there can of course be no final justification for either activity. And I mean that.

It is never, it can never, be justifiable to pursue so as to injure, grieve, or afflict another human being: still less, by definition alone, can it ever be justifiable to hold "an unreasonably adverse opinion of anybody, without just grounds or sufficient knowledge"; and yet, of course, this is the way we find ourselves behaving.

Now upon what do we base this? First of all, what are races? Ever since man's interest in his own state and in those around him has been displayed and recorded, the differences between groups of human beings have attracted attention. Physique, skin-colour, custom and language are all ways in which traditionally races have been distinguished, before objective or scientific examination of the problem was possible. But custom and language can never constitute a valid criterion for the differentiation of races. They are acquired characteristics, cultural and geographical but not racial, and in any scientific study we must begin by discarding them completely. We must also discard the colour of the skin, because although men speak of white races, yellow races, red, brown and black races, these descriptions are in fact in no way racially specific. Certainly they provide vivid examples of the foundations of prejudice, as we shall see in a moment, but they are not otherwise of value.

For a start, they are curiously misleading in their subjective application. Most, but happily not all, of my audience this afternoon would probably call themselves white: but a colorimeter would show that their skin colour range varies through greyish pink to sallow hyacinth. Indeed, perhaps the only approximation to a truly blanched and pallid white face is my own. But to pass for white in description is to imply membership of a privileged racial group; and this is the important consideration for the so-called white man, woman or child. Moreover, ostensible skin colour as a distinguishing criterion in racial differentiation is not simply descriptively inaccurate, but fundamentally unreliable, because black skins or very dark skins are not racially distinctive at all. The Southern Indians of India, South African Negroes, the West Indians, the Australian Aboriginals, and the Pacific Negritos are all the same colour, but they are as racially different from each other as they are from people of different colours. So that if we wish to find some basis which will be accurate and which will give us an idea of what we really mean by race, we have to look into the constitution of the individual: and this is where the science of genetics has come to our aid.

Genetic Differentiation

If we study the transmissible characteristics of human beings, those carried in their genes which they have inherited and which they pass on, then we begin to discover that there are characteristics which distinguish different races and thereby give us a basis of differentiation which is accurate and statistically valid. This kind of evidence, and this alone, entitles us to say that whereas man is one species, there are probably somewhere about ten main divisions of racial origin, and up to thirty sub-divisions in which cultural and geographical factors have played an additional part.

For example, by ascertaining the proportions of a relatively small number of genes, those connected with blood groups, we can differentiate races accurately and precisely. By studying the distribution of blood groups throughout the population, we gain an indication of the biological origin, in terms of race, of that population. The first thing that we learn is that there is no such thing as a pure race. Groups of human beings are constantly mingling and separating; new groups are constantly being formed, all racial origins are mixed. The concept of a pure race is not simply a myth, for a myth can be valuable; it is rather a dangerous and often a hideous illusion: and the cruel and evil things which have been perpetrated in its name have, in fact, been based upon an assumption which is entirely fallacious.

Let us take a single example. Glass and Li calculated from blood group data that North American Negroes have about 30 per cent white ancestry. From the rate at which racial mixture has been occurring in this population, they estimate that American Negro and American white will have become indistinguishable, both races having become assimilated in a common population, in about 1,000 years, if racial mixture continues at a constant rate. Their observations also conclusively contradict the common belief that North American Negroes have a considerable amount of American-Indian ancestry. This kind of information, based upon the study of blood groups and other genetic factors, is objectively verifiable. It certainly tells us that races exist, but it also tells us that they mix; and it tells us, too, that their genetic diversity is the important thing about them.

Nevertheless there are factors at work all the time to alter the balance and proportion of the constitutional element of races. Nature is always throwing up new versions of man, and the version which has, for instance, a darker skin will thrive to the comparative exclusion of the version which has a very pale one, in very hot climates; so that natural selection will ensure that in people habitually living in very hot climates, pigmentation of the skin will tend to be a characteristic feature. Nature also throws up human beings who have a remarkable resistance to cold. Immerse their forearms in a bucket of iced water, and by comparison with others less well endowed in this respect, they will endure two or three or four times as long before they are compelled by pain to remove their arm; or alternatively before they lose sensation and the power to move at all. Logically you might expect to find a very high proportion of the constitutional factors connected with this resistance to cold among Eskimos and those who live in very cold climates; and this in fact is what you do find.

Biological variations of the proportions of racial constitutional factors produce a constant change and diversity of the genetic equipment of human beings; and biologically there is nothing ominous about this at all. Whence then comes the ominous way that people feel about this? Whence the hostility? Whence the misgiving? Let us return for a moment to the Bible, and there turn, as traditionally we are invited, to the ant for an illustration.

Automatic Discrimination

Ants are creatures which probably have not more than 15 per cent of their total behaviour in any way under their conscious control. By far the most of it seems to be innate, instinctive, automatic, and unreasoning, although very highly complicated. It is therefore interesting to note that ants can recognise members of their own colony, apparently by scent, and that they can and do avoid members of other colonies, particularly on foraging expeditions; that ants frequently make a particular kind of food for their colony by using various scraps of vegetable matter on which a particular mould will grow, taking from it a crop as men will take their corn. And if you then give an ant from one colony some of the crop from another colony, he will tend to refuse it.

Ants have in fact social prejudices, and prejudices about food. The work of Professor Tinbergen, formerly of Leyden University, now at Oxford, has shown that animals' behaviour is, to a remarkable degree, governed by what he calls "releasers". These are specific stimuli which release in the animal already innate patterns of activity. One of the reasons why mixture between different species seems to occur comparatively rarely in nature, is that releasers from one species are not represented by any activity of another.

The patterns of releaser activity in animals are indeed fascinating and complicating. An example is the mating pattern of the stickleback. A stickleback may begin its mating pattern with another little fish of approximately the same kind, but because the other little fish has an instinctive way of reacting to this which differs from that of the stickleback itself, nothing comes of it. Neither decision, choice, nor even conscious reasoning are called for here. Nevertheless, there is in fact no outcome: segregation has prevailed. But, on the other hand, take a stickleback, put him in a glass test tube, place him in a part of the tank which he normally inhabits, introduce another stickleback similarly enclosed in a test tube beside him, and the other stickleback will immediately show all the evidence of an urgent desire to flee. He will start waving his fins vigorously, while the stickleback who is on his own ground will put his nose down and tail up, adopting the attacking position as Tinbergen has described it. Reverse the geographical situation by transposing these two in their respective test tubes to the other end of the tank where the former intruder is now at home, and the former defender of his territory is now on foreign soil, and although they can have no other communication with each other, the change in their environment releases precisely the opposite reactions in each of them. The formerly pugnacious stickleback will now try to flee, the former would-be fugitive will now become aggressive. Their environment, in fact, acts as a releaser, to which they in turn react automatically.

Tinbergen has also drawn attention to the characteristic behaviour of members of a group of social animals, towards one of their number temporarily isolated, threatened, or made " different " in some disturbing way.

During the process of attaching coloured leg rings to individual herring gulls, so that he could identify them on future occasions in the course of observing the whole colony, he was struck by the behaviour of the rest of the colony towards the temporarily netted gull, furiously struggling in a hitherto unrecognised and perhaps seemingly dangerous predicament. He has written : —

> " A gull struggling in the net promptly causes great commotion among the other gulls. They gather above it in a dense flock, screaming loudly, and swoop down in what seem to be actual attacks. We were always so taken up with getting the captured gull before it could escape, and with ringing and releasing it with the least possible delay, that we never stopped to study the reactions of the other gulls more closely; yet this would be very worth while because the phenomenon has interesting sociological aspects. The gulls seemed to show a double response. On the one hand, they are alarmed by the disturbance. I think I have heard the alarm call on a number of such occasions. On the other hand, their reaction to the captured gull seems definitely hostile. It is known in other instances, too, that social animals may attack individuals that behave in a different or abnormal manner.
>
> " One is tempted to compare this with human behaviour. In human society, ' primitive ' as well as ' civilised ', a similar instinctive reaction is very strongly developed. It is perhaps possible to distinguish three steps or gradations of rising intensity in the social defence attitude of a crowd. The first is laughing at an individual who behaves in a slightly abnormal way. This reaction serves the function of forcing the individual back into the normal, that is to say, into conventional behaviour. The next and higher intensity reaction is withdrawal; the individual has made himself ' impossible ' and his companions ignore him. This, viewed from the aspect of biological significance, is a still stronger stimulus to the abnormal person to behave normally. The highest intensity reaction is one of definite hostility, resulting in making the individual an outcast, and, in primitive societies even in killing him. In my opinion, it is of great importance for human sociology to recognise the instinctive basis of such reactions and to study them comparatively in other social species. . . ."

Some alternative to this innate instinctive pattern of behaviour, whereby we first deride, then reject and finally perhaps even attack the individual whose behaviour we do not or cannot accept, even the individual who differs from us in some striking or characteristic way, is of course essential if we are to raise ourselves above the level of animals in the way in which ultimately we treat each other.

Somerset Maugham's observation of the instinctive link between disability, difference and derogation, found telling expression in his story of the man with the club foot who always knew when he was winning an argument because his opponent would begin to call him a " club-footed bastard ". Here again the point is that any recognition of difference is immediate and instinctive raw material for defamation; and whether the discrimination is based upon deformity or racial derivation, it is equally shameful.

We have seen that in animals the capacity for discrimination is apparently innate and instinctive, and the reaction automatic and all too often hostile. How much can this teach us about the roots of prejudice in human beings? Unlike most animals, we are capable of some degree of insight into our own behaviour : into our motives and rationalizations, as well as our actions. Given our marvellously elaborate brains, our capacity for introspection and abstraction, our well-stocked minds, our vast and flexible power of symbolic thought, what have we turned up on this subject? For we have certainly thought about it often, even if not ever enough.

Let me quote you one or two relevant observations by men and women whose opinions must command your attention and respect, whether you agree with them or not.

Reinhold Niebuhr :

> " Racial prejudice, the contempt for the other group, is an inevitable concomitant of racial pride; and racial pride is an inevitable concomitant of the ethnic will to live."

Sigmund Freud :

> " In the undisguised antipathy and aversion which people feel towards strangers with whom they have to do, we recognize the expression of self-love, of narcissism."

Arnold Toynbee :

> " Every living character is striving to make themselves into the centre of the Universe, and in this act is entering into rivalry with every other living character. . . ."
>
> " Self-centredness is thus a necessity of life, but this necessity is also a sin. Self-centredness is an intellectual error because no living character is in truth the centre of the Universe. It is a moral error, because no living character has a right to act as if he were the centre of the Universe."

Marie Jahoda :

> " . . . People who are driven by the need to hate reveal their first and deepest hate as—themselves. Childhood experiences make some people exceedingly insecure emotionally. If they have not been loved, praised and cherished by their parents, if they have been rejected, derided, despised, they often come to think of themselves as basically unlovable. Now what can a person who feels unlovable—' bad ', ' cruel '—do? Just as a lame person needs crutches, unloved people search for emotional crutches. Prejudice can serve as such a crutch. Despising others becomes a way of trying to bolster one's own shaky self-esteem by making others seem more inferior or contemptible. In fact, the only way some people can salvage their own self-respect is to feel ' lucky ' they are not a Negro, a Catholic, an Italian—or whoever is set up as the scapegoat for their own secret misery."

William Temple :

> " When we open our eyes as babies we see the world stretching out around us. We are in the middle of it . . . I am the centre of the world I see and where the horizon is depends on where I stand. Now just the same thing at first is true of our mental and spiritual vision so each of us takes his place in the centre of his own world. But I am not the centre of the world or the standard of reference as between good and bad; I am not and God is. In other words, from the beginning I put myself in God's place. This is my original sin. I was doing it before I could speak, and everyone else has been doing it from early infancy."

These are certainly some of the factors contributing to the ultimate strength and complexity of human racial prejudice. Writing of them in his brilliant thesis " The Nature of Prejudice ", Gordon Allport said : —

> " There is no master key. Rather what we have at our disposal is a ring of keys each of which opens one gate of understanding."

But when we examine this ring of keys we find that the master key which might be constructed from them is still missing. There is a reason for this. I believe that it is to be found in certain assumptions made about human beings which I think it is our duty to examine critically for a moment.

I was first made aware of these assumptions some time ago when, in the exercise of my social responsibilities as I then saw them, I lectured from time to time to parent teacher groups. These lectures dealt among other things with such topics as juvenile delinquency, the natural rebelliousness of adolescence, and indeed the total impact of the conflict between self-love, and love of parents and others, in childhood. Often, after such a lecture, starry-eyed and charming ladies came up to me and said, " But, doctor, isn't it sad; because all these little ones were born perfect and we must have corrupted them. . . ." And I looked at them; they looked attractive to me, many of them wore wedding rings, and I can't believe that some of them had not had children. And yet they were up to their necks in a monumental fallacy: the terrifyingly sentimental assumption that man that is born of woman is indeed born perfect; that in Pascal's phrase, " Human nature is beyond needing a redeemer ".

But who can blame them? Up to their necks in error they might be; but they were (and still are) in very good company. For this error is but the general case of those very misleading half-truths, those specific sociological assumptions which we have just pledged ourselves to examine.

Capacity to Love and Proclivity to Hate

These are that malice and resentment are not inherent in us; that no one is born prejudiced; that no child comes into the world hating or ready to hate a child of another race. Now this of course is partly true, but it isn't the whole truth. Man is born certainly without established malice or resentment; he is born moreover with a need to love and to be loved. But together with the capacity to love there is the proclivity to hate; and we need to see what are the circumstances in which this proclivity is aroused.

Alas, they are simple enough. When we are crossed, frustrated, disappointed, or thwarted in any way, then we are ready to hate; and to hurt; and never more explosively than in infancy. Professor Lewis once said that if a tiny baby was as strong, powerful and decisive as a grown-up man, he would be the most dangerous creature on the face of the earth. He wants what he wants, when he wants it, immediately, unconditionally, and he will do everything in his power to get it. And his rage is just as impressive as his delight. So perhaps we must recast that statement about the infant's blessed freedom from prejudice and shape it nearer, if not to our heart's desire, at least to the truth. It would then have to read : —

> " No one is born prejudiced against others; but everyone is born prejudiced in favour of himself. . . ."

So man is not born free of the capacity for prejudice. Aggressive self-assertiveness is present from birth onwards. It is fundamental, we cannot escape it, it is part of us just as the releasers and the patterns of recognition are part of the ants and the gulls. Race prejudice is learned. Religious bigotry is learned; but they can be learned only because they have an apt and inherent pupil in the prideful and instinctively self-willed aggressive aspect of each one of us.

Here we begin to get a clue. Psychologically and sociologically we can say that perhaps the soundest and most generally applicable theory to explain tension and hostility between different groups of human beings, is what is called the frustration-aggression theory. When we cannot achieve what we want, when we are disappointed, when our hopes outrun our attainments, when somebody else gets the job, or the girl, or the money, we would like to be able to tell ourselves that it wasn't our fault; that they had an unfair advantage; that if we had started with whatever particular gifts or luck they had, or if they hadn't been around, we would have done better. And indeed psychologically one and the same kind of mood and the same kind of frustration makes the thwarted child stamp the floor, the sacked workman kick his dog, the discouraged salesman blame his wife, the Gentile defame the Jew, the Jew despise the Gentile, the white man deride the Negro and now, in the Congo, the Negro put his gun into the back of the white man and demand his pass.

Cruelty and bestiality in the way human beings treat each other are not always confined to those who have the upper hand, for we are all in this; and we are all to blame. For the Christian there is the echo of an old lesson here; for he is bound to recognise that man is of infinite value, but that in his human condition he is not, and never will be, perfect; that he comes into the world ready to be hateful and aggressive as well as to be loving and appreciative and kind. Little children are, indeed, born free from racial prejudice, but not from aggression.

Now in the social setting in which we live there are always people whom we can make the natural targets of these aggressive feelings. They are those of whom we can say " They are not our kind ". And to some extent it is a temptation not only to make such people scapegoats but to thank God that we are not as they are. There could be no greater insult to our concept of a God of all mankind than this kind of sanctimonious, hypocritical, complacent gratitude. But not even our concept of God can escape question or indictment in the context of this examination of the human predicament. As Hemingway put it : —

> "You did not know what it was about. You never had time to learn. They threw you in and told you the rules and the first time they caught you off base they killed you."

There is something in this. As human beings we start with a much bigger handicap than many of us realise. To the extent that sociological studies suggest to us that we are wholly social creatures, essentially conditioned by environment, I think they mislead us.

We have tended in the past to lay the blame for racial prejudice upon everything except the essential nature of the human personality; and have sought its solution everywhere except in a radical change of that essential nature. The sociological error is in this respect a fundamental error, starting from the false assumption that man, reduced to his essential self, is ultimately a social unit and can therefore be wholly explained and only explained by social observations.

The Christian correction of this would be that the various keys to prejudice all hang from one ring, and that this ring is the innate, inevitable, yet tragic self-centredness of the human personality. So much of what emerges as evil in man is indeed the product of his inherent nature, in conflict with his inescapable environment, that we cannot afford to neglect a single indication of the true nature of prejudice and persecution.

Prejudice and Insanity

There is, for example, a striking resemblance between the embraced prejudice and the insane delusion; between persecution and psychotic behaviour; between the method of apartheid and the madness of paranoia.

The fact that we can now often relieve or cure psychosis even in its most severe forms makes us perhaps less afraid to examine it; makes me, at any rate, less diffident about drawing this valid parallel, which personally I should have hesitated to draw had its impact been mainly to discourage or distress sufferers from mental illness, or their relatives and friends.

Certainly prejudice and certain kinds of psychosis have this in common, that they are rigid against rational assault, yet flow round and by-pass the facts; and that they ignore arguments and refutations, however sound and convincing, as though they did not exist. Ask anybody, who is convinced that racial segregation is the right answer to a social problem, for their grounds; begin to question them intelligently and politely, and almost always they will become angry with you; because you are attacking something which is fundamentally dear to them, which is important to them, which is a part of themselves.

Ask any one of the majority of M.P.s who voted in favour of corporal punishment in the House of Commons what is the evidence in favour of it, what evidence they can quote against the very substantial evidence that it just doesn't do any good, and they too will become angry with you. I don't enjoy anger in a fellow human being, but like Somerset Maugham's man with the club foot, when I encounter it in the course of what should be a rational discussion, I know that although perhaps I am not getting anywhere in convincing my opponent, he or she may at least be beginning to sense how flimsy are the arguments on which such prejudices are based.

Prejudice cannot be defended rationally : but then of course it never is; it is defended emotionally. The patterns shift and change, vary and fluctuate, but at the centre is always self. Jews and Gentiles alike are adept at this kind of rationalisation. Indeed, we have no need to pretend that Jews cannot, in their own way, be just as critical, just as contemptuous, just as arrogant in their attitude, as Gentiles.

Shylock's famous reminder of our common humanity came late in the day when he was fighting for his possessions and his life. Previously he had pointed out that Christians were a pretty soft lot, arrogant but foolish, and undeserving of respect. The whole context of that magnificently moving speech is Shylock's pleading as an astute lawyer in his own cause, opposed by an even more astute, and in the event, even more unscrupulous advocate. But for Shakespeare's audience this was no doubt entirely acceptable, because Shylock was destined to go down, and Shakespeare, whose superbly imaginative humanity compelled him to put those wonderful words into the doomed man's mouth, was nevertheless content to have him consigned to that miserable fate which was the currently accepted one. The corresponding contemporary Jewish attitude is further exemplified by Barrabas's lines in the "Jew of Malta" quoted in the sub-titles to this lecture. It can be just as uncomfortable to be spurned by Jews if you're a Gentile as to be spurned by Gentiles if you're a Jew.

"There is no caste in blood, which runneth in one hue Nor caste in tears, which trickle salt withal . . ." *

In contemporary English society one might be pardoned for suspecting that segregation between Jews and Gentiles finds more support from orthodox Jewish custom and tradition than from Christian precept or practice. The established Jewish ban upon marrying out has certainly no Christian counterpart, and, as Professor Medawar has pointed out in his Reith lectures, the practical consequences of this resistance to miscegenation remain remarkable : —

> ". . . By marrying mainly among themselves, people who observe the Jewish religion retain a certain racial distinctness : their blood groups are characteristically those of eastern Mediterranean peoples; their fingerprints belong to a distinctive family of patterns; they are almost exempt from some hereditary diseases and almost the only victims of others. . . ."

Even so, this remarkable preservation of certain racial characteristics by what amounts to selective breeding has as its avowed object, not the myth of a pure race, whose basic fallacy we have already acknowledged; but rather the preservation of cultural and religious customs otherwise threatened or perhaps even doomed by the pressures and vicissitudes inseparable from the destiny of a migrant people. Nevertheless to the Gentile—to the racially self-conscious Aryan—as to the racially similar Arab, this self-imposed segregationistic policy is a constant reminder of Jewish separateness.

There are other reminders, too.

A little while ago I was talking to an Arab Professor who had come over to work at my hospital. In the course of our conversation—I was trying to solve the Palestine problem with him after lunch—he said, "You know, I had three friends at Medical School in the Middle East who were Jews; and the other day I wrote to them, all of them, because although I am an Arab, we always refer to the Jews as our cousins. I knew they were now doctors in Israel, and I had thought despite all the political differences that divide us, we might resume contact again. But I didn't get a single reply. So after a while I wrote again; and this time I had one of my letters sent back, unopened, followed by a card saying please don't write again. So you see it's on both sides. . . ."

But bitterness and hostility are sustained by rationalisations combining fantastic ignorance with delusional conviction. Richard Hughes' Scottish Engineer, with his confident assertions about the anatomical peculiarities of the Chinese is a vivid example—with a typical conclusion.

> "It's a scientific fact that a Chinaman has fewer nerves in his body than a white man. They can't feel pain. They're nearer to beasts than men, they are."

Have you ever been told that foxes enjoy being hunted? Or that fishes can't feel the hook? Well, neither I, nor our distinguished Chairman, both of us doctors who should know something about pain, can endorse either of these statements. We simply don't know. But personally, I have no reason to suppose that a fish cannot feel the hook, I have no reason to suppose that a fox enjoys being hunted, but I do know that the same number of nerves traverse the body of a Chinaman as of a Jew, as of an Arab, as of a Negro, as of a Caucasian, if you care for the term.

Sense of Superiority

Prejudice is bolstered by false information because of the prejudiced man's necessity to hang on to the idea that there is a difference in his favour between him and the rest of the world. Racial pride is ultimately simply a manifestation of the individual's innate sense of personal superiority : something he either believes or wishes to believe : something that rejects all that lies outside the hard core of his own self-centred will and desire. And this, tragically, is man's constant need, constantly supplied. Throughout history the Jew has had his Gentile, the Greek his Barbarian, the Crusaders their Infidels, the English had their Irish, the Irish their English, the Nazis their Non-Aryans, the white man his Negro. Prejudice is as mercilessly necessary and as morally corrosive to the prejudiced man, as alcohol is to the alcoholic. Moreover prejudice inevitably becomes to the prejudiced what alcohol becomes to the alcoholic; not a problem but a solution. In this sense prejudice is a drug of addiction; and like every other object of addiction, like cigarettes, drink or drugs, it becomes indispensable to the addicted subject; part of the very essence of existence, the thing that makes him feel worth while; take it away and he is unbearably distressed and diminished. Only by the implications of prejudice is the prejudiced man's own image of himself sustained. Only in the mirror of the aspersions which he casts on others can he see the distorted reflection of what he calls himself. Yet of course this is his tragedy no less than the tragedy of others.

* Ascribed to BUDDHA.

Writing in the Observer on Sunday, May 10th, 1960, Miss Hannah Stanton had this to say : —

> " Because I was going to South Africa I read Father Huddleston's book, Naught for your Comfort, and while much admiring both the man and the message, felt that the picture it gave of the situation in South Africa was exaggerated, and that it was necessary for people like me to go to South Africa with an open mind.
>
> " A fellow passenger on the boat got into conversation with me and took very much the ' Huddleston line ', as I would probably have described it at that time. I remember thinking, and saying to her, ' Yes, but there must be another side to it '.
>
> " I managed to preserve this kind of ' detachment '—I put the word into inverted commas because I am not so sure now that the state of mind deserves the moral and intellectual compliments which the term detachment implies—for several weeks. Soon after I got there I spoke in the street to an African whom I know, and shook him by the hand.
>
> " ' You can't do that here,' a passing white woman exclaimed. I went on talking. The white woman's tone became hysterical. 'You can't do that here,' she repeated. ' Do you hear me? You must be from overseas. You can't do that here.' But she moved on and I finished my conversation.
>
> " It was embarrassing and difficult to reconcile it with an ordinary sense of people's prejudices, however deep. It was difficult and embarrassing, also, to meet the eyes of Africans standing in fantastically long queues, waiting to get on to buses, or waiting while the whites were served in banks and shops, while I was so obviously a member of a class as privileged as they were humiliated."

Political Expediency

To justify this kind of attitude, to make racial prejudice the basis of a philosophy, or to pervert it into a foundation for a religious belief, is to commit yet one more atrocious, terrible, tragic crime against all the standards that men between them have ever managed to erect. And yet, of course, politically it is sometimes expedient. If political expediency has achieved nothing else, it will surely have made us aware that standards which transcend such expediency are necessary, if we are to survive. Political expediency finds racial prejudice a very handy weapon for producing policies which not only politicians but indeed many of their followers are only too willing to believe are helpful. For when there is trouble it is expedient that there should be a scapegoat; and once again the innate self-centredness, the hard core within each one of us is enabled to say " Well, it's not my fault and I don't see why I should suffer. It's too bad for them, but then we were here first (or) this is our country (or) we've always been to these schools; we don't want them coming here."

There are other factors which whip this up; those amoral factors in a society which haplessly affect its entire moral balance. Given a lot of people who are readily distinguishable because of their colour, or their background, or their racial or cultural characteristics, easily and openly identifiable, who have already drifted into a society which they have believed to be golden, but which in fact finds it hard to provide them with work and homes, and you are saddled not simply with their own misery; but with the hatred, cruelty and arrogant projection of hostility upon them which this insensitively competitive social situation produces. It was a salutary but terrible lesson that we in this country, who knew so much better than the people of Little Rock or the people of Cape Town how to deal with our brothers, began to learn when we found ourselves with broken windows and broken hearts in Notting Hill Gate : and I dare to predict without hesitation but not without misgiving that if we were now to hit a slump, to have to endure a lot of unemployment, if the housing situation suddenly became crucially bad, the first people to be blamed and brutally treated would be our West Indian immigrants, who came here because they believed that here they would be well treated; that here they would be able to earn a respectable living in a respectable way.

Of course they behave badly sometimes; in reaction to the treatment they receive or out of ignorance of the customs of their new society. Among their instinctive human reactions to cruelty and prejudice are included not only undue submissiveness with loss of self-respect; but, alternatively, deceitful indifference as a cloak for reciprocal arrogance and aggression.

These evils are part of the inevitable price to be paid for persecution; of which enforced segregation is but a special example. As Kyle Haselden has written : — > " . . . racial segregation is a temporal behaviour which assumes that it has cancelled the eternal fact of the oneness of man; it separates on the social, or economic, or civil level that which cannot be separated in the deeper reaches of the human soul. And the result for white man and Negro is an illness, the illness of those who are estranged from those to whom they belong. For however fine we may draw out the nerve which connects man to man, it does not break. If it did, all the agonies, the aches and sorrows of human separation would break with it; but it does not break; it holds forever, thin and taut; and along this nerve throb the anxieties, the fears, the pangs of human estrangement.

>
> " From the anxieties of this separation the white man has in the past tried to escape, not by restoring and completing the broken union, but by seeking to make the severance complete. . . ."

This is the moral philosophy of Apartheid—and it is not confined to any one society. The agonies of the victim of segregation are the agonies of suffocation, because he is cut off from the source and expression of the fullness of life, by being segregated from that to which he belongs. To the extent that he cannot wholly and finally identify himself with all his fellow human beings, he is made to feel unwanted and unloved, and that is the most destructive wrong which can be inflicted upon a human being.

But the effect upon the segregator is ultimately even worse. In the expression of vicious and passionate racial prejudice, the segregator ultimately surrenders to the beast within himself. Newspaper pictures of the jeering, spitting, stone-throwing crowds which have resisted the de-segregation of public schools in the Southern States of America are dreadful evidence of this fact, and of the atmosphere of unconscious stereotyping; the white man becomes, in regard to the Negro, an amoral character. By making something human alien to himself, he inevitably diminishes his own humanity, and the fact that he does not know this, is indeed the measure of its destructive effect upon his own soul. The first tragedy of many passively but unreflectingly prejudiced people in their relationship to the victims of their prejudice, is not that they are passionately alive towards the victim in hatred or contempt, but that they are dead towards him in understanding, identity of feeling and simple compassion. This death is within the privileged rather than in the excluded. Unwilling to let the victim be, he denies, degrades and finally destroys himself.

So, undeniably, there must be an alternative. But what is it? Before we suppose it to be simple liberalism, we must return for the last time in this lecture to an honest examination of ourselves; of the dark places in our own hearts. By all means let us rise above our primitive animal releasers; let us abandon our ant-like behaviour, our herring gull attitude; but then how far are we prepared to go? And what will this demand of us?

Intermarriage

Here I think we come to the heart of the matter; that ultimately fundamental blend of human and animal feeling, capable of the greatest degree of intensity; the sexual instinct. For this may prove the crucial touchstone to our attitude.

By all means, we may say, let's be liberal, let's have no more segregation, let's not mind whether the hand that we shake is a different colour to our own. Let's ask the Gentiles to our celebrations, the Negroes to our parties; let's have a society in which we mingle freely. And then one of our opponents, one of these bigoted people, will confront us with the old, old question : " All right, how'd you feel if your daughter was going to marry a Negro? "

Or to a Negro, "How'd you feel if your daughter was going to marry one of those white men who has just broken your windows?" Until we can say that we should approach this in exactly the same frame of mind as we should the prospective marriage of our daughter to any other human being, then we are not facing this problem.

It is my own sincere and personal belief that the future of the human race is constantly to intermingle; and in this at least I am consistent. Some of the finest people I have ever known were the product of mixed racial ancestry; a Scottish father and a Malayan mother produced one of the most distinguished, brave, charming and lovable airmen I ever met in the whole of World War II; and I met some fine ones; this man is one of my lifelong friends, and his children have the beauty of this kind of hybridization. I do not proclaim, because I do not know, that hybridization is indispensable to the greatest vitality of the human species, but I can say without hesitation that biologically it does no harm. If we shrink from it, our misgivings are based not upon facts, but upon feelings.

We have seen something of the psychological origin of these feelings and so we need not be surprised at any inconsistencies in their expression. In the Southern States of America, for example, it has long been a traditional convention of white male virility to have had sexual intercourse with a coloured girl some time or another before marriage; of course without public acknowledgement, still less with any investment of personal responsibility. But just let this sexual miscegenation occur the other way round, and the outrage, the horror, leads immediately to appalling violence. Yet basically, both are biologically identical procedures.

Intermarriage between all human races is biologically, and I dare to suggest, spiritually, not only defensible but right. Hybridization at a biological level enriches natural diversity and tends to produce a more versatile genetic structure. It cannot of itself be a bad thing.

But the life which is led at the moment by the Anglo-Indians, by the high-yellows, by the Cape-coloureds, is a standing reproach not to them, but to those who despise, reject, persecute and oppress them; in the name of their own delusional superiority, to which they cling with the fierce, devoted, savage intensity of the prejudiced persecuters. Yet there is no evil, in my view, greater than the organized, persistent and strongly-maintained prejudice, that one human being can have against another. And miscegenation would be a very small price to pay for the end of that, if indeed it is regarded as a price at all.

And so, finally, let us attempt to grapple with the implications of this problem as it explosively emerges. If biologically miscegenation is an acceptable and possible solution, why is it the one thing that everybody strives against?

I think one of the reasons is that we cannot bear to admit that others, different from ourselves as we see them to be, are as good as we are. We set too high a value on ourselves, too low a value on human beings as a whole: and this is the universal problem. Study the psychological development of the infant. The most important, the most fundamental need that the infant has after being born is to be able to differentiate himself from the rest of the world; between that aspect of his experience which is constantly part of him and, although ever-changing, goes with him wherever he goes, and that part which he comes to recognise as ineffably separate and distinct from him. His most fundamental lesson is in fact to recognise his own separateness, his identity, which in fact he will later learn to call "me"; my body, my feelings, my thoughts, as something distinct from the whole of the rest of the world; which, infinitely varied, wonderful, packed with no matter what challenges, delights or possibilities, is not "me". This "me/not me" differentiation is made instinctively, inevitably, and indeed of necessity, and where it isn't made, it may well be that normal development is impossible. Until we know that we exist in our own right we can't make our way in the world at all. Yet the mystics have always said, and the Eastern philosophers are always saying, that this really is the fundamental, the basic error of us all: that in truth man is one with the Universe and that until he recognises and achieves that sense of oneness and wholeness and reabsorption, he is never fully aware of what he is or what life is.

So we are kept stumbling along an expedient but ultimately tragic path: and part of our original sin is our original error, which yet paradoxically seems an absolute, inescapable necessity of our original existence.

Do you remember Housman's poem: —

Stars, I have seen them fall,
  But when they drop and die
No star is lost at all
  From all the star-sown sky.
The toil of all that be Helps not the primal fault;
It rains into the sea,
  And still the sea is salt.

The primal fault; our loneliness, our individual uncertainty, our need for love and our proclivity for hatred; with this we come into the world and with this we are ready and raw material for suspicion, fear, hatred, prejudice, and all uncharitableness. Racial differences, real but biologically by no means dangerous differences, provide yet one more occasion for stubborn stumbling, for pride, for suffering and inflicting pain. For every time we yield to prejudice, every time we insist upon our supreme distinction from other man, then, whether we know or acknowledge it or not, our guilty hand is reaching for a stone. Can it be that although in the Bible God reminded us that he made us all from one mould, he has perhaps left it to us to discover just how difficult it is to live up to this, as to so many other truths? And at this point do we not echo the desperate challenging question uttered by Captain Ahab, just before he came to his death in the last exercise of his prejudice and his persecution of the white whale : —

" What is it, what nameless, inscrutable, unearthly thing is it; what cozening, hidden lord and master, and cruel, remorseless emperor commands me; that against all natural lovings and longings, I so keep pushing, and crowding, and jamming myself on all the time; recklessly making me ready to do what in my own proper, natural heart, I durst not so much as dare? Is Ahab, Ahab? Is it I, God, or who, that lifts this arm? But if the great sun move not of himself; but is as an errand-boy in heaven; nor one single star can revolve, but by some invisible power; how then can this one small heart beat; this one small brain think thoughts; unless God does that beating, does that thinking, does that living, and not I. By heaven, man, we are turned round and round in this world, like yonder windlass, and Fate is the handspike. And all the time, lo! that smiling sky, and this unsounded sea! Look! see yon Albicore! who put it into him to chase and fang that flying-fish? Where do murderers go, man? Who's to doom, when the judge himself is dragged to the bar? "

Now I speak as a very poor kind of a Christian, the doubting, believing, ineffectual kind of Christian, such as most Christians are. I believe that God's own suffering, and God's own purpose, are inscrutable in this respect. I only know that when God Himself came as Christ into human society, He didn't last very long. For the standards which He proclaimed, and the suffering He was prepared to endure, caught up with Him after only 33 years; and then, without condemning us, He let Himself be killed by us.

Is this then the message? That the only answer to cruelty, the only answer to prejudice, is in the open unprejudiced love in the heart of each one of us; a love which must be openly acknowledged, fearlessly followed through? It may seem strange that after an examination of the psychological foundations of something so universal, so indiscriminate, so recklessly justified, so stubbornly upheld, so irresponsibly loaded with misleading information, we should come back to the simple truth that only within the heart of each one of us lies the final solution. We must learn to love others as ourselves : unless we can do this, we not only doom others but are doomed ourselves. But if we can do this there is no problem of racial or any other kind of prejudice, which need overwhelm our judgment.

Renunciation of Self-centredness

If we can but renounce our innate determination to regard ourselves as unique and of supreme importance, with everything else ultimately going to the wall, then we can tackle this. But unless we are capable of this renunciation of self-centredness, then we cannot tackle it at all. Love and humility are the only answer to this problem and they must be calmly and vigorously maintained in the face of prejudice, in the face of indignation; of segregation, of all arguments, all the answers about what is good and what is sound, and what is practical for society and so forth; because these answers and arguments are based ultimately on fear, hatred, insecurity and the threat of being regarded as just like other men. Humility then and acceptance, are part of love: and love alone can pay the price for the abandonment of prejudice—and its natural outcome.

The Jews must allow, not their customs to disappear, but their race to intermingle; so must the Gentiles. Negroes, Chinese, Arabs, Eskimos, Caucasians must be free to marry and be given in marriage. The diversity of human races which are simply a reflection of genetic flexibility, and of cultural and geographical diversity, must nevertheless not be segregated and kept apart but must be encouraged and enabled to unite. I believe this, and I put this forward as my personal answer, as a suggestion to this enormous problem. And I end as I began : the roots of prejudice are not in the actual fact of difference; or in the supposed superiority or inferiority of one race to another; persecution arises not primarily out of bitter situations, not out of frictions of human proximity or distrust, which varies by distance, but simply out of the will of living man to think more highly of himself and less highly of others than he ought to think. The essential feature is the inescapable self-centredness, separateness, and tragic personal pride of each individual one of us; whereby we do not love others as ourselves. If we can begin on that, we can begin at last to face and then, perhaps, one day finally to solve the problem.

POSTSCRIPT

A lecture such as this can do no more than reflect the developments of its Author's opinions. Both their origins in his own experience, and those ideas contributing to their formation which he has derived from others, must almost certainly exceed his full awareness and capacity for acknowledgement. But in this instance I would like to record a special indebtedness to certain authors, whose books have conveyed to me a range of information, a breadth of vision, and a profundity of wisdom, without which I could not have dared to attempt this lecture. They include : —

THE NATURE OF PREJUDICE. Gordon W. Allport. The Beacon Press, Boston, 1954.

READINGS ON RACE. (Ed.) Stanley M. Garn, PH.D. Blackwells Scientific Publications, Oxford, 1960.

THE RACIAL PROBLEM IN CHRISTIAN PERSPECTIVE. Kyle Haselden. Lutterworth Press, London, 1960.

THE FUTURE OF MAN. P. B. Medawar, F.R.S. Methuen and Co. Ltd., London, 1960.

THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT AND THE CHILDREN OF DARKNESS. Reinhold Niebuhr. Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York, 1944.

THE HERRING GULL'S WORLD. Niko Tinbergen. Collins, London, 1953.

(By kind permission of the Council of Christians and Jews. This article is obtainable from them in booklet form.)

Narod Press Ltd., 129/131 Cavell Street, London, E.1.

TACTICS AND POLITICAL APPROACH ARE AMONG THE PROBLEMS

Negro movement debates its course

By Joanne Grant

Third and last article of a series

THE ABSENCE of massive civil rights demonstrations at present represents a lull—but not a tranquil one—in the Negro drive for equality. It is a hiatus during which groups are attempting to consolidate their organizational structure, to find ways to deal with problems which have grown out of successes and failures, and to develop techniques for further progress.

The lull is not tranquil because of internal and external problems the movement faces. Stresses within the movement have mounted as people of varying backgrounds, occupations, economic circumstances and outlook have increasingly been caught up in the rights campaign.

This is illustrated in struggles across the country. Jose Rames, describing a housing campaign in Detroit, wrote in New University Thought (Dec., '63-Jan., '64): "Integrated housing was not approved among the goals and aspirations of the average Negro family. Suitable housing, yes, but not integrated housing per se." The differences between the desires of ordinary people and the goals of the middle-class members of older organizations such as the NAACP and the middle-class aspirations of those generally regarded as the top leadership of the civil rights movement have become apparent to many local leaders.

In the South it has been reflected in the inability of leaders to deliver on the oft-promised mass application for transfers to all-white schools where states have been ordered to desegregate. In community after community it has become apparent that Negro parents want better schools and prefer to have Negro schools improved rather than expose their children to inevitable psychological and possible physical violence by enrolling them in "white" schools.

PLANNING PHASE: These are among the problems the movement faces in this "lull," which James Baldwin has described as "like a football huddle." "People are reassessing, they are planning," he reassured those who thought the movement might have died.

One problem affecting all of the civil rights groups is that a turn toward more political action is called for. In an article in the Nation last June Los Angeles attorney Loren Miller wrote that a "broad political movement . . . comprehensive of pressing domestic and international issues" was needed. While such a development most certainly is not in the cards at present, there has already been political action and there are promises of more.

Marvin Rich, community relations director of the Congress of Racial Equality, said CORE planned to test enforcement of provisions of the civil rights bill if and when it is passed by sending test teams into the South, as was done after the Interstate Commerce Commission issued its order against discrimination in interstate travel and terminals. Rich said CORE planned no "cooling-off" during the '64 election year. As part of its political program CORE has expanded the concept of congressional lobbying by sending a field secretary, Jerome Smith, to Capitol Hill where, in his blue denim overalls, he buttonholes congressmen to "remind them that abstract principles affect people."

The NAACP plans to mobilize its half million members to campaign actively to defeat anti-civil rights congressmen. It has also announced a drive to register 500,000 voters in Texas. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is concentrating on political campaigns in Mississippi, with plans to run one congressional candidate or more, heading up to a major campaign against Sen. James Eastland in 1966.

The Southern Conference Educational Fund, which has been working primarily with Southern whites for 25 years, has sent field representatives into the Midwest to urge church groups to press for enactment of the civil rights bill.

NO MORATORIUM: There is much talk within the movement about the Presidential election. Many view the coming year hopefully, since it will be crucial for President Johnson to woo the Negro vote. The intention seems to be to keep pressure on the White House despite the obvious desire of politicians of both major parties for an election-year moratorium. Bayard Rustin has called for marches on both party conventions.

Among the prominent Negroes Baldwin has been most emphatic about the need for alternatives for the Negro in politics. Baldwin repeatedly declares that "there is a point where one must say, 'I will not choose the lesser of two evils.' " He often speaks of the need for a third party, a "fusion" party. One group which has organized is the National Committee for a Freedom Now Party headed by attorney Conrad Lynn which intends to run all-Negro slates in some areas.

There has been no other serious attempt at organizing a political apparatus among Negroes apart from the efforts of the two major parties, which have been stepped up in the last few years. The Democratic Party has sought out several Negroes, among them Washington newspaper reporter Alice Dunnigan and Little Rock, Ark., leader Daisy Bates, who is with the Democratic National Committee. At last summer's NAACP convention the staffs of the Democratic National Committee and COPE (AFL-CIO political arm) were conspicuous and hospitality flowed at their two suites, with Negro staff members as hosts.

Palmer in the Springfield (Mo.) Leader & Press
"Perhaps if we ignore it . . ."

Yet, with an evident turn toward greater political action and with the obvious concern of the major parties for the Negro vote, the movement seems to put primary emphasis on development of a grass-roots organizing drive. The long-term aim of this drive is eventual political impact resulting from what John Lewis, chairman of SNCC, calls "pockets of power." CORE's Southern "task force," patterned after SNCC's subsistence level paid field staffs, and SNCC are concentrating on the hard-core rural areas of the South to organize the poor and the dispossessed into pressure groups outside the power structure. Their "power" will result from the fact that they are there, rather than from their ability to participate in the system by the ballot.

ROLE OF WHITES: The movement is also beginning to turn its attention to mobilization of whites. The civil rights struggle has attracted large numbers of Northern white students, who swamp Southern organizations with applications for work in the South. Consideration is being given to developing cores of white students to work among Southern whites and white unemployed as a parallel to the organizing drive among Negroes. This reflects increasing awareness of the link between the drive for equality and basic economic issues and the need for white allies to meet the economic needs of the Negro and the nation.

While the organizations are generally agreed on the need for political action, there are differences among them on what the approach should be. With a declared determination to press for early passage of a strong civil rights bill, for instance, the March on Washington was only obliquely directed at the legislation, except for a few brief minutes when the audience spontaneously chanted "Pass the bill" at visiting congressmen. While the March office has been kept open, with March deputy director Rustin in charge, differences among civil rights leaders have kept it from action in support of the legislation.

The debate on tactics continues, with the more radical spokesmen urging greater use of civil disobedience—immobilizing a city by lying in the streets and on runways; swamping the mayor's office and the governor's office with telephone calls; organizing city-wide placing of COD orders with a major department store.

There are differences in approach to nonviolent direct action itself. CORE's Rich says direct action "creates a moment of tension when people must make a choice." SNCC's Robert Moses speaks of it as an "annealing process" in which a community is brought to a white hot heat, then molded while cooling. The NAACP leadership has finally succumbed to pressures from its membership and has approved direct action as policy after a history of reliance on court action.

SAFETY VALVE? Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., the movement's symbol of nonviolence, described it in his famous "Letter from Birmingham City Jail" thus: "The Negro has many pent-up resentments and latent frustrations. He has to get them out. So let him march sometime; let him have his prayer pilgrimages to the city hall; understand why he must have sit-ins and freedom rides. If his repressed emotions do not come out in these nonviolent ways, they will come out in ominous expressions of violence. This is not a threat; it is a fact of history. So I have not said to my people, 'Get rid of your discontent.' But I have tried to say that this normal and healthy discontent can be channeled through the creative outlet of nonviolent direct action. Now this approach is being dismissed as extremist . . . maybe the South, the nation, and the world are in dire need of creative extremists."

JAMES BALDWIN
He'd tackle basic issues

Whether nonviolence is a philosophy or a tactic, whether it is a means of creative control of discontent or a method of deliberately creating tension which must be relieved, the fact remains, most leaders admit, that only a small group is committed to it. Young field workers from the NAACP, CORE and SNCC who are dedicated to nonviolent action have said in effect after a few months' experience: "I can no longer ask people not to defend themselves. I cannot take their guns. I cannot say, 'Don't fight back.' " Some have come to advocate organized defense similar to that of Robert Williams in Monroe, N.C. Some even talk of terrorism. They remember that federal troops were sent into the Birmingham area only after Negroes rioted. If white resistance continues to harden, many wonder how long the pent-up resentment and frustration will be contained.

Along with consideration of tactics are the problems of finding solutions to the basic issues of housing, education, health, jobs. As yet the movement has developed no long-range perspectives, no answers. As it searches and is driven to a more radical outlook, other problems will undoubtedly pile up. There will be increasing attempts to split the leadership, perhaps a loss of financial support from some quarters, direct red-baiting attacks on those who refuse to alter their course or purge their organizations. Whether the movement can withstand attempts to divert it or destroy it is difficult to predict.

ATLANTA AREA OFFICE
THE AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE
ROOM 703. 41 EXCHANGE PLACE. S.E., ATLANTA 3, GEORGIA

FOR YOUR INFORMATION

To: Les Dunbar
This is the unedited speech Gene Patterson delivered at the AJC Annual meeting in New York last May.
It has been proposed that AJC publish it, or, in the alternative, that New South might use excerpts from it.
Please let me have your reaction - and that of your staff - to its potential usefulness.

Charles F. Wittenstein Area Director

JAckson 3-8451
ROOM 703,
41 EXCHANGE PLACE, S. E.,
ATLANTA 3, GEORGIA

R & R Rel.

MR. EUGENE C. PATTERSON: Thank you very much.

Ladies and Gentlemen: I am glad to see the large turnout of ladies. It reminds me of James Webb's comment. The Administrator of the Space Agency was addressing a large press conference in the State Department auditorium in Washington recently and he was being cross questioned as to why he was picking certain people to be astronauts and certain other people could not make it. Why no women, for instance, why no Negro yet, and so forth. And Mr. Webb finally, a little confused, heatedly denied in his own words that "I have any prejudice whatsoever against women or any other minority group!" [Laughter]

Ladies and gentlemen, it is good to be here among friends. It looks as if I brought much of my hometown with me! [Laughter] We have, of course, I have seen at this meeting, Armand May from Atlanta, DeJongh Franklin, Cecil Alexander, Louis Regenstein, Morris Abram, of course, Charles Wittenstein and Joe Ross, who is now in Detroit and it is our loss. I have seen the work they have done in the AJC in Atlanta. It has been great work. But I have also seen the work they have done as individuals in that town. Joe Ross, at a time during the sit-in crisis in our town leading to desegregate luncheon counters, it was done under his leadership in one of the great department stores there. So DeJongh Franklin, who led an election last year against a candidate for Lieutenant Governor, who, while not defeated by DeJongh, was so severely chastened by him that we have not heard much from his since. I have seen, of course, Cecil Alexander get urban renewal off the ground and I have seen him in just recent weeks in one of those quiet actions that constantly occurs in our society and very few people know about them, resign from the Board of a private school because the Board did not share his views that children should be admitted without regard to race or color.

You see these quiet things done by quiet people throughout the length and breadth of the land and perhaps that is what your organization is all about. The individual man is the person who makes the progress. And so I am glad to be among such people and, of course, I do not need to tell you about Morris Abram.

I have come here direct from Cape Canaveral. The magnificent flight of the astronaut Gordon Cooper was the story there to cover. But something else happened there to form the thought that I want to bring you briefly today. The time was the 25th hour of Major Cooper's flight. The deadly peril of descent from orbit was still ahead of the man and a lot of us newspaper men, tense and sleepless--and we were from all over the world, 50 foreign countries were represented there among 800 newspaper men covering it. We were in the space flight press center following the destiny of a man and a nation's space effort overhead.

In one corner of that bright and littered room down at Cape Canaveral there was a television set tuned to a commercial program, and another was the Mercury control amplifier bringing in the voice of Gordon Cooper from space. Two southerners spoke in that room last Thursday, one Alabaman, one Oklahoman, both drawled. The Oklahoman came up the hard way. He enlisted after graduating from high school. He went to college at the University of Hawaii and to the University of Maryland night school classes in Germany while flying mighty jets by day. He was a dozen years out of high school before he struggled through to a B.S. Degree from the Air Force Institute of Technology. The Alabaman is Governor of his state. The television set in the corner of that press room at Cape Canaveral presented first the face and the words of Governor George Wallace, "I am sick and tired," he said, "of this pro-communist line, our people wondering what people somewhere else are going to think of us." He was responding to expressions of shock following the race riots in his state.

"Some of them do not even know where they are in the world, much less where Alabama is," he said. "They take our foreign aid and then they feel free to criticize our Alabama for its way of life. The South pays 25 per cent of that foreign aid," he said, "so I think it is time we quit wondering what they think of us and let them know it is going to be a matter of what we think of them," drawled the Governor of Alabama.

Then the Oklahoman's voice came softly from the Mercury control amplifier in that room. Gordon Cooper was hurdling more than 100 miles above Addis Adaba in Ethiopia. A meeting of African leaders was in session. The small town Southerner from Shawnee, Oklahoma, spoke a message to them through a transmitter in his helmet, "Hello, Africa," he drawled, "this is Astronaut Gordon Cooper. I am speaking to you from the American space craft Faith VII. I want to wish success to your leaders there. Good luck to Africa." Choose your southern voice--two spoke Thursday.

What I submit to you is simply that the South has two voices. And the voice of Gordon Cooper and not the voice of George Wallace speak for it. The voices of men who reason, who speak, who dare all not for self but for the common good of all men are speaking above the voices of the uncomprehending already in many parts of the South. Two voices, yes.

I remember the morning in Atlanta when the temple was bombed. I stood in that place and I looked at the little blue choir rooms of children lying rumpled under dust and broken glass and I wondered what property of soul and spirit had to speak with dynamite. But I remember, too, the other voice, the other voice of genuine sorrow and shock and outrage in my City that rose up from those people. That brick and mortar bound us all into closer community than Atlanta had known before. I remember the burning of the Negro churches in southwest Georgia last year where Negroes had gathered in line to vote. I remember, too, the pencil scrawls on tablet paper that came to my desk later with dollar bills and dimes attached to them from humble white Georgians whose voices speak against such desecration and whose contributions to rebuild those churches exceeded $10,000 in the Atlanta Constitution's fund alone.

I remember the voice of the mob on the night that rioting took my Alma Mater, the University of Georgia, when unclean politicians in the squalid element of the Ku Klux Klan encouraged students to violence against the Court's order for desegregation, the first in my State. But I remember the other voice. I remember the voice of a valiant Governor, Ernest Vandiver who disregarded the counsel of cowardice that 98 out of 100 advisers gave him when they went to the Executive Mansion that night and who instead ordered the state troopers to Athens to restore the peace and keep it.

One of the two men who stood with Vandiver in that hour and advised him simply to do what was right and who supported him in repelling Georgia's school segregation laws and in meeting school desegregation with dignity, Carlos Sanders is his name. That man's voice now speaks from the Governor's office of my State, for the people know he, like Vandiver, spoke for the right South and the racist bellows of the demagogue he defeated, a man who, incidentally, received the campaign assistance of Alabama's Governor Wallace. That man is now finished and forgotten in Georgia, as Mr. Wallace will be, I think, in his own state.

The South has two voices. The right one is going to prevail. My South is a great South. My people have known what it is to be poor, to be ill schooled and poorly led, and with all this, to be challenged by circumstances beyond their experience in racial changes. But my people have a great compassion and sense of justice, too, and a granite strength, the strength to take the hemlock of Civil War but the greatest strength for curative change of heart that the requirement of human dignity is now demanding of them.

The South has two voices, yes, but the voice you will hear when the doomed voice of deceit has died in my South, will be the voice of a man, for instance, who grew up a couple of swamps and a couple of cotton patches removed from me in South Georgia, there in the wild grass of the piney woods. He is the son of an immigrant who reared his family in the small town of Fitzgerald. The son rose to be a Rhodes Scholar, then came home to practice law in Atlanta. But what he truly practiced was benign revolution. Through the courts this brilliant young son of my State fought the suit that struck down the incredible county unit system which for half a century had poisoned the wells of Georgia, had made all of the ill schooled poverty in my state, had latched it upon us, this system which put our substance as well as the values of our State in the hands of an unrepresentative rural minority whose irresponsibility grew with its venality, and these were not the steady farmers, sons of the soil that you speak of when you speak of the rural folk. These were the small court house reins and their hand maidens, the cynical advantage seekers of the big city who found control of the state was easy by favor of the few rural bosses. When the young Georgian, speaking with the true voice of my South had finished his day in court, that era when one tenant farmer and one small county had a vote equal to 100 college professors in Atlanta, and that was the ratio. Once his voice had spoken in court, that system was dead forever. Suddenly everybody in Georgia has an equal vote.

This young man struck away the change of half a century's political imprisonment which, until he came, my people could only rattle in helpless protest. The political salvation of Georgia was so immediate and dramatic that it can only be termed revolutionary.

I have said the voice of a clean young governor who believes in justice now speaks for the Executive Office. It sharply defeated the voice of the past in a decisive vote of the people who were suddenly enfranchised. A reapportionment in my State now includes a Negro Senator. A year earlier this man would have been thrown out of the chamber if he had tried to sit in the spectator gallery. And no racist speech, not one, rang from the floor of the Georgia Legislature at this year's session.

These are the immediate revolutionary events that followed the great victory won by one man. I think you know by now the name of the young man who wrought the change through his masterful application of the weapon of law, this neighboring friend of mine from South Georgia, and when I speak of the voice that is prevailing in the South, I speak of

Morris Abram. [Applause]

It was against this background that I listened to Morris speak to you last night. And what he said struck me, as it did Adlai Stevenson, as crucially important, for having changed the past, he is looking ahead of the present. He foresaw what I am seeing now in the South when he said last year, "As urban majorities make their influence felt on government in the South, the court will find more and more popular support for decisions long resisted in the arguments of racism." Political reapportionment and realignment are easing, as he predicted, the path of racial decisions at the political level. But Mr. Abram's new message of last night must be heard. As political power comes to the cities, the problems of power come with the changes. As deprived populations move from the farms where he and I grew up, from those gray shacks, they are moving to the Birminghams, to the Atlantas, and the New Yorks of America and a new minority takes form unequipped to comprehend or cope, needful of understanding and help, not condemnation and vengeance.

There is a political power to apply against injustice, yes. Morris applied it. But he himself has said raw political power cannot eliminate prejudice, particularly the most subtle and cutting kind. Along with political power there is the power of law and it, too, is mighty and must be clung to. But it is not wholly the answer, either. For just as Socrates believed an individual had the right to break the law if he considered it unjust and if he was prepared to pay the consequences, so the Negroes of Birmingham believed and so believed also the white students of Oxford, Mississippi.

The law is a mighty bulwark. So are our political systems. If they are not enough, the law can be violated. Politics can be pervaded.

Again in Morris Abram's words, it is the mind and heart of man which must be influenced and reformed. This requires education, inspiration, conciliation, mediation, patience, persistence. It requires the perseverance of wise human relations organizations such as yours and it requires, I submit, also a basic ongoing belief in the ultimate right-heartedness of man through all his periods of--"love" is perhaps the word for it.

The day we give up on that, we can turn in our suits as human beings and go back to the jungle where it did not matter. Only a growing concert of voices raised for justice can prevail over the course of chaos we have known in my South. And as I have said, I hear this growing concern in the South, the daily travail of decision is still our lot and long will be. But I know what the voice of the South and of mankind will be. I see it day in and day out in the labored pencilling on tablet paper from rural Georgia. I sense it in the cautious acceptance of moral responsibility by my region's men of capital. I hear it in the blunt straight talk of the direct southerner revising his beliefs and in the quiet newly bold expression of the thinking Negro and in the drawled radio message from the sky above Addis Adaba and, above all, under the thunderous glory of mankind reach into that new element that I saw last Wednesday on a Florida beach.

What a symbol of the majesty of man that was. I do not know how to describe the moment of launch. All I know is that you are never the same again when you have seen it. It is a wrenching thing. A man has been there on the capsule in the beach in front of you for an intolerably long time and you look at him and there stands the silver missile and you wait for hours and suddenly the count comes down to the last ten seconds, and you realize he is going to be fired. And it comes to three, two, one, ignition, and a great spilling of flame comes from the bottom, all in dead silence because you are 8,000 feet away. And then to the left a great explosion, smoke and blaze and suddenly the fire is reaching up the side of the missile towards the nose where the man lies and you stand with your heart thumping as suddenly you see this great rocket start to rise from its own bed of fire. On its own clean white blaze it climbs very slowly and it takes you by the throat because it is so important that it go. It is as if man, who is new in this element, is lifting himself on his wings like a baby bird and turning himself loose to see if he will fly, and you wait to see the escape tower reach that capsule loose and fire him away in some unseen emergency and all the time you are praying "Spare the man, preserve him." And it lifts and suddenly the sound comes in, rolling in like a great rumbling tide. It is a ripping, thunderous sound, a crackling burst of sound and it is there beating on your eardrums, and right in front of you he is going into this bright sky. Every one is tense. Beside me a woman suddenly broke into tears and sat down, and I remember the tears coming out from under her sunglasses, and it will do that to you because it is so important. A man is in there. Any man, and up there while this sound is cascading down and seems to flood the earth, you suddenly hear the transmission, "Fuel is go, oxygen is go, cabin pressure is 6.0." The man is doing his job in a tornadoed moment when at any second he could vanish in a burst of fire. Then after that enormous mission he flew, to come in on his 19th orbit and find his automatic systems shot. If he would have been a chimpanzee, he would still be up there today. His oxygen would not last up until now and there would have been no way he could get down. Everything man on earth could do was thwarted by the mechanical failure of that automatic system. The man had to bring himself down. Not only that, he had to do it precisely or he would have been lost in one of the oceans of the world or one of the jungles. And he did it, as you know. He had an old friend out there coaching him along like a quiet football coach running their drills and the incredible thing is that this man performed with a perfection that exceeded that of the automatic system that Walter Schirra shot. He landed closer to the carrier than Schirra did in what they call a textbook triumph of human engineering, and this man had to do it after everything went haywire, after 34 hours aloft, and they did give him a dexadrine pill. He is the first astronaut who has taken it. He was drugged, and 80 minutes before he did it he took the pill and he was pretty shaky, as you know, when he came in and the sequence of things he had to do were enormous. He had to raise the nose of the capsule with his hand control 34 degrees above the horizon, hold it there while manually punching off three different retro-rockets which jolted interminably and all he had to hold was a cross hatch on his window on the vague horizon that he saw to keep it from rolling off or to keep it from going too high or low. This was what happened to Carpenter and he pitched 250 miles over his rescue ship. Cooper kept it dead on with the vertical line on a star so that he would not yaw off.

With these crude implements compared to the automatic system, he held it in position, he fired his retro-rockets, he brought it back to level or zero rate, he induced a 2-degree per second slow roll and held it there going through like a slow rolling pilot coming down through the atmosphere and he plunged into the sea right beside the carrier.

Stephen Vincent Benet once wrote a poem that Cecil Alexander told me about once, a great poem to Icarus whose waxed wings did not quite do the job, and Benet seemed to think some day man would, and how apt they are today. Icarus failed, but Cooper did not, and Benet knew he would not, for he foresaw that in those far forgotten regions where the cold comes down like death, gleams the red glint of his pennants, steams the vapor of his breath. Yes, the South has two voices but, as the old automatic systems which have all the weaknesses of artificial things, falter and fail, man takes over and his true voice will come with a glowing tongue and clarity from my region, for I know myself what Pasternak knew of all men, that we are one family called man, man not in the least proud, man the carpenter, man the plumber, man the shepherd with his sheep at sunset, man celebrated in all the cradle songs of mothers and all the picture galleries the world over.

The only thing we have to do is believe that.

Thank you.

[The audience arose and applauded.]

---

~~Return to Mrs Tilly~~

R & R Rel.

STATEMENT ON CURRENT RACE RELATIONS IN NEW ORLEANS

The widespread racial tensions which are apparent throughout the United States are the occasion for soul searching on the part of many individuals who, a few years ago, considered spasmodic racial conflicts only as one more passing event. As the events have spread and explosive situations have erupted, concerned individuals and organizations in New Orleans interested in race relations have begun to take a new look at the underlying causes of the events which have become front page news in practically every metropolitan paper in the United States and abroad.

The tendency on the part of many American, Negro and white, has been to treat the symptoms of racial unrest and hope for the best. On the other hand, there is a growing number of organizations and individuals who feel that only solution to the problems is a sure elimination of the basic causes which produce problems of racial unrest.

Fortunately, New Orleans has not experienced the tragic incidents that have occurred in Jackson and Greenville, Mississippi, Birmingham or even Cambridge, Maryland. The fact that such incidents have not occurred in this Metropolis does not mean that many of the causes that triggered eruptions in other cities are not present here. To a great extent, there are problems in New Orleans which are similar to those in cities where major demonstrations have occurred.

There are, however, some organized and un-organizaed communications between Negroes and whites of influence which have provided an inter-change of ideas on problem areas. Included in the areas of communication are the Negroes who serve on the policy making boards of health and welfare agencies, as well as interracial boards of the Urban League, Catholic Interracial Council and the Community Relations Council.

The comparative progress which has been made in the intergroup relations in New Orleans whould not be looked upon as a solution to the social and economic problems which are basic in racial tensions.

In spite of encouraging progress which has been made in several areas of race relations, there are numerous discriminatory situations which, not only adversely affect Negroes, but the social and economic life of the community. Included in these situations are the widespread discrimination against qualified Negroes to secure employment in public institutions and business establishments. Housing has continued over the years to be a major problem.

I would like to enumerate some areas where segregation is in effect in New Orleans which create daily unrest and potential areas where tensions may develop --

Voting is one of the primary areas. Daily, Negroes are subjected to restriction in their efforts to qualify for the privilege of registering.

Theaters, restaurants, swimming pools observe rigid segregation practices which deny Negroes opportunity afforded non-Negro patrons. The discriminatory policies in hospitals not only adversely affect Negroes but the general health of the Community. Practically all hospitals, with the exception of Flint-Goodridge, either exclude Negro patients or limit their admission. Negro physicians are denied courtesy privileges in all hospitals, with the exception of Flint-Goodridge. Negro physicians are not permitted membership in the New Orleans Medical Association or any other professional organization, except those which serve only non-white professionals.

Negroes are neither employed as professional, technical or clerical workers by the City Administration nor are they included on any policy-making organization or committee under municipal auspices.

Protestant churches and private parochial schools do not accept Negroes in their memberhips or classes.

The New Orleans Dire Department has never given favorable consideration to a Negro applicant.

Any organization or individual concerned with some of the causative factors which produce frustrations, irritations and tensions will readily observe that the inequities and discriminatory practices and policies should be seriously considred and dealt with in an affirmative manner.

Unlike many Southern cities, New Orleans has made some advances in intergroup relations which are significant. Some of these advances have been made because of the untiring efforts of enlightened citizens and public officials and some have been amde because of favorable Federal courts decisions.

New Orleans, with 47 (approximately) Negro policemen, has made greater progress in this area than any Southern city.

There were 107 Negro children in public desegregated schools - the largest number in any Southern city.

The New Orleans Library Board, by voluntary action, desegregated all public libraries before it became an issue. City Park, street cars and busses City Park Golf Links, the International Airport, railroad and bus station facilities are among court-ordered desegregated facilities which actions took place without unfavorable community reaction.

Catholic schools in all grades were desegregated in 1962. Loyola, Tulane and LSU-NO are among the institutions of higher learning where racially mixed student bodies are generally accepted as a matter of course.

Recently, a number of Canal Street Stores employed an aggregate of 59 Negroes as salespersons, clerks and in other positions above the menial level. Other area stores, including Dryades Street and Claiborne Shopping Center instituted fair employment practices in 1960-61.

As encouraging as the above instances are, they represent, on the whole, token progress in the several areas and should not be considered as the answer to the many unmet problems in the areas of housing, employment public accomodations and inter-cultural relations.

One of the greatest needs in intergroup relations in New Orleans is a broader communication between the responsible representatives of the Negro and white community.

More detailed study is needed in many areas to ascertain causative factors which may trigger behavior problems. In this regard, I would like to mention the explosive problems resulting from school droupouts. As alarming as the dropout problem appears to be in the Nation as a whole, the problem in Louisiana is far more serious. A recent study by on functional illiteracy based on the 1960 Census, showed that the rate for adults of all races ranges from a low of 2.8 percent in Utah to a high of 21.3 in Louisiana. The National percentage was 8.3. In the State of Louisiana, 348,000 adults have completed less than five years of schooling representing 21.3 percent of the 25 plus age group. This includes 159,000 whites (13.5 percent) and 189,000 non-whites (40.9 percent). The problem of school-dropouts in New Orleans is or should be of immediate concern to this and other committees.

According to a recent study of the New Orleans school dopouts made by Mrs. Mildred Seaman, Negroes represented 63 percent of all dropouts. According to this tudy, 290 Negroes dropped out of school between the first and sixth grades, compared to 75 whites -- 597 Negroes dropped out between the seventh and ninth grades compared to 347 whites. In senior high grades (10-12) there were 393 Negro dopouts compared to 307 whites. There are many dramatic situations behind these statistics which should be of special concern. The damaging effects are relected in many Negroes who are socially and economically handicapped, many are dependent, poorly educated and lacing in responsibilities of citizenship. Many of the problems of Negro citizens are a direct result of past and present discrimination and exclusion based on race. As Whitney Young, Executive Director of the National Urban League, points out -- "As a matter of historic equity, special compensatory programs are justified and may well be the only means of overcoming the heavy aftermath of past neglect."

To correct the problems presented by this brief narrative and statistical report, the cooperative efforts of many individuals and organizations, public and private agencies are needed. Such a program will not only strengthen Negro family life but it will result in the saving of millions of dollars in health and welfare services.

Submitted by: J. Harvey Kerns, Executive Director
Urban League of Greater New Orleans

R+R Rel.

S.B.

TOWARDS AN UNDERSTANDING OF INDIAN AMERICANS

by

Galen R. Weaver

TOWARDS AN UNDERSTANDING OF INDIAN AMERICANS

Galen R. Weaver

In a half dozen or more previous years the Institute has had the privilege of having eight to twelve of its members from several Indian tribes. In most cases these have been men or women who were members of Tribal Business Councils. The presence of Indian Americans has added colorfulness to our company in several respects - they have sometimes presented Indian dances in brilliant Indian regalia and the sharing of their viewpoints and problems has added another dimension to the learning experience of the members of the Institute. I have heard Negro members say, for example, that they didn't know that there is another group in the United States that is, if anything, worse off than their own race. Indian speakers have reminded us that they view "segregation" in quite a different light from the way Negroes do. There are exceptions of course, but Indian Americans tend to think of their separateness from the majority society as a positive good. To be sure they chafe, like others do, against discrimination in hotels, restaurants, and sometimes in housing and schools. They suffer from stereotyping also and they stand to benefit from anti-discrimination laws and from the equal enforcement of law on the part of the police and the courts where too often Indians do not get a square deal.

May I note in passing that you can buy a brief and useful book in our book room with the title "American Indians", authored by William T. Hagan? It is 171 pages of reliable and interesting information that encompasses the whole period from Colonial America up to about 1959. Also worth reading is "Indians and Other Americans" by Fey and McNickle.

I will use throughout this statement the term "Indian Americans" because of a certain bias of mine in favor of an emphasis on the noun American. This is not motivated by whimsy or by chauvinism but is preferred because Indians, like Negroes, Japanese, Filipinos, Puerto Ricans who are residents and citizens are properly identified primarily as Americans and then as to their cultural or racial origin. Thus I prefer Negro American to American Negro just as we commonly speak of Japanese Americans or Mexican Americans rather than American Japanese or American Mexicans. At the same time I am aware of the fact that most Indians commonly speak of themselves as American Indians. I suggest that it would be advantageous to follow the nomenclature I am using.

As to other language usages, while "Indian brave", "squaw" and "papoose" are not offensive, these terms are not used outside of fiction and the movies. You may speak of "full bloods" and half-breeds" and 1/4 or 1/8 Indians without offending anyone. Of interest too is the fact that white persons who have some Indian ancestry, even though remote, are proud to admit it and even sometimes manufacture such ancestry. There has been a great deal of biological mixing and there are groups of so-called Indians, who find it advantageous to make much of their small amount of Indian genes although they are obviously much more Negroid in features and have little or no authentic Indian cultural heritage.

Maybe, then, a question worth asking is: Who is an Indian? An Indian is one of several of the numerous groups of Asian peoples who migrated to the Western hemisphere across the land bridge between Siberia and Alaska sometime within the last 30,000 or so years. The term Indian is of course a misnomer inasmuch as Christopher Columbus who gave the inhabitants that name was expecting to touch the shores of East India by sailing around the globe. These ancient migrating people of Mongoloid race came doubtlessly in successive waves and they moved across the face of what we now call North America, into and through Central America and on to the very tip of South America. This is surely one of the most amazing sagas of pre-historic times. Their descendents vary widely in physical traits although all have straight black hair, brown eyes and some shade of brown skin - that is all except those who have mixed their genes with European or African types. I have seen a few Indians with blue eyes and white skins but these were biological "sports" called Albinos. We have to allow also for Indians who look like Caucasians. I saw one the other day at Ft. Berthold in North Dakota. He calls himself an Indian. His parents and his brothers and sisters look like Indians should but somewhere in his ancestry there is a white man or women whose genes apparently have become dominant in this young man. He "passes" as an Indian even though he doesn't look like one at all.

We also know that Indians north of the present day Mexican border spoke some three hundred different langauage or dialects and that Indians today still speak at least 150 different tongues. Ethnologists have classified these into six major language groups. Their "life ways" or cultures range over a vast spectrum. There may well be as many as 600 different cultures. Some, like the Papagoes, were peaceful and believed war is a kind of insanity while others, like the Comanches, regarded fighting as a normal and even glorious way of life. Some like the Pueblo Indians live in small city-states and have maintained a settled agrarian life for centuries. Others were nomadic hunters and trappers. The complex civilizations of the Mayas of Yucatan, of the Aztecs and Mixtecs of Central Mexico and of the Incas of South America have all left a record of organizing genius still only partially fathomed by students of the impressive remains of their temples, their public buildings and public works. Knowledge of astronomy on the part of the Mayas was far advanced beyond that of Europe at the same epoch. Yet none of these groups discovered the wheel, perhaps the most important of all mechanical inventions.

With considerable alacrity these Indian groups adopted many items of material culture from the Europeans who introduced iron and copper utensils and tools, firearms, sheep and horses. Horses in fact revolutionized the life of the Plains Indians. As in the case of the five civilized tribes, the Indians adopted a written language and a written constitution providing for three branches of government. The Comanches created a free public school system earlier than several states did. Indians also gave many gifts to the white man - the two continents first of all to which these people had prior claim by reason of occupation and which they surrendered after much bitter fighting and after the Europeans' diseases had decimated the native population disastrously. The Indians also introduced many things to the white invaders such as maize, sweet potatoes, tomatoes, squash, beans, and scores of other foods and medicinal plants, as well as tobacco, to whose virtues a veritable cloud of smoke testifies every time we get together! The Six Nations Iroquois confederation suggested to Benjamin Franklin the model for our federal system of government.

But what of today's Indian in the United States? According to the Federal census definition in 1960, an Indian is one who identifies himself or herself as an Indian. On this basis there are approximately 510,000 Indian Americans exclusive of Alaska. About one-half of these live in Indian communities on reservations scattered across the whole country but particularly west of the Mississippi. At least 250,000 reside in towns and cities of the United States and probably thousands more no longer identify themselves as Indians even though they have some degree of Indian ancestry. A great many Indians living away from reservations visit their relatives "back home" from time to time. Some of these still own land and are on the tribal role and therefore eligible for tribal benefits such as money from leasing land or a portion of a claim's settlement. Some of these claim settlements run into ten of millions of dollars and frequently part of the money is distributed per capita to all on the tribal role. There is, in other words, a financial stake involved in continuing to identify as an Indian.

While speaking of who is an Indian and how many there are, let me point out that Indians are the fastest growing section of our American population. At the present rate of annual increase of 2 to 2½ per cent there will be as many Indians in the United States by 1975 as there were when Columbus discovered America - namely between 800,000 and 900,000. Far from being "vanishing Americans" as was the case forty years ago, Indians are becoming more numerous as public health measures and medical care increase as they have done markedly in the past seven years. The Navajos who make up the largest single tribe now number more than 80,000, a spectacular increase over ten years ago.

Non-Indian citizens need to understand the very special relationship of the Federal government to Indians. The term "ward of the government" used at the end of the 18th Century by Chief Justice Marshall is resented today and is inaccurate inasmuch as the Indian American is a free person. He can come and go like any other American citizens. However, by the choice of the Indians themselves, certain individual "allotments" of reservation land and certain tribal land holdings are still held in trust by the United States Government. These may not be sold without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior who is authorized to grant a "patent in fee" title which then removes this restriction and places the property on the tax roles. Such titles in fee are normally not difficult to obtain. Land, while in trust, is exempted from real estate taxes and so also are the products of such trust land including cattle. Freedom from land taxes was one of the benefits negotiated when treaties were entered into before 1851 and was considered by the Indians to run forever as one of the considerations for giving up their land. Indian reservations normally have their own police and tribal courts which do not, however, have jurisdiction over ten major crimes that are federal offenses. Again many of the services non-Indian citizens get through local and state governments are rendered to Indians by the Federal government. Free education through high school, grants and loans for post-high school education and health and welfare services are administered by federal agencies. This relationship is based on the right that the Constitution gives to the U. S. Congress to regulate commerce with the Indians and on literally thousands of treaties and executive orders. Up to 1851 Indian tribes were treated as "domestic dependent nations" which held sovereignty over their members and possessed the power to negotiate with our government. Many tribes have funds in the Treasury of the United States and these may be drawn out only by proper action taken by the Tribe and with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior.

To benefit from most of these federal services a person is supposed to be of 1/4 or more Indian ancestry and to live on trust land in a reservation. However, some latitude is exercised, particularly in relation to health services. The Federal government has been adamant against furnishing free services to Indians who move off the reservations and live in non-Indian communities where, it is contended, they are eligible for the same benefits as other Americans through local and state government. An exception is made in relation to "re-location" under which program the Bureau of Indian Affairs assists with finances and counselling Indian men and women who wish to move off of their reservation and reside in off-reservation communities and identify with such communities in terms of jobs and other normal ways. In such cases the Bureau will assist with travel expenses, rent and furnishings of a house, employment placement and case work services up to six months.

In respect to education, the Federal government for a dozen years or so and generally with the moral support of most Indians has made it a policy to place as many Indian children in public schools as possible. Under the Johnson-O'Malley Act, the Bureau negotiates contracts with public school districts to enroll Indian children from reservations at an agreed rate per child per day in lieu of real estate taxes. In a score or more towns or cities, dormitories have been erected to house the Indian boys and girls from more remote reservations and these students then attend public elementary and high schools. Nevertheless about half of the Indian children still attend Federal day schools on reservations or off reservation-federal boarding schools such as the one in Albuquerque, Chillocco, Oklahoma, and Riverside, California.

Whereas Indian relations were up until 1824 under the War Department they are now under the Bureau of Indian Affairs which is in the Department of the Interior (since 1849). The Secretary of the Interior - who is Mr. Udall at present, one of the Assistant Secretaries - Mr. Carver now, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs - since September 1961, Dr. Philleo Nash - are the officials repsonsible under the President. The Bureau of Indian Affairs maintains ten Area Offices and a Superintendent and staff of specialists on each of the major reservations and, of course, a sizeable staff at the Bureau in Washington. The annual budget for Indian health, education and other services is a sizeable sum running into the neighborhood of $ 180 million dollars. Many Indians are employed by the Bureau at all levels including Directors of the Area offices.

Indians are citizens of the United States and of the state in which they reside. Like other Americans they may vote, hold appointive offices and run for elective posts in government. A member of the Congress from South Dakota, the Hon. Ben Reifel, a half-breed Sioux and a Ph.D. from the Harvard School of Business Administration, is up for re-election to a second term this November.

I am going to be bold enough to venture a few generalizations about Indian Americans even though I understand that it is risky business. The range of variation in traditions, historical relations with non-Indians, economic resources, educational attainment levels as well as physical traits, is so wide that it is misleading to speak of an Indian problem or of Indian characteristics except in very broad terms. Not only is this true as between trival groups but also among individuals. When one looks with an unpractised eye at a people strange to it - Orientals or Negroes or Indians - he is likely to suppose they are all alike. This was somewhat my initial impression when I first went to Hawaii in 1922. I had difficulty for a while in distinguishing one from another until I came to know individual personalities. Indians, like other people, while they often share attitudes and personality traits to some extent are certainly as different from one another as you are from me.

I believe it was Mark Twain who said that no generalization is true, not even this one! Using the margin even he allowed, I venture the following interpretive statements which I believe are true in a general way and perhaps useful to greater understanding.

1) Indian Americans -- at least those who live on reservations and many of those who reside elsewhere-- are confused and frustrated. Some of them are resentful and suspicious towards all white people.

Their confusion and frustration arises from two sources at least:

a) The relative recency of the contact between their radically different life ways and those that were imported with the coming of the European and British invaders. To be sure, Indians east of the Mississippi who managed to survive the wars, the white man's diseases and the uprootings and displacements and also the Indians of the Southwest whose contacts were made quite early with the Spanish and Mexicans, have been interacting with non-Indians for three hundred years or more. But with other Indians it is useful to remind oursleves that 1962 is only the one hundredth anniversary of the uprising called "The Minnesota Massacre". It will be another 14 years before the centenary of the defeat of General Custer at the Little Big Horn (1876) and it was as late as 1890 that the massacre of Indian men, women and children took place at Wounded Knee in South Dakota. There are people now living who remember as children or youth Custer's defeat and the horrible cruelty of the U.S. Army at Wounded Knee.

It is difficult to imagine life ways more widely divergent from each other than the European-British culture and the various Indian cultures which came into conflict from the middle of the 17th century until 1890.

b) But the second explanation of the Indians' confusion and frustration and the inability of many Indian tribes to function effectively to achieve clear goals -- is the vacillation of policy on the part of the United States government. As we know the record of governments of technically advanced nations in their dealings with peoples of different and more primitive life ways is not good. The same disadvantages have accrued to the Indians. American domestic colonialism has largely left Indian-Americans bewildered as to what is expected of them, what their rights and responsibilities are and how to react to the kaleidiscopic shifts as one federal administration reversed the policies of its predecessor. The American government has been on the whole fairly honest and well-intentioned. I do know that there have been some scandalous periods, particularly prior to and during the Grant administration. President Grant finally turned to the Society of Friends to furnish honest and trustworthy reservation superintendents and and other Indian Service officials.

But there is a third reason:

c) For the lack of morale and for confusion, namely, the paternalistic outlook of most Indian Service administrators and policy makers. As a result there has been a failure to train Indians in self-management and to discover, teach and encourage indigenous leadership. The Bureau has not been heartless so much as unskilled in human relations and thereby in evoking confidence and enthusiasm in behalf of goals that were meaningful to Indians because they had chosen them for themselves. The implicit and sometimes the explicit goal has generally been the cultural assimilation of Indian Americans to the pattern of middle-class white Americans and to accomplish this as rapidly as possible.

In 1953, the 82nd Congress proclaimed in H.C.R. 108 that "termination" of all federal relationships and services should be attempted as rapidly as possible. This was called by some "freeing the Indians" or "granting them the full privileges and exacting the same responsibilities as expected of other American citizens. "Termination" became a frightening word to most Indians who have much less confidence in their state and county officials than they do in the Federal government. Bitter experience has taught them to distrust state legislatures which have been notoriously more susceptible to the pressures of timber, mining, fishing and cattle interests.

Many other Americans joined with the Indians in urging that H.C.R. 108 be repealed and that there be substituted what was called "A Point 4 program" of economic and social development of Indian communities and resources similar to those carried on among underdeveloped populations elsewhere. Although the Termination esolution was not repealed and the "Point 4" proposal was not enacted by the Congress, by 1958 Secretary of the Interior Seaton, acceding to pressure, in effect declared that termination would not be put into effect until and unless the affected tribe thoroughly understood and accepted it. He did not repudiate it as a final goal and, given adequate prior preparation in terms of education, health and understanding of the ways of the majority culture, there is little doubt that the Indians themselves will accept the transition including taxes on their real estate. For some tribes, however, such a transition may be decades in the future.

While the struggle was going on to turn back the tide of termination, an Act was passed which did terminate federal trusteeship and services for a number of named tribes. Included were the Klamath of Oregon and the Menominees of Wisconsin. Both of these groups possessed very large stands of timber that were being profitably harvested and marketed on a sustained yield basis. Some complicated arrangements had to be imporvised in a few years, during which amendments to the law postponed the effective dates several times. Involved were negotiations with officials of the state of Wisconsin who were caught with no advance preparation for the new order of relationships. Now there is a new county in Wisconsin called "Menominee" that conserves the valuable property of the tribe under a state charter. The Klamath forest and the wild fowl refuge have been saved. However the long term consequences of the too precipitate Congressional mandate will be studied with great interest by all who have the welfare of Indian people at heart.

Once again, in this Administration, we have a turning back to many of the constructive policies of the Franklin Roosevelt period. In 1928 the famous Merriam Report was published with its statesmanlike recommendations regarding Indian policy. Many of these ideas were implemented in the 1934 Indian Reorganization Act under which 135 tribes developed Constitutions, adopted a form of internal self-government with elective tribal councils and obtained federal charters. An effort was made that lasted only a few years to encourage self-management and to develop reservation resources and lift the standard of living.

Secretary Udall, Assistant Secretary Carver and Commissioner Nash, the latter a trained anthropologist, experienced government administrator and successful business man, have made the kind of commitments and have begun to institute the kind of changes that give promise of doing a responsible job in Indian affairs under the concept of partnership between the Indian tribes and the government. If this can be sustained over a dozen or more years, I believe that the confusion, bewilderment and lethargy of Indian Americans can be measureably overcome.

It is my conviction that the confusion and frustration I have been talking about are the root of the apathy all too typical of Indian Americans and which leads to so much stereotyping of Indians as lazy and irresponsible. I also hold the opinion that the excessive use of alcoholic beverages and widespread drunken-ness, with the resulting very high incidence of road accidents, are accounted for as an escape from a life that seems so largely meaningless and without promise of a better future. If this opinion be sound then the fundamental and only real cure for alcoholic excesses is not moralistic condemnation or even Alcoholics Anonymous but a new direction in Indian communities that will restore hope, enlist participation and create morale.

2) The next generalization is not difficult to document. However, I have not had access to statistical tables on income of Indians to support the broad statement that Indian Americans are poor. A very high percentage of them are unemployed or underemployed and a very great many are living on General Assistance grants or Aid to Dependent Children. Indians are very close to the bottom of the economic ladder. The reasons are not far to seek:

a) Lack of education and marketable skills;
b) Isolation from larger centers of industrial employment;
c) Fractionization of much of their land among many heirs so that relatively few Indians can put together large enough units for economic farming or ranching;
d) Lack of initial capital to get started in the kind of farming and ranching operations which can be made to be profitable today;
e) Lack of strong motivation as previously indicated.

It is hoped that the next Congress will pass legislation which will bring about a solution of the so-called heirship or fractionated land problem. The Bureau of Indian Affairs is giving this matter a high priority in its study and planning and will introduce a bill. The present Congress authorized an increase in the Revolving Loan Fund from 10 to 20 million dollars. Several months ago Commissioner Nash reported that applications from tribes are on hand for 19 million dollars in loans with which to purchase land alone in order to increase tribal holdings. Hence even 20 million dollars will not be nearly enough. Incidentally the repayments by Indian tribes on these loan funds has been extraordinarily good so that they are a good credit risk. Vocational education for adults will be increased by 57%, if Congress will appropriate the 5.5 million dollars requested by the Bureau. Since 1958 when this program began nearly 3,200 Indians have entered vocational courses and 81% of the graduates have become gainfully employed. The number of dropouts (1,026) compares favorably with the experience of the Veterans' Administration.

Approval of projects for housing for elderly Indians and another for low income families on the Pine Ridge Reservation in South Dakota represents a breakthrough in this field of federally-aided housing for Indian Americans. We may hope for similar projects on other reservations where housing is in deplorable condition.

Some efforts were made during the last Administration to attract private capital to develop manufacturing on or near the reservations where Indians would be employed. Tribes have put up their own money in some instances to build facilities for such industries. Even though there is a pool of relatively cheap labor that is not yet unionized, it is difficult to persuade companies to set up plants or move to Indian reservations because of their remoteness from large population centers and other disadvantages. Nevertheless there are several precedents as at Rollo, North Dakota, McLaughlin, South Dakota and near the Navajo Reservation that have been somewhat successful. More planning and greater staff resources are promised by the new Commissioner who is putting great emphasis on economic development.

3) Indians do not want to give up their homelands - or such remaining portions of their homelands as are left to them. Partly this is because they are worth millions of dollars in many cases. More importantly perhaps Indians have a strong emotional attachment to their ancestral lands. They are willing to accept privation if only there is the warmth of a friendly community. Indians see great beauty in the landscape of home whether it be the colorful desert of Arizona or the rolling praries of Montana or the Dakotas. They are proud of their heritage and do not want to see it lost in the anonimity of urban life. What the children who are growing up in the public schools away from home eight months of the year will want for themselves and their children is less certain. But for the present there is a strong bond between most Indians and their reservation communities. There they can find warm acceptance and the help of relatives in times of crisis and need.

4) Indians aspire to better health and better education, especially for their children, and they want an improved standard of living generally. They are, in short, seeking ways to better themselves. This accounts for the remarkable new level of interest in education, including higher education. This was particularly noticeable following World War II when many Indian youth left the reservations for a period in the armed forces while others worked in defense plants. In the outside world they saw that men and women with meager education cannot expect to get much of anywhere. They brought the message back to their people. Three thousand and six hundred Navajo young men served in the armed forces. Following their return home, a delegation of 26 Navajos visited Washington, D. C. at their own expense to demand that schools and teachers be provided for their children in accordance with the 1868 Treaty of Ft. Sumter. That treaty had pledged the U. S. Government to provide a schoolroom and a teacher for every 30 children between 6 and 16 years whom the Indians would compel to go to school. Hitherto there had been reluctance on the part of Indian parents to send their boys and girls to the white man's schools both because their children were needed to tend the thousands of sheep that had become so essential to their meager livelihood and also because they did not understand how such book-learning could be useful in their reservation life. Nearly 90% of the Navajos were illiterate. Commissioner Nash recently stated: "It is an unfortunate fact that we have never had enough classroom facilities so that all Indian children could go to school."

In the ten year period up to 1960 the number of young Indians pursuing post-high school education increased from 500 to 5,000. The scholarship grants program sponsored by the Board for Home Missions of the Congregational Christian Churches ever since 1954 and now funnelled through the United Scholarship Service Inc. of Denver, has demonstrated vividly how eager Indian young people are to go to college. There are still problems of early drop-outs, especially when the pupils reach the legal school-leaving age and attendance in regularity still leaves much to be desired but there has been marked improvement within the past decade.

5) Among the Indian people the United States has a great pool of under-developed talent in every department of learning and creativity. I often think with regret of the wastage that has been going on for these many generations. There is no basis for doubting the innate capacities of the children. In the mid-1940s, testing was carried out among Hopi, Navajo, Sioux, Papago and Zuni children. The language factor was eliminated so far as possible so as to make comparative results possible. The tests showed that two groups of Hopi children had an average IQ of 112 and 111 respectively on one test and 111 and 117 on the other. None of the children averaged less than 100 and all compared more than favorably with a control group of Middle Western white children. (Grace Arthur Point Performance Scale; and Goodenough "Draw a Man" tests for children 6 - 11 inclusive.)

Many Indian children appear to have considerable talent for art, especially painting and drawing. One of the very interesting or newly revived programs of the current federal Indian Bureau is the establishment in Santa Fe, New Mexico at the old Indian boarding school of a national Institute of American Indian Arts. It is to be opened this coming September. A full high school course will be offered plus two additional years of instruction. Courses will be offered in the fine arts such as painting and sculpture and also in indigenous crafts - silversmithing, beadwork, leathercraft, ivory carving and basketry. Indian boys and girls from all over the United states will be eligible to apply and will be able to get this high grade training at government expense.

Right now at the University of Colorado a five-weeks Indian Youth Workshop is being conducted under the auspices of American Indian Development, Inc., a private organization. The puepose of this workshop, now in its seventh year, is to offer to college Indian youth the opportunity to understand and appreciate something about their own cultural background, the history of relations between Indians and the majority culture and people and between Indian tribes and the federal and state governments, and to grasp some of the fundamental ideas and insights growing out of the social sciences as these relate to the processes of acculturation which they are experiencing. Out of this experience 20 to 30 young men and women are enabled each year to obtain a new image of themselves and new insight into their relationship to the social forces that play upon them. We who have founded and fostered this project are satisfied that such an experience, guided by teachers who know the background and psychology of Indian people, does help Indian youth to make a much more constructive adjustment within our pluralistic society. Out of these youth will come - indeed are already coming in fact - some of the leaders of today and tomorrow.

Time permitting one could identify certain other valid generalizations no doubt. But I have already told you more perhaps than you want to know about Indian Americans so I will conclude and subject myself to your questions and perchance your cirticisms and corrections. I would be particularly glad if Professor Shaw, out of his background of anthropological training and experience would make his comments first.

Stat. - Race & Race Rel.

cel caps

Legal definition of a "colored person"

General definition of "colored" by the average American white man: Everybody having a known trace of Negro blood in his veins —no matter how far back it was acquired— is classified as a colored person. In some states one Negro grandparent defines a person as a Negro for legal purposes; in other states any Negro ancestor is sufficient. In California, for example, a person is "colored" if one eighth or more of his ancestry is not Caucasian.

Atlanta, Georgia's legal definition: Colored people are all Negroes, Mestizos, and their ~~decendents~~ descendants, having any ascertainable trace of either Negro or African, West Indian, or Asiatic Indian blood in their veins, and all descendants of any person having either Negro or African, West Indian, or Asiatic Indian blood in his or her veins shall be known in this State as persons of color.

Exclusive Report---
S.F.'s Negro World

By Peter Breinig

The Chronicle's George Draper

A Journey Into The Ghettos--- Bitterness, Hope

By George Draper

Copyright, 1963, The Chronicle Publishing Company

Riptides of ragged emotion swirl day and night in the Negro ghettos of San Francisco.

This I know after living continuously—around the clock—for two weeks in San Francisco's Negro world.

I have heard the blue note, the cry of anguish, the interminable curse against the intangibles of life from the Fillmore district to Hunters Point.

And I have heard the strong words of hope from the courageous Negro men and women fighting their daily uphill battle.

The 80,000

The Negroes I lived with, ate with and listened to were working people, plain people most representative of the mass of this racially isolated group now 80,000 strong.

Deliberately, I avoided the so-called Negro leaders—the doctors, lawyers, well-to-do businessmen, politicians, celebrities and clergymen.

In two weeks I saw the city's workaday Negroes at their best and at their worst both in their homes and on the street.

I heard their complaints about the white man's world and their ceaseless question: "Why does the white man want to hold the Negro down?"

I also heard them express contempt for one another, address one another as "Nigger" and hurl unprintable insults in one another's faces.

Current of Violence

It was virtually impossible not to experience the undercurrent of violence that seems to be a part of the present-day Negro world.

A Negro man on Fillmore street belligerently offered to light my cigarette with a pistol when I asked him for a match.

I have seen Negro men strip to the waist to show the ugly scars they carry as evidence of knife and razor fights.

And I spoke with an older man who said he came from Dallas with two beautiful women and a .45 automatic looking for money.

"I wasn't looking for no job. I was looking for money. I opened me a whorehouse and got well," he said.

I talked to a man from New Orleans who is

See Page 12, Col. 1

San Francisco's Negro World

From Page 1

trying to stay honest, but is barely able to support his wife and nine children.

The Loaded Dice

"It's the same old loaded dice being a Negro in San Francisco. Only they put a little sugar on 'em," he said.

I have seen the sweetness of the little children, many of whom are illegitimate, and the touching affection shown them by the adults.

But I have also seen how sour these same sweet children often turn when they grow up and bump head-on into the rough reality of a world that does not seem to want them.

These are the husky youths with the processed hair and red pompadours and the narrow-brimmed, flying-saucer hats and the sideburns and goatees and the ever-present razor or knife.

"My father is a Negro and a nobody," their defeatist thinking goes, "and so am I."

Struggle for Dignity

But I also met some fine young men who somehow emerged from the rat-pack jungles and now talk seriously about the Negroes' struggle for "personal dignity."

I met Muni bus drivers, carpenters, hospital orderlies, janitors, special policemen and a couple of postmen, one of whom holds a master's degree in music.

During the two weeks that I lived in the Negro world of San Francisco certain apprehensions that I harbored initially tended to disappear.

I found myself becoming more relaxed in the exclusive presence of Negroes, both in the privacy of their homes and in public places.

I became progressively less conscious of them as Negroes and more aware of them as individual human beings.

The Long Trip

So much for generalities. Come along with me now into the Negro world.

You click shut the door of your Telegraph Hill apartment, take a last look at the exquisite view of Treasure Island, the Bay Bridge and the Berkeley Hills and, in 20 minutes, you are on Potrero Hill surrounded by Moon-Shooters.

You are sitting on a fence across the street from a small market and you pretend not to be impressed by the straight-edged razor one Moon-Shooter whips from his pocket.

Bill, the man who brought you there, is a tough, intelligent, street-talking Negro.

But you can't help wondering whether he can protect you, because the Moon-Shooters are dancing around him, flashing their weapons and accusing him of having intercourse with his mother.

Weapons and Frustrations

One bearded Moon-Shooter with a blue beret pulled down over his ears is carrying a pronged trident for a fishing spear in his hip pocket.

Another has a slim-bladed knife in his hand. With the other hand he dips quickly into Bill's pocket and takes his money. Bill's voice is suddenly serious.

"Hand that back, you mother-lover, or I'll kick your mother-loving ass," he says.

The Moon-Shooters are tough and defiant.

"I have seen how sour these sweet children turn when they bump head-on into reality" and given up, living only for today because "there's no tomorrow."

hip pockets, go out to meet him halfway. They are laughing at him.

Two strollers on the street

Berkeley Hills and, in 20 minutes, you are on Potrero Hill surrounded by Moon-Shooters.

You are sitting on a fence across the street from a small market and you pretend not to be impressed by the straight-edged razor one Moon-Shooter whips from his pocket.

Bill, the man who brought you there, is a tough, intelligent, street-talking Negro.

But you can't help wondering whether he can protect you, because the Moon-Shooters are dancing around him, flashing their weapons and accusing him of having intercourse with his mother.

Weapons and Frustrations

One bearded Moon-Shooter with a blue beret pulled down over his ears is carrying a pronged trident for a fishing spear in his hip pocket.

Another has a slim-bladed knife in his hand. With the other hand he dips quickly into Bill's pocket and takes his money. Bill's voice is suddenly serious.

"Hand that back, you mother-lover, or I'll kick your mother-loving ass," he says.

The Moon-Shooters are tough and defiant. They have little to look forward to except stealing.

Most of them are flat broke. They have no jobs. Many of them don't want to work. And there are no jobs in sight for those that do.

Most of them have dropped out of high school and given up, living only for today because "there's no tomorrow."

"I have seen how sour these sweet children turn when they bump head-on into reality"

The Talk of Youth

You feel uncomfortable in their midst as they twist on the sidewalk to the music from an auto radio, their knives flashing in the bright sunlight.

Their language is loud, obscene, threatening. Several are sporting grotesque pompadours. One is talking about a girl who sent him to the VD clinic.

"The bitch has sent ten studs there already," he says.

"I'll whip her ass if she gives me the mother-loving clap," a husky Moon-Shooter replies, and they all laugh.

A beer truck pulls up across the street and parks outside the market. The truck driver, a middle-aged white man with thinning reddish hair and a hefty build, steps out of the cab.

He glances toward your group, and you feel slightly self-conscious. No doubt he is wondering what you are doing there.

A Beer Job

The second he is out of sight a gangling Moon-Shooter sprints across the street and tries the handle on the rear door of the truck. It turns.

Everyone is silent, watching and braced to scatter as he opens the truck door, inserts his long arm and brings out a six-pack of beer.

The truck driver reappears just as the skinny Moon-Shooter is sprinting away with the loot. The driver strides defiantly toward the group.

Four Moon-Shooters, their hands resting in hip pockets, go out to meet him halfway. They are laughing at him.

"Why don't you try to act like normal human beings," the driver shouts at them.

His face is red and he's angry.

"If he takes one more step," Bill whispers to you, "they'll clean him out."

The Next Stop

As soon as the beer truck leaves, the thief returns with the six-pack and everyone has some stolen beer.

While you are sipping it you can see the fog rolling in over the San Mateo hills and, directly to the south, you see the gray pattern of the nearly all-black Hunters Point housing project. This is your next stop.

As you are driving there, Bill tells you that the threat of jail means very little to the Moon-Shooters.

"They'll risk going there for a bag of potato chips," he says.

(Tomorrow: A night with a family at Hunters Point.)

"I met some fine young men who emerged from the rat-pack jungles"

Exclusive: Life In S. F. 'Ghetto'

By Peter Breinig

Summertime—nowhere to go, nothing to do in the city's Negro "ghettos"

Negro World

Frank Talk in Friendly Home

By George Draper

Copyright, 1963, The Chronicle Publishing Company

It is apt to be difficult, at best, spending the night with a family you have never met before.

But tonight you are going to stay with a man, his wife and their seven small children in an incredibly crowded apartment in the Hunters Point housing project.

Knowing these people are so crowded and so poor causes you not a little concern. But what really disturbs you, however, is that you are a white man barging in on a family of Negroes.

Before going to the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Cunningham, you circle through the sprawling housing project slum.

Everywhere you look you see Negroes. The women hanging out the wash on the outdoor clothes lines are black women.

The children playing in the streets are little Negro kids. The men coming home from work are Negroes. So are the women you see dumping trash in the garbage cans chained outside every front door.

Not a White Face

If some white people are living in the vast project they have a talent for making themselves scarce. You don't see a single white face.

There is a terrible bleakness about the place. Hardly any green grass, few lawns, few trees.

There is only the gray monotony of the barracks-like buildings stacked like a row of crates on the wind-whipped hillside.

Low-income families, such as the Cunninghams, live there for two reasons: the rent is cheap and Negroes are allowed to live there.

The streets are lined with automobiles and here and there you see a gang of hard-looking teen-agers killing time, slouched in a beaten-up car.

More—perhaps a dozen—of these young men are loitering on the steps of the project's community center on top of the hill.

Nothing to Do

They wear goatees and flying saucer hats and they have knives in their pockets and nothing to do.

"I'm just fightin' and stealin' this summer," one youth tells you.

The Cunningham family is expecting you. They know you are a reporter trying to discover how the average Negro lives and what he thinks.

You walk up the outside stairs to their second

See Page 14, Col. 1

Negro World

Frank Talk In a Crowded 'Ghetto' in S. F.

From Page 1

floor apartment and they greet you in the warm, spotless kitchen.

Cunningham is a tall, quiet man with very dark skin and a small mustache and a twinkle in his eyes. He is a former Naval Shipyard pipefitter but now he is disabled and spends most of his time at home.

Mrs. Cunningham is a tall, graying woman with golden brown skin and a soft Southern drawl. Surrounding her, clinging to her dress, are five little boys and girls.

The children are quiet but their eyes are popped wide open as they peek at you from behind their mother's skirts.

Friendly, Relaxed

The Cunninghams are friendly and relaxed. They take your coat and ask you to sit down at the small kitchen table. Minutes later you are eating the most tender fried chicken you ever tasted, and steaming corn bread, and black-eyed peas.

The kitchen is little more than an extension of the living room, which is just large enough to hold a sofa and two chairs.

The place is remarkably neat and quiet. The children are well behaved and co-operative. There is no radio or TV.

A five-year-old girl with her hair gathered in tufts by rubber bands sidles up to Cunningham and he puts his arm around her.

"Give me some sugar, honey," he says.

As he bends down towards her, the little girl reaches up on tiptoes and kisses his cheek. Two other girls, about 10 and 12, appear from one of the three small bedrooms and smile shyly when introduced.

Heart-Breaking

The talk eventually swings around to the Negro problem. Mrs. Cunningham, who has nine children altogether, does most of the talking. She has a lot to say.

"My oldest girl, she's married now, used to bring white teen-agers home from high school and I made them feel welcome," she begins.

"And those white children apologized because I treated them so nicely and they knew their parents wouldn't invite my daughter back. It's kind of heart-breaking."

The small children snuggle around her and she envelops them with her arms. It is getting very warm in the kitchen.

"I think what the white people are really afraid of," she continues, "is that my daughter might fall in love with their son."

She goes on to say that she would prefer her daughter staying "in her own race" because interracial marriages are "very hard on the offspring."

Color of My Money

"But I'd like to be able to live where I want," she says. "Nobody asks the color of my money when I buy a car but they do when I try to buy a home."

She expresses the hope that the barriers now preventing communication between the Negroes and the whites will be broken down.

"If you'd let me," she says quietly, "I could be just as nice a person as you."

How could the barriers between Negroes and whites be lowered?

"It will have to happen in the schools and churches," she says. "The average Negro really doesn't trust the white man and I don't think the white man trusts the Negro."

Some Negro mothers, she tells you, teach their children that they are "no good because you are a Negro."

"There are some Negro mothers," she tells you, "who say to their children in school, 'Why bother? You're a Negro and won't get any place.'"

But Mrs. Cunningham also tells you there are many Negro mothers who encourage their children to work twice as hard because they are Negro.

Little Difference

"I have tried to teach each of my children that they are 'somebody,'" she says quietly.

She says she has observed little basic difference between Negroes and whites.

"I work as a part-time caterer," she says, "and I've served both white and Negro parties. The Negro is sometimes a little too loud. The white is apt to drink too much."

A long, frank, friendly discussion follows. The evening wears on. The Cunningham children have quietly crept away to their beds — boys in one room, girls in the other.

You are sleepy and Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham graciously insist you have their bed in the third bedroom.

"We'll sleep on the sofa tonight. We're glad to if it will help," they say as they wish you goodnight.

(Tomorrow: You move to the Fillmore District)

The prospect at Hunters Point is grim—no trees, little grass, bleak barracks

Heart-Breaking

The talk eventually swings around to the Negro problem. Mrs. Cunningham, who has nine children altogether, does most of the talking. She has a lot to say.

"My oldest girl, she's married now, used to

How could the barriers between Negroes and whites be lowered?

"It will have to happen in the schools and churches," she says. "The average Negro really doesn't trust the white man and I don't think the white man trusts the Negro."

Some Negro mothers, she tells you, teach

Front yards at Hunters Point—chained garbage cans

Exclusive

A Night With Negroes in S. F. 'Ghetto'

By George Draper

Copyright, 1963, The Chronicle Publishing Company

The billiard parlor in the Fillmore district ghetto is smoky and resounds with the nervous click of billiard balls and the obscene shouts of husky Negro pool sharks.

You are sitting on a rough bench with your back against the wall and every few seconds you must lean to one side or the other to avoid spoiling a pool shooter's shot.

When you glance around through the cones of light splashing on the Kelly green pool tables you meet darting eyes that seem to ask: "What's your business here?"

On your left is Jerry, a 200-pound street fighter. He is your connection and your protection and you are not about to leave his side.

On your right is Slug, an aging pimp and a stranger with no mercy in his eyes.

Slug reaches across you to shake hands with Jerry and you feel his forearm pressing against your chest. He's checking to see whether you are carrying any equipment, a gun or knife.

"He's with me," Jerry tells him gruffly.

Slug hands you a bottle of Thunderbird wine concealed in a paper sack and you drink without hesitation.

"We kill rats around here," he says.

Most of the players are shooting nine-ball and

See Page 14, Col. 1

By Peter Breinig

Wine in a paper sack . . . pool sharks . . . a gun on the hip . . . "we live for today"

The 'Ghetto' by Night

Life of Tension On the Streets

From Page 1

money is riding on all the games—from two bits to $200—and there is electricity in the air.

You are the only white man here and you have the feeling you are not wanted. Even Jerry, sitting beside you in his flying-saucer hat and short black trench coat and tight-fitting black trousers and pointed black shoes, appears glum.

Again, Slug offers you the bottle, which he refers to as "The Bird," and you drink.

Two Beautiful Women

"I come here from Dallas in '28 looking for money," Slug says.

He has high cheekbones and closely cropped hair and a stony note in his voice.

"I come here with two beautiful women and a .45 automatic to back 'em up. I opened me a whorehouse and got well.

"I wasn't looking for no job. Never had a job

He has high cheekbones and closely cropped hair and a stony note in his voice.

"I come here with two beautiful women and a .45 automatic to back 'em up. I opened me a whorehouse and got well.

"I wasn't looking for no job. Never had a job in my life."

A tall, muscular Negro with blondish hair and honey-colored skin, walks up to Jerry. He is wearing khaki slacks and a white T-shirt and he flexes his great biceps.

"Meet Carp," Jerry says.

Carp is a pool shark, a semi-wino and an admitted bum. He is also a street brawler and a seducer of white women.

"I had this white bitch last night and some monkey-faced nigger tried to move in on me," he tells Jerry.

Carp is friendly and seems to want to talk. He even anticipates your questions. He waves Slug aside and sits down beside you.

"We live for today," he says, gesturing toward the pool shooters. "We're not like most white people thinking way ahead.

"We're living for this moment. Right now. That's the difference. We're all scroungers and bullshitters."

Carp is a strong, handsome young man, full of vitality and life and you cannot help but like him.

"Why does it have to be that way?" you ask.

"Racial reasons, mostly," he answers without bitterness. "Where are you going to go? What's there to do?"

You leave the pool hall escorted by Jerry and Carp and walk down Fillmore street. It is night and only Negroes are on the street.

Restless Eyes

The smoky fragrance of barbecued spareribs hits your nostrils as you pass the Old Virginia Hickory Pit restaurant. A pig's head, skinned and well scrubbed, smiles at you from a butcher shop window.

A slender young man with a scraggly beard and a small gold cross earring in his left ear lobe steps out of a darkened doorway.

His name is Chip and he has restless eyes and liquor on his breath.

"What you doing, man?" Jerry says.

He pulls his shirt collar back and shows Jerry the welt of an eight-inch scar on his neck. The scar ends just short of the jugular vein.

"I'm looking for the son-of-a-bitch that cut me and I'm carrying my stuff with me," Chip says, explaining that the fight was over a woman.

Police Patrol Car

A police patrol car comes down the street and you sense that the two white officers are deliberately looking straight ahead, glancing neither to right nor left.

As soon as the police have passed, Chip reaches in his trousers pocket and produces a snub-nosed .22 revolver. It looks like a toy in the palm of his hand.

"Where are you going to go? What's there to do?"

"And when you find your man?" Jerry asks.

"I'm going to shoot the shit out of him," Chip replies. "It's only a .22 but I figure it'll hurt him pretty good."

He pockets the gun and moves warily up the street, sweeping the street with nervous eyes, checking the faces, peering into the smoke-filled pool halls and barbecue joints, looking for his man.

(Tomorrow: Breakfast in a Fillmore District home)

A Negro 'Ghetto'

The Horror Of a Slum

By George Draper

Copyright 1963, The Chronicle Publishing Company

It is not quite 10 o'clock in the morning and there is a slight stirring in a slum flat on Fell street at the south edge of the Fillmore District ghetto.

You have spent the night there in a sleeping bag on the tired living room sofa.

Your head is propped up on one elbow and you are smoking a cigarette, listening, surveying the sparsely furnished room.

Behind you is a dusty window looking out on the gray street. The floor is bare. The walls are a sickly cream color.

Across the room is a small record player, a wooden chair and a table holding a lamp with a black panther china base.

Time to Wake Up

On the mantlepiece of the blocked-off fireplace there is a photograph of Gil, the master of the house, in Marine dress blues. Two marksmanship medals are pinned conspicuously on his chest.

Cuddled beside him and smiling is his wife, Mary, who bore him three of their four children before they were married.

Gil works as a Burns Detective Agency guard at Candlestick Park whenever the Giants are play-

See Page 10, Col. 1

By Peter Breing

Gray streets . . . bleak yards . . . dimly lit halls—a "ghetto" in the Negro's world

A Negro 'Ghetto'

The Horror of a Slum

From Page 1

ing. But when the Giants are not here, he has no job.

The door opens and Gil, dressed only in shorts, comes in. He is a massive, golden-brown Negro with huge, rounded shoulders and powerful buttocks. He's 24 years old.

"How'd you sleep?" he asks.

He goes to the record player and soon the room is rocking with wild sounds.

"You are, you are my pride and joy, pride and joy, crazy boy."

It's Marvin Gaye screaming rock 'n' roll. It's time to wake up.

Four in One Bed

You walk down the dimly-lit hall. As you pass the open door to Gil's bedroom you catch a glimpse of Mary, half asleep, in a tangle of sheets and blankets.

The hallway leads to a room where an overhead light has burned through the night. Two of Gil's friends are asleep there on cots.

One is Ed, an ex-Marine and Muni bus driver without them. He's on the No. 5 McAllister street run today.

Mary, a very dark, lethargic, easy-going woman, says she heard on the radio that "they caught that man in Mississippi."

She is referring to the murderer of NAACP leader Medgar Evers. Neither Gil nor Tom pick up this conversational ball.

Instead, as you sit down at the kitchen table to eat, there is small talk about the Giants, batting averages, the cold at Candlestick Park and autos.

"Man, was it cold out there last night!" Gil says. "The wind was going boom, bam. I was wearing two pair of pants, a sweater and a sweat shirt under my uniform. That Candlestick wind will open doors, man."

Gil explains that he brought home from the stadium three discarded Louisville Slugger bats. He gets them and puts them on the table.

"Know what I'm going to do?" he says. "I'm going to make a collection of big league bats for my son."

The hours pass with horrible monotony. You shorts, comes in. He is a massive, golden-brown Negro with huge, rounded shoulders and powerful buttocks. He's 24 years old.

"How'd you sleep?" he asks.

He goes to the record player and soon the room is rocking with wild sounds.

"You are, you are my pride and joy, pride and joy, crazy boy."

It's Marvin Gaye screaming rock 'n' roll. It's time to wake up.

Four in One Bed

You walk down the dimly-lit hall. As you pass the open door to Gil's bedroom you catch a glimpse of Mary, half asleep, in a tangle of sheets and blankets.

The hallway leads to a room where an overhead light has burned through the night. Two of Gil's friends are asleep there on cots.

One is Ed, an ex-Marine and Muni bus driver. The other is Tom, a carpenter. Both are tall, lean, strong, good-looking Negro men.

Beyond this room is the kitchen. To the left of the kitchen is a tiny room where the four little children sleep together in one bed.

Outside the kitchen there is a porch and the toilet is located there behind a plywood partition. The facility has no door.

When you get there you find Gil's four kids waiting in line ahead of you.

A Samurai Warrior

The music switches to rhythm and blues.

"I'm packing up. I can't take it no more," someone is singing.

Returning from the porch you find Gil stretched on the floor methodically raising and lowering a barbell. The veins in his neck swell and the muscles of his arms ripple as he strains under the weight.

Then he dresses, pulling on a pair of old slacks and donning a golden Japanese jacket, quilted and with a broad satin collar.

Gil strides into the kitchen looking like a Samurai warrior and casts a suspicious eye at Mary, who is listlessly stirring hot cake batter.

"Honey, I told you never to use fat for frying hot cakes," he says irritably.

He takes the skillet off the stove and pours out the grease.

You light a cigarette and wish you could think of something to say. Ed and Tom come into the kitchen and nod to you.

Ed is dressed in his Muni bus driver's uniform and he grips the change holder in his right hand.

Small Talk

"Seen my shades?" he asks, meaning his dark glasses.

No one has seen them, and he leaves for work

She is referring to the murderer of NAACP leader Medgar Evers. Neither Gil nor Tom pick up this conversational ball.

Instead, as you sit down at the kitchen table to eat, there is small talk about the Giants, batting averages, the cold at Candlestick Park and autos.

"Man, was it cold out there last night!" Gil says. "The wind was going boom, bam. I was wearing two pair of pants, a sweater and a sweat shirt under my uniform. That Candlestick wind will open doors, man."

Gil explains that he brought home from the stadium three discarded Louisville Slugger bats. He gets them and puts them on the table.

"Know what I'm going to do?" he says. "I'm going to make a collection of big league bats for my son."

The hours pass with horrible monotony. You leave. But that evening you see Mary and Gil again under different circumstances.

Mary is sitting in the kitchen of her best friend's apartment, a few blocks away. She is laughing, drinking a little vodka. You are standing in an alcove just off the kitchen.

A Burst of Violence

Suddenly, the front door crashes open and Gil springs through it, takes the distance of the hallway with three leaping strides and grabs his wife. He doesn't see you.

"Come on, bitch. I'm taking you out of here," he snarls.

Mary screams and breaks free. Her leather jacket is ripped at the shoulder.

Her two friends, Lila and Jane, also scream as they sink their fingernails into the back of Gil's sweater. The sweater tears as they try to pull him away.

"Come on, bitch," Gil says angrily.

He shoves Mary against the kitchen table, and the room is filled with screams and the sound of crashing chairs and shattering glass.

Then Mary escapes. She darts out the back door into the night. Tears come to Gil's eyes and, when he sees you standing in the alcove, his nerves seem to snap.

"I'm sorry. God but I'm sorry," he sobs.

(Tomorrow: A New Orleans Negro looks for work here.)

A Negro 'Ghetto'

For the Young And Old---Gloom

By George Draper

Copyright 1963, The Chronicle Publishing Company

Mrs. Green is ageless and indestructible.

She is a gray-haired Negro woman from St. Louis, from the banks of the Mississippi. And she smokes a pipe.

When you meet her in her $100-a-month apartment in the Fillmore District ghetto she is wearing a light, gray cotton dress and the pipe, with its stem patched with adhesive tape, is jutting from her mouth.

She is sitting by a little fireplace in her bedroom and her young granddaughter and grandson are curled up in the rumpled bed, asleep.

See Page 10, Col. 1

'Ghetto'---Gloom for Young and Old

From Page 1

"I got me a fire going," she smiles.

Mrs. Green used to live in the Potrero Hill housing project but moved to this flat in the 900 Block of Hayes street two months ago.

Living with her is a 25-year-old daughter, Christine, who works as a waitress at a small cafe near Fillmore street.

Christine is a flighty, gaunt-faced, wiry woman and the two children asleep in Mrs. Green's bed are hers without benefit of marriage.

The flat is gloomy, sparsely furnished and depressing. Mrs. Green tells you the toilet has just broken and the Negro landlord is supposed to be coming around to fix it.

There is a back yard littered with old boards, trash and an overgrowth of weeds and plants. No one has bothered with it for years.

The little boy in the bed—he's about four—awakens and comes over and climbs up on Mrs. Green's lap. She picks up an aluminum cigar case from the floor and purses her lips.

The Weird Sounds

Haunting sounds, weird and primitive, come from the cigar case as the old lady blows into it. Her left foot stamps a counter rhythm.

"Here, son, blow on it," she says, handing the cigar case to the little boy.

There are three such flats in this old building, with its high ceilings and cracked walls. Mrs. Green is on the first floor. An elderly Negro couple, also paying $100 a month, are on the second floor.

"Why don't you go up and see the Turners on top," Mrs. Green says. "They got nine kids and not much to eat."

Just then, Mrs. Turner, a surprisingly trim and attractive and young-looking woman comes to Mrs. Green's front door. She is carrying a baby.

She says it will be all right for you to come up to talk to her husband and you follow her up the two flights of dimly lit stairs.

You find Turner sprawled across a bed. He is dressed in blue jeans and a blue work shirt and he is smoking.

A Tough Little Guy

There is something about him, the hard lines in his dark face or the steady look in his eyes or his lean figure, that tells you this is a tough little guy.

He doesn't get off the bed to greet you but he does extend a hand of greeting and motions you towards a chair.

Two of the Turners' nine kids are hovering near the end of the bed and, when one of them starts to cry, Turner calls to his wife to "take this boy away."

"The White Citizens Council," he begins in a pleasant drawl, "sent Ethel and the kids up here last September. They were called reverse freedom riders and they were given train fare from New Orleans and $50 for food.

"I followed about three weeks later and I've been trying ever since to get settled with a job.

"I've worked some odd jobs, sometimes walking all over the city to find them 'cause I had no money for bus fare.

"I'm a painter by trade and I've worked now and then for other guys that got small painting contracts. But I've got to work cheaper than the next guy because I'm not in the union.

"I tried for a laborer's job at $3.37 an hour in Tiburon but the Laborers' Union wouldn't give me no clearance. And I couldn't get into the Painters' Union.

"It's the same old loaded dice for a Negro in San Francisco. They just sugar 'em up a little."

Turner is 37 and a Navy veteran of World War II. But he tells you he was accorded the right to vote for the first time only three years ago.

He proudly shows you his voter's registration card from New Orleans and he says he finally got it after applying "five or six times a year" since 1946.

Beans and Grits

Ethel Turner says life has not been easy since she and the kids took the big freedom ride to San Francisco.

"Sometimes I've pulled the family through on a $15-a-week food budget—mostly beans and grits," she says.

"But if the children are to have milk and enough food it costs about $45-a-week to feed all of us. The Welfare Department won't help because Charlie's living at home."

Turner sits up on the bed and offers you a cigarette. You feel that you shouldn't take it but you accept it, anyway.

"You know," he says, "when you got a bunch of kids hollering for bread you got to be a pretty stable fellow not to commit yourself (go out with a gun)."

That night the Turners moved to another flat at 2520 Sacramento street. It costs $125 a month, and that's where they presumably are now.

(Tomorrow: You encounter an angry pimp.)

A Negro 'Ghetto'

Chron 20 July 1963

Knives, Guns And Threats

By George Draper

Copyright 1963, The Chronicle Publishing Company

It is night and you are looking down on the hard core of Fillmore street (known also as The River) from the window of a darkened room in a cheap rooming house.

You are watching the restless procession of Negroes "swimming in The River."

A stocky gambler called Little Reno strolls by. And there goes Harry the Horse, the prize fighter who "boxed his way into a Cadillac."

Here comes Big Brown, the giant anchor man of the knife-packing motorcycle gang known as The Rattlers, and then you see the bearded gambler called Castro.

There's the "pusher" who pretends he is drunk, staggering a little as always, and you see The Man coming up the street in a sleek red limousine. The Man has heroin and cocaine for sale in his socks.

See Page 9, Col. 1

Negro 'Ghetto'---a D

From Page 1

Edgy Young Man

Two other men are in the room with you—Bill, your alert, street-talking Negro friend, and Flint, who holds the improbable title of co-manager of this dismal establishment.

Flint is an edgy young man wearing light colored slacks and a black and white Mexican serape. He is holding a stabbing knife, the kind that locks open after the blade slides out of the handle.

You are waiting to meet a pimp and, while you are waiting in the glow of the street light feeding back into the room, a bottle of T-Bird wine is passed around.

"Man, that's a real head-knocker," Flint says.

A heavy-set Negro wearing overalls and carrying a broom thumps down the shadowy hallway. He is an older man and he is also a co-manager.

A Metallic Click

"Flint," he bellows through the opened door, "I want you to clean up this hall."

Flint adds his own punctuation to the command with a metallic click as he snaps open the cool, thin knife blade.

"Clean it up yourself. It's not my job," he says.

The big man backs away, grumbling, and reluctantly starts sweeping in the mellow light.

"For everyone that's got a room in this filthy trap," he mutters, "there's 19 others living here, all messing the place up, throwing trash."

The pimp you are waiting to talk to operates out of the third floor of the building.

Two Women

You have already caught a glimpse of the two women he keeps up there.

One is a skeletal creature with very dark skin and high cheekbones. You saw her in the hallway holding a bottle of T-Bird while a little boy tugged at the skirt of her black dress.

The other woman was sitting on the edge of an unmade bed with two small children, her nut-brown skin contrasting becomingly with the fiery green of her dress.

The pimp, a big fellow, shrewd and tough, acted warily when you asked to talk with him.

"Wait downstairs in Flint's room. I'll see," he said while frowning and scratching the back of his bullet-shaped head.

So you are waiting for him now while watching the people swimming in The River and shooting the breeze with Flint and Bill.

Bottle or Needle

"Lots of Negroes would like to see a dump

Chron.

Dirty Room Upstairs

like this cleaned out," Bill says. "I mean the doors ought to be kicked in and the place cleaned out but good."

Then the pimp storms in and he is a changed man. He is bristling with hostility and you have a feeling trouble is on the way.

"He's either killed a bottle of T-Bird or popped the needle," Bill whispers to you.

Bill is standing with his back to the wall, facing you. You are sitting on the arm of a red sofa a few feet away from him. Flint is at the other end of the sofa.

The pimp has his right hand in his hip pocket and he is standing now between you and Bill, addressing his angry words to everyone in the room.

'I'll Get Him'

Someone, he says, has stolen his clothes from his room and he is convinced Bill knows the man who took them.

As he rants on and on his words are aimed more and more directly at Bill. His voice is booming.

"When you see the mother-lover tell him I'm looking for him. Tell him I'll kick his tail off. Tell him I'll kick his tail wherever he is, up here, in The River, wherever.

"If you see him in The River tell him I'll be swimming alongside him."

The pimp whips something that glints in the street glow from his hip pocket. There is a sharp thud as he drives the knife-point into the plaster inches from Bill's throat.

You glance up at Bill and are surprised to see how cooly he is regarding the shouting, knife-striking man so close to him.

"Tell him," the pimp roars, "that I'll get him with this knife or the .38 in my room . . . either one . . . I don't care."

Fresh Night Air

The pimp strikes the wall again with the knife. He is still shouting. He takes a long sweep with his arm and sinks the blade into the sofa cushion between you and Flint. Everyone is still.

"Tell him I'll get him with my .38," he shouts.

He mentions the .38 once more but, like a line squall blowing out, he seems to be quieting down. He turns towards the door.

"I'm going to get my stuff (gun) now," he says, striding out of the room.

Twenty seconds pass and no one speaks. You file out quietly, pretending you are not in a hurry. You do not even glance back over your shoulder as you move down the narrow hall, down the creaking stairs to the street.

Bill takes a deep breath of the fresh night air.

"If he'd come an inch closer," he says, "I'd have broken his neck."

Only then do you learn that Flint weathered the temper tantrum with his stabbing knife locked open and held closely by his left thigh where the pimp couldn't see it.

"I was counting on you," Bill says, giving Flint a slap on the back.

(Tomorrow: And there are Muslims too.)

Life in a 'Ghetto'

Chron 21 July 63

The Negroes Ask: 'Why?'

By George Draper

Copyright, 1963, The Chronicle Publishing Company

In the rear of a refrigerator repair shop in the heart of the Fillmore District ghetto there is an old sofa and, seated on that sofa, you find Mrs. William X.

She is a 22-year-old Black Muslim, handsome and haughty and ready to recite the line of Elijah Mohammed by rote.

She is sewing a button on a threadbare coat while telling you she is trained in judo and could throw a 250-pound man out of the shop.

"You never hear of a Muslim woman being raped," she says.

Mrs. William X pauses to give you time to jot down her words. Then she resumes her tireless dialogue.

Nothing But Misery

"We only teach our people to stand on their own two feet, to have their own independent State and their own businesses," she says.

You thank her for the interview and prepare to leave.

"Just one other thing," she says. "We want peace. We don't want fighting and bloodshed. But under Christianity the so-called Negro has never got anything but misery, suffering and death."

You emerge from the shop and walk down the shadowy side street to the three-room apartment of Mrs. Clara Livingston. Your Negro friend, Bill, is walking at your side. Dusk is gathering.

Mrs. Livingston is sitting in a drab, overheated living room nursing a month-old baby. Lines of fatigue are etched on her ebony face. Her eyes are half closed.

The baby is snuggled contentedly against her breast and it occurs to you that before too many

See Page 14, Col. 1

Negroes' World

The Burning Question of The 'Ghetto'

From Page 1

years this baby will be an American citizen of voting age. You wonder what sort of a person he will turn out to be.

Mrs. Livingston has three other children and her husband, who is a postman, is sick.

"I work for a Greek family," she says in a low, calm voice. "They have been awfully nice to me and when they eat, they invite me to sit down at the table with them.

"When I serve a party for them it is almost as though I am one of the guests because everyone is so friendly.

"I often think about it. I don't know what it is about white people. They love us. We can cook for them and do housework for them better than they can. We give their children love and their children love us.

"So why is it that we can't be neighbors?"

Hostile Stranger

You have no answer for her but you talk a little more and then you and Bill step outside into the darkness.

In a few minutes you are back on Fillmore street walking briskly past a gang of hoodlums drinking wine on the corner and playfully chasing one another with drawn knives.

You are out of matches and yearning for a smoke so you approach two Negro men standing on the corner of Fillmore and Hayes.

You hold up your hand with the unlighted cigarette and Bill politely asks the taller of the two men whether he has a match.

"Nope," the tall man answers abruptly, "but I got a pistol in my pocket and I'll fire it up for you with that if you like."

A Hard Worker

cigarette and Bill politely asks the taller of the two men whether he has a match.

"Nope," the tall man answers abruptly, "but I got a pistol in my pocket and I'll fire it up for you with that if you like."

A Hard Worker

You continue south on Fillmore and you have the feeling that while there are some dangerous people on the street, there are many others who are just plain running scared.

At Oak street, you turn west and walk a dozen blocks through the ghetto and finally reach the partially integrated Haight-Ashbury District near the Golden Gate Park panhandle. It is less tense there.

You knock on the door of a modest-looking three-story apartment building and a young Negro opens it and invites you inside.

He is John Gaylord and he is 27 years old and has completed one year at San Francisco City College. He is now attending a television and electronics school in his off-hours.

Gaylord, who is typical of many hard-working young Negro men, has close-cropped, black hair and a thoughtful expression on his narrow, almost handsome face.

He supports a wife and three children working from midnight to 8 a. m. as a $4600-a-year janitor at San Francisco International Airport.

His wife, Marlene, is a slim and vivacious young woman with a flare for clothes. She tells you she would like to go back to her home town in Mississippi and take part in civil rights demonstrations.

Gaylord has worked for the Post Office Department and as a janitor at the University of California Hospital before landing his present job at the airport.

Fifty of the 60 janitors at the airport, he tells you, are Negroes and ten of those Negroes have one or more years of college behind them.

"Most young Negroes," he tells you, "have one goal in mind: to prove to the Caucasians that they are just as good as they are. To do this a Negro has to be twice as sharp."

Behind the Bitterness

Gaylord says he hopes to start working in January in a TV repair shop and that eventually he hopes to have his own business.

This young man is serious and direct in his thoughts and there is something sound and solid about the appearance of his apartment and his family.

"I have a friend who hates the whites," he says, "because white men hung his father. A Negro who hates the whites bitterly has usually experienced something like that, where something has been done to his sister or his brother or his parents.

"But the majority of the Negroes don't hate the white man. All the Negro wants is the right to

See Page 15, Col. 7

On the street . . . sometimes tension, sometimes danger

'Ghetto': The Big Question

From Page 14

do as he does, go where he goes."

Gaylord fixes you with his serious eyes and asks:

"Why is it the white man wants to hold the Negro down? Why doesn't he want the Negro to move up?"

And then, in answer to his own question, he adds:

"Because the white man knows that if you give a Negro a chance he'll prove that he's as good or better than he is."

The End

Team of 6 Reporters Prepared D. C. Series

A team of six reporters of The Washington Post collaborated in preparing this seven-part series, "Summer of Discontent," a depth study of race relations in Washington. It was written by Staffer Robert E. Baker, The Washington Post's specialist in race relations reporting. Participating were Eve Edstrom on welfare and youth problems, Rasa Gustaitis on housing, Wallace Terry on Negro leadership attitudes, Alfred Lewis on police matters, and Jean White on employment.

LWD, PA, SB WP 8/11/63
R&R Rel.

Summer of Discontent—I

Crime Statistics Only Symptoms Of Washington's Racial Problems

First of a Series

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

Almost since it was born, the city of Washington has been the subject of diagnosticians who take the patient's temperature, feel its pulse and announce gravely: "You're sick."

It was true in the 1850s when Congress looked aghast at the Washington crime rate and friends of the city felt compelled to reply that the citizens in other American cities were being beaten and robbed as often and as thoroughly as here.

It was true in the 1880s when Washington was dealing with "grave problems connected with the influx of illiterate and penniless victims of slavery" and a troublesome crime rate.

Still "A Sick City"

It was true in the 1930s, so much so that an author working in 1963 on a history of Washington reports difficulty in separating crime reports of then and now.

And it is true today. One of the latest diagnoses appeared in a recent issue of Look magazine under the title, "Washington—A Portrait of a Sick City."

The author wrote about the city's "change in a generation from a reasonably secure place to a city of fear." His story differed little from a 1950 Collier's article which was headlined: "Terror in Washington."

Such reports have helped spread the impression throughout the Nation and much of the world that Washington leads the Nation in crime. The facts are different. A comparison of FBI statistics on crime for fiscal 1962 shows that Washington ranked seventh among the Nation's 12 largest cities in the number of crimes committed for each 100,000 population.

School desegregation in south brings a variety of personal experiences. Page A8.

Celler subcommittee tackles job of writing a civil rights bill. Page A2.

Washington crime rate is neither the worst nor the best. Nevertheless, the city's crime rate is a factor in examining and understanding a new and grave aspect of Washington life—racial unrest.

Racial Powder Keg

Racial tension and violence has been a stranger to Washington in past years. But today City and Federal officials believe the Nation's Capital may be sitting on a powder keg with plenty of tinder lying around.

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy not long ago expressed alarm at the situation. The New York Times recently headlined an article on Washington: "Obsessed by Race Problems, Capital Fears Violence." The Washington Afro-American newspaper expressed an extreme editorial view by predicting "a fantastic race riot . . . in the not too distant future."

Sparking these views was the melee with racial overtones that followed the annual high school football game

See RACIAL, A6, Col. 2

RACIAL—From Page A1

Crime Statistics Only Symptoms Of Washington's Racial Problems

last Thanksgiving Day at D. C. Stadium. The aftermath of the melee has been marked by unprecedented attention to Washington's problems by Congress, the Kennedy Administration and by the corps of press correspondents assigned here.

There is no doubt that dissatisfaction, unrest and militancy among Washington Negro leaders has increased in recent months. Among whites, it is the crime situation that has brought racial unrest into focus. Many whites tend to accept the belief that Washington crime is racial in nature, that Washington crime is Negro crime. They tend to ignore the sociological and economic causes of crime or statistics that show Washington's crime rate is less than many cities with smaller Negro populations.

Negro VA. Negro

Many whites ignore the fact, with which Negro Washingtonians are painfully aware, that six of the seven crimes committed by Negroes are against other Negroes.

This tendency to see racial unrest in Washington solely in terms of the city's crime rate is a narrow viewpoint. The Washington racial problem is far broader than that. So are its implications. So are its solutions.

In decades past, Washington was viewed as a Southern city that nevertheless provided a rather comfortable home for Negroes. Since 1950, the city has made tremendous progress in removing racial barriers, far outstripping other Southern cities.

Yet today there is evidence of more bitterness and frustration among Negro leaders here than ever before, more so than among Negroes in Southern cities which still lag far behind Washington in the desegregation process.

Turn to The North

The purpose of this series of articles by reporters of The Washington Post is to examine why this is so.

One fundamental reason is that Washington has changed from a Southern-oriented city to a Northern-oriented city in race relations.

In Washington, the process of desegregation — the tumbling of concrete and overt elgal barriers — is virtually over. Today the Washington Negro faces the problems of integration, problems of subtlety and complexity, that still exclude him from full participation in the mainstream of American life.

Just as the Birmingham Negro feels progress today as traditional segregation barriers crack, the Washington Negro felt progress in 1953 with the opening of public accommodations and in 1954 with the desegregation of schools.

But today in his desegregated city, the Washington Negro finds himself excluded from the suburbs and parts of the city. If he is poor, he is jammed into dirt-ridden slums. If he is a little better off, he lives in a badly overcrowded home and pays a premium for it.

Discrimination in Jobs

His desegregated schools have been resegregated. He finds discrimination in jobs. He sees a problem generation ahead in the jobless, bitter Negro youths that roam the streets. He is irritated by the vestiges of old Southern Washington shown by the rudeness of some policemen, some bus drivers, some store clerks.

A feeling of frustration is heightened for the Negro Washingtonian because he lives under perhaps the worst form of government ever suffered by an American city. He can take his grievances to no elected local government, no mayor, no council.

And he feels with accuracy that a majority of white Washingtonians oppose home rule because Negroes certainly would be elected to office.

Tension and frustration often is more attributable to the way people feel and not to the way things are. Dissatisfaction is greater when higher expectations go unfulfilled. And it is axiomatic in race relations that a sip of freedom serves only to whet the appetite.

Unfulfilled Aims

The Washington Negro had high expectations in the Nation's Capital a few years ago but he feels these have been unfulfilled.

As the Nation's Capital and with a 57 per cent Negro population, Washington receives the fall-out from civil rights outbursts elsewhere. There is an emphatic response here to Negro efforts in Jackson, Philadelphia, Birmingham, Detroit, Danville, Chicago, Cambridge, Brooklyn, and Los Angeles.

The Washington Negro feels the vigor of the nationwide drive for full equality but feles a lack of momentum within his own city.

The Washington Negro community as an entity makes more money and lives a better life than do Negroes in almost any other American city. Negro leaders who call for more militancy often despair at the complacency of the large Negro middle class here.

Few Negroes predict widespread racial violence or riots in Washington. Many of them concede that the Negro revolt, taking place in other cities today where conditions are worse, has barely touched this city.

But they acknowledge that the elements of serious racial trouble are here and are becoming increasingly important, that anti-white feeling can spread much farther than it has so far and that the tinder lying around the racial powder keg can be lit.

The Washington Post will report on the attitude and grievances of Negroes in the Nation's Capital in succeeding articles.

For the Negro in Washington, housing discrimination strikes closest to home and heads his list of grievances. Monday's article will report on the housing problems of Negroes, from the professional man excluded from the white-only suburbs to the part-time laborer paying a premium rent for a slum apartment in a segregated "ghetto" neighborhood.

Housing Restrictions Top Grievance List of Washington Negroes

Second in a Series

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

The Washington Negro usually places inadequate housing at the top of his list of grievances.

He places it above the discrimination he may feel in employment because the housing problem strikes nearly every Negro every day, whether he holds a good job or not.

The Negro economist in the Budget Bureau feels just as bitter and frustrated when denied a new home in suburban Belair, Md., because of his race as does the Negro laborer who pays half of his $200-a-month wage for a dilapidated apartment in the city and knows that whites get much more for their money.

When whites remind the Washington Negro how far he has come in the past decade, the Negro points to slums and ghettos as evidence of how far he has to go.

The Negro's home is a daily reminder that here in the Nation's Capital, the Nation's most open city for Negroes, doors are still shut. There is a certain subtle symbolism when the Negro speaks of the white-only suburbs as the "White Noose."

Sometimes the Negro housing problem is told in statistics. In 1960, Washington Negroes, then 55 per cent of the population, lived in 44 per cent of the city's housing units.

Negro housing is five times more crowded than white housing. Slum operators and real estate speculators cost the Negro from $5 million to $15 million yearly in excessive rent and mortgages, according to an authoritative source. About a third of Washington's Negro families can afford to rent a large apartment at $100 a month or buy a house for $15,000 but these are available mostly in the suburbs where the Negro is barred by unwritten but effective barriers.

View of Statistics

Sometimes the Negro here hears that his housing compares favorable with other cities. Statistics show that Negroes in Washington are living in better housing than they did 10 years ago, and a Negro sociologist recently observed that Washington Negroes have better housing than do Negroes in any other major American city.

But statistics and comparisons don't mean much in explaining racial attitudes in Washington today.

It is the way people feel and what they see that counts, especially around 5 p. m. when the day's work is done and the integrated traffic jams unscramble into Negroes and whites heading for their separate neighborhoods.

Dinner in Vernanda

Leonard Donihan, white, and Willard Williams, Negro, both are GS-7s who work in the same Federal office. At 5 p. m., they say goodbye and Donihan, who once lived in Washington but moved out when his children began to reach school age, joins his car pool group aimed for Arlington.

While the car idles a moment in the traffic, Donihan looks around him at dilapidated Negro homes, with children outside, women leaning from windows for a breath of cooling evening air and men standing around corners.

See RACIAL, A8 Col. 3

RACIAL—From Page A1

Housing Restrictions Top Grievance List of District Negroes

Donihan decides he will have time to mow his lawn before having dinner on the veranda.

Williams, the Negro, rides a shared cab to the two-story house he bought on 14th st. nw. six years ago to escape the slums and provide better environment for his children.

He steps from the cab and sees a broken bottle on the sidewalk. He picks it up and, walking slowly to the trash can, holds in his hand the bitter reminder that the slums have caught up with him again and he can't outrun them by moving to the suburbs. As he enters his home, he can't help thinking about the white commuters and wondering if they give a damn.

Only Rent Is the Same

At 5 p. m., the hour of division, Michael Smith, a white laborer, heads toward his old Upper Marlboro house in his aging car. It is a long daily trip but he couldn't find any place as roomy or cheap in the city, with plenty of space for his children and a fine school nearby.

Hampton T. Jones, a Negro laborer, pays the same rent as Smith. At 5 p. m., Jones catches a bus for his apartment near 6th and M sts. nw. where his wife, five children and mother-in-law share three rooms with an alcove for cooking.

The man next door was arrested in a stabbing recently. Jones fears for the future of his children; the oldest already wants to drop out of his overcrowded school.

Jones notices the trash is overflowing from the cans again because the landlord has neglected to collect it. He has given up complaining to the Housing Division; his past complaints were useless.

Until recently, he had hopes of getting out of this slum; he was one of the 8000 on the waiting list for public housing. But he got a raise recently and, like thousands of others, makes just enough money to be ineligible for decent public housing and not enough for decent private housing.

He thinks about this bitter fact of life and feels that race is the blame.

"Market Value" or Race?

At 5 p. m., Henry J. Thomas, a Negro, headed for his one-bedroom apartment at 1737 T st. se. He pays $80 a month plus heat and utilities in the building primarily occupied by Negroes.

In an almost identical apartment building next door, occupied mostly by whites and managed by a different firm, one bedroom apartments rent for $62.50.

Thomas and his neighbors asked their rental agency, John R. Pinkett, Inc., about the difference. The president of the firm, Flaxie Pinkett, a leader in the Negro community, replied that the company felt the rents at 1737 reflected "fair market value."

But to the Negro tenants involved, it was a matter of race. Either the whites next door are paying less than they would if the neighborhood were solidly white or Thomas and his neighbors are paying more because they are Negroes.

"Fair market value" has come to mean something different for a Negro and a white in the city because of the vastly different demand and supply.

'Negro Gold Coast'

At 5 p. m., when whites jam 16th st. nw. on their way to Maryland suburbs or white Washington across Rock Creek Park, they pass fine Negro homes ranging in price from $20,000 to $50,000.

The commuters are likely to remark that this used to be an exclusive white section of Washington and the Negroes now living there cannot be considered underprivileged.

The Negro community calls this section the "Negro Gold Coast" and truly there is little tinder for Washington's racial powder keg there. The Negroes there are at the top.

At the bottom are the poorest Negroes who cluster in the central city in an area bounded by 14th st., West Virginia, Massachusetts and Michigan aves.

These are the cellar people. At 5 p. m., white commuters see brick facades that often look respectable. Behind these facades, the cellar people are constantly moving and hiding their squalor.

They lie to strangers about their addresses and the number of their children because they are illegally overcrowded. They fear eviction and make no complaints to landlords about high rents and disrepair, and the landlords in turn ask no questions.

Out of this housing comes disease, disorder and despair. Washington reaps the harvest by ranking first in the Nation in tuberculosis, venereal disease and infant mortality.

The Washington Negro feels that his poor housing is responsible in great part for overcrowded and resegregated schools and for crime.

In turn, he blames the whites for his poor housing. He has known about the racial restrictions of the suburbs and some sections of Washington, enforced by white attitudes with the support of real estate and loan practices. But today he feels it more than ever before and, more and more, he is inclined to do something about it.

White Washington may take pride in urban renewal and new freeways and luxury apartments and office buildings that are replacing lower priced dwellings in the city.

"We Fight Our Own"

But the Negro is apt to call urban renewal "Negro removal." He points out that Southwest Washington before urban renewal and redevelopment was two-third Negro and now is 9 per cent Negro.

"All the Southwest did was to move the slums over here," said one Negro homeowner in Northwest. "We have to fight our people now. It's choking the life out of us."

The Negro supports with reluctance, and after a bitter fight, the redevelopment plans for the Adams-Morgan area, now 44 per cent Negro.

These plans call for 1000 new luxury dwelling units, 425 moderate priced ones and 240 public housing units, and, if unchanged, will price half of the area's present 6000 Negroes out of the area.

The Negro supports the project only because the need for decent housing in Washington is so dire. Through the efforts of the Urban League, he is pressing the Redevelopment Land Agency to include more lower-priced units in the project and to provide a broader relocation program.

To the Negro, freeways simply demolish Negro homes so that whites can get to their all-white suburbs quicker.

Fair Housing Promised

The Negro concedes there is some hope that his housing problem will be relieved. In the city, the District Commissioners have promised to pass a fair housing ordinance by the end of the year. Real estate developer Morris Cafritz has endorsed the proposal and promised to open his apartments to all persons.

Neighbors, Inc., has been successful in stabilizing one Northwest area by convincing whites not to succumb to panic merchants when Negroes move into the area. Real estate values there have risen and not declined.

In the suburbs, some scattered Negro families have moved recently to Chevy Chase, Wheaton and other areas. More are bound to follow as the President's housing order shows results on new developments. And some whites have formed groups to prepare suburbanites for Negro residents.

The urgent question is whether these steps and other prospects toward easing the problem will develop at a fast enough pace to relieve the pressure the Negro feels.

The Washington Negro does not see his home as his castle. He sees it as his dungeon. He intends to break out.

After adequate and fair housing, the Negro gives priority status in drawing up his bill of rights to equal job opportunity. Tuesday's article will take up recent gains in wiping out job discrimination and why Negroes still feel frustrated in this field.

Summer of Discontent—III

8/13/63 W-Post

Job Picture Still Far From Rosy to Negroes Here

Third of a Series

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

Next to discrimination in housing, the Washington Negro usually places the field of employment at the top of his list of grievances.

The Negro concedes the facts, often raised by whites, that measurable progress has been made in job opportunities for Negroes in the Nation's Capital, that the Negro's median income here exceeds six other large eastern cities and that unemployment here is less than in comparable cities.

But the Negro points to other facts and statistics that mean more to him in this surging civil rights era:

The median income of Washington Negroes is 70 per cent of the whites'—the same difference as 20 years ago. Negro youths are four times likely to be unemployed than white youths. Negro college graduates earn two thirds the money that white graduates do. Negro families, which therefore must have more breadwinners than white families, still earn only 56 cents for each dollar earned by white families, and that figure is the same as 20 years ago.

Said Sterling Tucker, executive director of the Washington Urban League:

"The Negro in Washington—and everywhere else—is expected to live as well, eat as well, dress as well, educate his children as well and have a nice home on less money than whites.

"And even Negroes aren't that smart."

The Washington Negro has made major gains in the last 15 years in the area of employment, particularly in Government. But today he feels the pace is not fast enough. He feels a lack of momentum that adds to his frustration.

A Negro sociologist explains this impatience in terms of revolutions. Historically, a revolution never gets under way in full force until after the oppressor gives a taste of freedom to the oppressed, he said.

In Washington, progress in eliminating job discrimination has only served to whet the appetite of Negroes in knocking down remaining barriers. They feel that a key to improving their status is more money and they can get more money only if people will hire them for more and better jobs.

Washington is not a typical employment city. Government is the number one employer. Both the Federal and District governments have a nondiscrimination hiring policy. Thus, if a Negro secretary, for example, cannot get a job in private business, she can try to enter Government employment with reasonable prospects.

But Negroes feel their chances of promotion are considerably less than white Government employes. And they point to statistics which show that Negroes are scarce in the higher echelons.

Talk of progress doesn't impress this Grade 4 employe of the District Government who recounted how during his 15 years' service he had trained whites who have become his bosses.

"When I go through the frustrations of these maneuvers to keep me down because I'm a Negro, I feel like exploding," he said.

Another Negro recently retired as a Grade 5 after nearly 30 years' service as Government clerk. He, too, trained whites who rose to Grades 14 and 15. He is a bitter man.

Partly responsible for this summer of discontent in Washington are Negro college students in recess who feel their

See RACIAL, A4, Col. 2

RACIAL—From Page A1

Job Picture in District Still Far From Rosy to Negroes

Grade 3 or 5 parents would be Grade 9 or 11 if they were not Negroes. Proving discrimination in Government is a difficult task. Negroes point out that complaints in the Federal Government are often reviewed within the department by the supervisors who may be the source of the discrimination in the first place.

Private Firms Reluctant

Recognizing the validity of this argument, the District Government recently started a review procedure by investigators outside the departments involved.

But it is outside of Government employment that the real sore spots of job discrimination exist in Washington. The door of private employment is only slightly ajar; the Negro wants it open wide.

The traditional professions of Negroes—law, medicine and the clergy—still serve him well. Today, scientists, engineers and technicians are in demand and many Negroes are responding.

But major areas of discrimination remain in banks, savings institutions, real estate and insurance offices.

Banker's View

A Washington bank official talked sincerely about Negro employment to a member of the D. C. Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights. He conceded his bank employed no Negro tellers.

"But we are very proud of our Negro employes," he said. "I couldn't even open our bank each morning without George."

George, of course, was the janitor.

A major breakthrough for Negro employment has taken place in major downtown Washington department stores in the past two or three years. Woodward & Lothrop, Hecht's, Kann's, Lansburgh's and Garfinckel's all have hired Negro sales clerks. Utilities also are moving. The Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., for example, has a policy of hiring not only Negro operators but Negro women in positions of "exposure," such as receptionists.

"Tokenism" Deplored

But for the Negro, there is too much "tokenism" in Washington: One Negro is hired and the company boasts of being integrated.

Julius Hobson, the aggressive president of Washington CORE, told of his battles with a downtown shoe store to hire Negro salesmen.

"They have one Negro who, when a picket line is formed, is brought out of the stock room and put on the floor," Hobson told the D. C. Advisory Committee's special committee on equal employment. "When the picket line leaves, he goes back into the stock room."

Earlier this year, the spotlight of racial discrimination was thrown on the status trades of the construction unions — electricians, plumbers, steamfitters and rodmen — who for years have effectively banned Negroes from their crafts.

Protests Bring Results

Negro students at Howard University complained to the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity that they could see no Negroes working on construction of the new gymnasium which was being built with Federal funds.

The outcome, after threatened action by the Justice Department, was that the unions promised to take on some Negroes from a list of 200 applicants tested by the United States Employment Service.

The number of jobs that will become available in these trades is not great. But it was a symbolic victory for Negroes and showed their determination to wipe out job discrimination wherever it is found.

The D. C. Advisory Committee found that only one of 22 business schools in Washington admitted Negroes. Some schools said they maintained racial bars because they would not be able to place Negroes in jobs and therefore did not want to raise their hopes by accepting them.

Role of Job Agencies

The United States Employment Service will not supply job applicants to prospective employers who insist on racial bars. But private job agencies do, the Committee reported. This is an irritant to Negroes.

In its report to the U. S. Civil Rights Commission, the D. C. Advisory Committee reported on progress in job opportunities and the "widespread and substantial" discrimination remaining. It pinpointed the feeling of Negroes in this way:

"But for those who are being discriminated against, the question of how much discrimination exists is no longer central; the point that it exists at all is cause enough for anger."

Different Standards

More and more, Negroes are rejecting the familiar arguments by white employers that there is a lack of qualified Negro applicants for jobs. In too many cases, they feel, different standards exist for "qualified" whites and "qualified" Negroes. They feel that an employer who will have confidence only in a completely qualified Negro would be apt to take a chance with a less qualified white.

"If he is to help us, the white employer has got to gamble on the Negro as a job prospect," said Tucker of the Urban League.

There is logic to the argument that a qualified Negro labor force cannot be made suddenly available today after years of discrimination. It is this argument that has sparked the controversial proposal by Whitney Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, for a program of special treatment for Negroes to overcome the gap.

Washington school authorities told the D. C. Advisory Committee about the lack of motivation among Negro youths because of the feeling there are no job opportunities open to them. Labor Secretary W. Willard Wirtz reported, as an example, that nine of 14 Negro youngsters selected for an apprenticeship program failed to show up when instruction began.

"They just felt they didn't have a chance," Wirtz said.

The unemployment rate among 16- to 21-year-old Negroes is twice that of the population at large. School dropouts pose a problem. Perhaps they enter the service industries where there is no minimum wage and hours are long and Negroes are often paid less for the same job than whites. Or else they join the ranks of [illegible] which [illegible] volatile [illegible] ton's [illegible]

We [illegible] series [illegible] the idle Negro juvenile [illegible]

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Summer of Discontent IV

Jobs Erase Hostility Of Idle Negro Youths

8/14/63 W-Post

Fourth of a series.

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

The most volatile tinder lying around the Washington "powder keg" is the idle Negro juvenile.

The previously complacent Negro middle class is becoming involved in the movement against discrimination in jobs and housing. But Negro leaders see no racial violence or hatred coming from this class if the pace of progress and the feeling of momentum quickens.

Yet while the large Negro middle class is concerned with its absorption into society, the poverty class—and especially its idle youth—seems to be moving toward alienation from society.

The fact is that Washington's deprived young people are already at war.

In the eyes of teachers, police, court officials, Recreation Department roving leaders and others who work closely with the City's troubled youngsters, the war is not between the races.

It is a war against a society which has abused its youth.

To the resentment of Negroes, whites often interpret the increase in juvenile crime in Washington as a "Negro problem"—proof positive of the depravity of children with black skin.

These whites will use statistics to enforce their view. They point out, with accuracy, that most juvenile crime in the Nation's Capital is committed by Negro boys. Of the 2366 offenders referred to Juvenile Court by Washington police in fiscal 1962, less than 12 per cent were girls and less than 14 per cent were white.

Area restaurant case may provide test of Maryland's public accommodations law. Page A10.

But this is a poverty problem, not a racial one. Researchers for Washington Action for Youth, local arm of

See RACIAL, A5, Col. 1

RACIAL—From Page A1

Jobs Help Erase Hostility of Idle Negro Juveniles

the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency and Youth Crime, found that delinquency rates for white and Negro children in Washington were almost identical in neighborhoods where families lived in stark poverty.

It is not Negroes or whites but aimless, unwanted young people of both races who are the volatile tinder. Mixed with the proper ingredients, they could ignite the powder keg.

For example, a series of affrays was touched off in April when one white boy spat upon a group of Negroes during a baseball game at D. C. Stadium.

And in the case of the Thanksgiving Day Stadium riot which followed the victory of a white football team over a Negro one, it was a handful of rowdy Negro school dropouts who set off the fracas which pitted angry Negroes against whites.

Hoodlum Outbreak

In some quarters, the Stadium incidents have been looked upon as full-blown race riots. Yet investigators of the Thanksgiving Day melee, the special citizens committee headed by Shane McCarthy, stated that while the fracas loomed as a serious racial conflict, the hoodlums who went on the rampage "would have attacked supporters of any victorious team, including a predominantly Negro one."

If Washington's deprived young people are defiant, they have good reasons.

This has been vividly documented through a series of taped interviews with juveniles living within six blocks of the White House in Washington's infamous Second Precint. The interviews were conducted for the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency.

Listen to these neighbors of the President:

"He used to mess me up when I was 12," said Victor, toughest of the delinquents interviewed when recalling what life was like with a stepfather.

"Beat me up with no clothes on. Big wads of extension cord and all that . . .

"He hang me up by my wrists over a pipe . . ."

awaken them at 4 a. m. to fetch "a box of barbecue spareribs," of alcoholic parents who fight all night, of policemen knocking on their doors to determine if they saw "who bust who in the head" next door.

Adults are Enemies

In the eyes of these young people, adults soon are viewed as enemies. If these boys lack respect, it is because they never have been treated with respect.

Says 18-year-old Albert:

"Some people think that age makes a man, that a man won't start no fight, that the younger person more than they would have started the fight.

"But age do not make a man! If a teen-ager would go down the street and tell a policeman that a man robbed him, they would laugh at him. But let that man say a teen-ager robbed him, they'll tear the neighborhood apart to find that teen-ager."

Paul Fine, a Rutgers University sociologist who conducted the Second Precinct study, said the relationship of the Alberts to this city "resembles much more that of a combat infantry patrol in enemy territory than anything genuinely recognizable as that of children to their community."

Many Avoid Trouble

The fact that such children are delinquents is not surprising, Fine said: the surprising thing is that so many of them manage to keep out of serious trouble.

The crux of the matter was pinpointed by Jack R. Goldberg, project director for Washington Action for Youth.

"If adults of the Nation's Capital expect kids to join the system," he said, "the young people have to be given the opportunity to do so."

The real issue that must be faced, said Goldberg, is that too many families live in poverty amidst plenty and that "out of poverty, compounded by prejudice and racial discrimination, you destroy people and you destroy their potential."

Summer Jobs Help

There is a glimmer of hope. It was felt by a thousand of Washington's most deprived youngsters for the first time living within six blocks of the White House in Washington's infamous Second Precint. The interviews were conducted for the President's Committee on Juvenile Delinquency.

Listen to these neighbors of the President:

"He used to mess me up when I was 12," said Victor, toughest of the delinquents interviewed when recalling what life was like with a stepfather.

"Beat me up with no clothes on. Big wads of extension cord and all that . . .

"He hang me up by my wrists over a pipe . . ."

Too Much Punishment

Some whites, including Southern Congressmen, favor the return of corporal punishment to city schools as a solution to Washington's troublesome youth problems. Would that be a deterrent to Victor?

If anything, it has been too much punishment, not too little, that has caused Victor to roam the streets, robbing and assaulting those who got into the way.

Another cherished cure-all—the exclusion of difficult young people from schools while making no provision for them elsewhere — also would provide no answer for the Victors. They are already out of school. Listen to 17-year-old Victor:

"I don't work. I don't do nothing . . .

"I'm around the house all day long, get up about 1 p. m. clean up the house, play some records, listen to the radio, go out for a while."

"Lost Count" of Arrests

He has had "so many arrests I lost count."

It is such idle youth, living in poverty and ignorance, that make up the "social dynamite" in our midst.

While statistics show that the Washington Negro as an entity is better educated, better paid and lives in better housing than in any other major city in the country, other statistics show a shame of the Nation's Capital in the fact that this city falls below the national average in the percentage of 14 to 17-year-olds in school.

Exclusive of students looking for summer jobs, there are now 4100 out-of-school, out-of-work youngsters and the overwhelming majority are Negroes.

They have no steady employment because they have no skills. Most of them have been out of school two or three years.

School Gripes

Sometimes, these young people drop out of school because they view it as a prison. Elwood is 14 years old and was in school this year. Listen to his description of school and guess how long he will stay:

"If they don't like you they yell at you, and always want to get you in trouble. You don't do nothing and she (the teacher) say she know you did.

"Worst thing about school is it takes me so long before you go home— that's the worst thing. You stay too many hours at school, stay there and teachers don't let you go to the bathroom sometime, don't let you get a drink of water. Got to have a pass to go out."

Others lose interest in school work because they are just too tired to do the work.

They tell of mothers who

If adults of the National Capital expect kids to join the system," he said, "the young people have to be given the opportunity to do so."

The real issue that must be faced, said Goldberg, is that too many families live in poverty amidst plenty and that "out of poverty, compounded by prejudice and racial discrimination, you destroy people and you destroy their potential."

Summer Jobs Help

There is a glimmer of hope. It was felt by a thousand of Washington's most deprived youngsters for the first time this summer. It was provided by the Washington Action for Youth's summer job placement office.

First priority for the thousand jobs made available by Government and private industry went to teen-agers in families with incomes of less than $2785 annually.

Some of these youngsters came from homes where there are 10 or 12 children. They know what it means to go hungry, to sleep five to a bed, to be set out on the streets for not paying rent. For most of them, home is a hovel in a crime-ridden precinct. In their alleys, they constantly are exposed to violence—the winos fighting, cutting, killing.

At first, the wise youths on the street knew all about the program; it was going to be just another "do-gooders" project. They looked at it this way:

"Yeh, you would be put to work. But it would be a nothing job, paying nothing. Just a gimmick to try to get you off the streets."

"Gee, $1.98 an Hour!"

But then the word started to be filtered back. "This job program was different. You didn't mow lawns for some woman who gave you a lot of sass. You weren't standing in line all day for a job that lasted only a day. You weren't being told to do someone else's dirty work.

"Instead, you went to work in one of those big Government buildings or in private stores like Woodward & Lothrop. You got real pay—at least $1.25 an hour; as much as $1.98 an hour.

"Gee, $1.98 is more than your own father makes.

"And everyone was interested in seeing that you made good. Even the Attorney General—Robert F. Kennedy himself—talked to you and wrote you a letter.

"Man, how important can you get?"

The teen-age products of Washington's worst environment are doing exceptional work on these summer jobs. Except for a few isolated incidents, reports from both Government and private employers are extravagant in praising these boys and girls for both their eagerness to work and their capabilities for doing a responsible job.

The end of summer will mean the end of these jobs. Will it also mean the end of the hope and confidence and respect these youngsters have found? Time will tell. Sponsors are making every effort to interest these young people in school and training during the winter.

Washington Negroes frequently express resentment against their treatment at the hands of the police. Thursday's article will examine this problem.

Summer of Discontent—V

Negro-Police Hostility Is Less but Remnants Of Old Habits Remain

W-Post 8/15/63

Fifth of a Series

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

In discussing Washington's racial patterns and problems, the Negro leader sooner or later talks about the Metropolitan Police Department.

He tells about the resentment that many Negroes feel toward the police. He cites complaints of rudeness, overbearing attitudes, brutality and the use of dogs.

He feels that the Police Department discriminates against the Negro policeman in its hiring and promotion practices. He has the impression that Police Chief Robert V. Murray" plays fottsie" with Southern Congressmen on Capitol Hill to get what he wants and thus the Southern Congressmen really command the police force and forge its policies.

All of these things, the Negro leader says, have contributed to a lack of respect for the Police Department among many Negroes, and lack of respect can cause trouble.

No one knows this better than District officials and the Police Department itself. Recently, Murray has taken administrative steps that show a promise of vast improvement in relations between the police and the Negro community.

Several years ago, police relations with Negroes in Washington were marked by cases of brutality, dragnet arrests and illegal detentions. Hardly an established Negro leader in Washington today has not had some unpleasant encounter with the police of yesteryear. Some of the hostility of those days has been carried over to today.

Some of the cases of police rudeness as published in current issues of the Washington Afro American newspaper would have seemed ridiculous in by-gone years. But they are not ridiculous now.

As part of the surging civil rights movement everywhere, the Washington Negro is demanding an end to remnants of the old police way of doing things. He insists on impartial police treatment and serv-

See RACIAL, A17, Col. 1

Law Enforcement

RACIAL—From Page A1

Negro-Police Hostility Is Less But Many Old Habits Remain

ice. And some of the police officers are having a hard time keeping pace.

On a recent Friday night, a police official visited a restaurant packed with Negroes who were relaxing, eating and drinking beer. He was the only white person there.

The officer was proud that he knew the names of nearly every person there and he walked from table to table and smiled and engaged in chit-chat. After a few minutes, he moved to the door, waved and left.

A Negro who was at the restaurant said later that the people there hated the officer's guts, they were cowed by his presence and he did not earn their respect with his condescending manner.

"He simply was a symbol of the white man in blue, the cop who doesn't respect Negroes and whom Negroes don't respect," the Negro said.

Feels Resentment

"If that man had been jumped on by some hoodlum outside that place, I think the people there might have just stood by and watched him get beaten. They've seen policemen beat Negroes."

The police official, a perceptive man, felt the Negro resentment in the restaurant. He in turn resented the rejection of his effort to improve relations.

In several precincts, the police captains have done a splendid job in human relations. Negroes acknowledge it. The Department is proud of it.

For example, the 14th Precinct in Northeast Washington across the Anacostia River has had a succession of commanding officers who have practiced good human relations themselves and have enforced policies down through the ranks.

Captain Vernon H. Culpeper of the 14th is carrying on the successful pattern established before him by Howard F. Mowry and George E. Causey, now Inspectors. Negroes feel they get a fair shake in the 14th; few complaints come from there.

Inspector Causey, who now specializes in community relations for the Police Department, continues to hold the respect of Negroes. So does Deputy Chief George R. Wallrodt, who handles civil disturbances.

There is an all too typical

Team of 6 Reporters Prepared D. C. Series

A team of six reporters of The Washington Post collaborated in preparing this seven-part series, "Summer of Distontent," a depth study of race relations in Washington. It was written by Staffer Robert E. Baker, The Washington Post's specialist in race relations reporting. Participating were Eve Edstrom on welfare and youth problems, Rasa Gustaitis on housing, Wallace Terry on Negro leadership attitudes, Alfred Lewis on police matters, and Jean White on employment.

at the white man in the blue uniform and declares:

"I haven't done anything. I'm not bothering anybody. I'm not going home."

The officer has been taught that proper police procedure forbids an initial showing of softness toward a balky subject; he must first show firm authority, then softness if applicable.

"Go home, boy, I said," responds the policeman and grabs Jackson's arm. But construction workers are strong and Jackson grabs the policemen and gets him down on the sidewalk.

The call goes out. Policeman in trouble.

Everything on wheels that the Police Department can muster responds, sirens wailing, careening through the streets. As the reinforcements arrive, a crowd gathers. The police try to pry Jackson loose from the officer but by now Jackson is scared. He won't let go. The police use their clubs and blackjacks on Jackson as other policemen push back the crowd.

The Negroes did not see the beginning of the incident. They carry away from the scene the picture of white policemen beating a prostrate Negro, a picture of police brutality. They see a bleeding Jackson being led to a police car.

"All right, break it up, break it up. It's all over," they are told.

But it isn't all over. This incident, so very common, is seared in the minds of the Negroes.

Police Contention

The police contend there is nothing racial there. If a white man gets a policeman police jobs and the failure of the Department to enforce desegregation at all levels.

430 Negro Policemen

Negroes comprise 57 per cent of Washington's population today but only 15 per cent of the personnel in the Metropolitan Police Department—some 430 out of nearly 3000 policemen. Ten years ago, when the force was nearly 1000 men smaller, there were 224 Negro policemen or 10 per cent.

Of the 147 top police jobs today—from the Chief down through the deputy chiefs, inspectors, captains and lieutenants—only three are held by Negroes and they are lieutenants. Ten years ago, there was one Negro lieutenant in the top echelon.

Negroes complain that some captains can, and do, hinder promotions for Negro policemen by giving them detrimental efficiency ratings which weigh heavily in the promotion procedure. The Police Department contends, however, that the system is absolutely fair and free of racial discrimination.

The Department also denies there is any discrimination in recruitment although it takes no initiative to find Negro applicants. There simply are not enough qualified Negro aplicants the Department contends.

Nor are there enough white applicants from the area, the Department says, and recruiting must be carried on outside of the city. Negroes often complain that Washington's police force has a "Southern accent" and that white policemen are recruited from the Deep South. The Department denies this and points out that only four policemen on the force are from Alabama, for example.

Negroes have pressed for integrated scout cars. They feel that police encounters with Negroes would have fewer racial overtones if Negro-white teams of officers were doing the arresting and investigating.

Whites Veto Partners

In the past, Chief Murray has refused to require such integration. He allowed white scout car men to veto the assignment of Negroes to their cars. The Chief contended that each member of a scout car team must have complete confidence in the other because their lives may depend on it, tht involuntary integration would cause friction and loss of confidence.

from there.

Inspector Causey, who now specializes in community relations for the Police Department, continues to hold the respect of Negroes. So does Deputy Chief George R. Wallrodt, who handles civil disturbances.

There is an all too typical incident which helps spark hostility between Negroes and police. It happens every Friday and Saturday night in any of a half dozen or so precincts. It happens like this:

A Negro construction worker, whom we shall assign the name Bill Jackson, finishes up his hard work week and buys a bottle of wine to relax. He is walking up the street, staggering a bit, with the wine bottle sticking out of his pocket, when he meets a white policeman.

Addressed as 'Boy'

"Hey, boy," said the policeman in a firm voice, "you'd better get yourself home. You're drunk."

The policeman's use of the word "boy" ten years ago would not have gotten the response it gets now. Negroes have generally regarded such terms as degrading, insulting, but today they openly make clear their resentment of its use.

Jackson bristles. He looks break it up. It's all over, they are told.

But it isn't all over. This incident, so very common, is seared in the minds of the Negroes.

Police Contention

The police contend there is nothing racial there. If a white man gets a policeman down and does not let go, he too will feel the club and blackjack.

Whisky drinking by juveniles deeply concerns many Negro leaders who are mindful that half-pints were in evidence among young Negroes as well as adults at the Thanksgiving Day melee at D. C. Stadium. These leaders tend to criticize police for not stopping illicit after-hour sales of half-pints which find their way into the hands of juveniles.

Negroes have the impression that police respond to calls for assistance or investigation faster in white neighborhoods than in Negro. One Negro leader recalls he was incensed when he called police to report that kids were sledding down Roosevelt High School hill into heavy traffic and the dispatcher asked him: "Are they white or colored?"

Particularly irritating to Negroes are the relatively few numbers of Negroes holding integration. He allowed white scout car men to veto the assignment of Negroes to their cars. The Chief contended that each member of a scout car team must have complete confidence in the other because their lives may depend on it, tht involuntary integration would cause friction and loss of confidence.

Last month, Chief Murray issued a new order to encourage his commanding officers to make assignments without regard to race. By issuing the order, Murray took a step on neutral ground.

Previously, a white policeman could avoid being assigned with a Negro by simply indicating his unwillingness or displeasure in advance. Now, the issignment is made and the white policeman, if he still objects, must file his complaint against an accomplished fact.

In Washington, young policemen are trained and taught by old policemen on the precinct level, a practice which, critics contend, means that old timers teach outdated race relations.

Changes in the integration and human relations in the Metropolitan Police Department must come from the top and Chief Murray in the past has shown a reluctance to move any faster than he must.

D. C. Heads Reluctant

The District Commissioners are reluctant to order Murray to launch a sweeping program of integration because they respect the Chief's skill as a professional policeman and they dislike interfering with a pro. And Chief Murray seems to have more influence with Congress, especially with the Southern Congressmen than do the Commissioners.

For 10 years, the Police Department has been plagued by a massive turnover of personnel which has now dropped off and the Department has gained considerable stability. A human relations course has been launched for new policemen.

The Crime Council system is now getting under way. Each precinct has such a council, comprised of church and civic leaders, businessmen and school principals, which meets once a month with the precinct captains and thrashes out problems and complaints.

Problem of Dogs

The Department is making efforts to reduce the racial symbolism of police dogs. The animals, first introduced as a deterrent, have become the symbol of everything the Negro feels is wrong with the Police Department

Few observers will deny that the Metropolitan Police Department is changing for the better in the human relations field and that the change will continue. The question is the pace. The Department must keep pace of the civil rights movement in the Nation's Capital if it is to overcome the resentment felt by too many of the city's citizens.

Friday's article will deal with the confusion and friction caused by the competition among Washington Negro leaders for influence, support and dollars.

Summer of Discontent—VII

Covert Segregation Galls D. C. Negroes

Last of Series

By Robert E. Baker

Staff Reporter

The Negro in Washington has come a long way in a short time without explosive racial turmoil.

It was only a decade ago that he lived in a traditionally and legally segregated city. Almost overnight, this changed.

Washington desegregated public accommodations in 1953 and, the following year, its schools. The city therefore escaped the massive sit-ins and demonstrations and violence which erupted elsewhere when Negroes pressed for desegregation of these facilities.

During the past decade, Washington Negroes have made considerable progress in District and Federal employment and significant inroads in the selling trades, public utilities and other areas of employment previously barred to them.

In comparative terms, Negroes in Washington are generally better educated, better paid and live in better housing than in any other major city in the Nation.

Aug. 28 rights rally at Lincoln Memorial to include entertainment, skit and brief speeches.

Page A5.

Yet the Washington Negro tends to feel more segregated today than yesteryear even when he could exercise fewer civil rights. There are rising

See RACIAL, A30, Col. 1

RACIAL—From Page A1

Covert Segregation Irks Negro

unrest and militancy in the Negro community.

This feeling is nurtured by the frustrations that Negroes face in the sophisticated discrimination which remains after legal and overt barriers fall. It matures in the fall-out that is received in the Nation's Capital from the growing civil rights bursts around the country.

The Negro demands an end to housing shortages, limited job opportunities, the problems of slums. He sees symbols of discrimination everywhere—the all-white suburbs, his hand-me-down churches that whites have fled, the overcrowded and over-aged schools that are now resegregated.

The Negro concedes the door to full equality is ajar. He demands that it open wide.

Into this restive scene have come the voices of extremists. Malcolm X came down from his Black temple in Harlem and brought his anti-white racist doctrine.

In May, Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D-NY) told 3000 Washington Negroes that the city faced "one of the worst race riots in the history of the United States" if conditions did not improve quickly. The Washington Afro American newspaper, under the now-departed editor C. Sumner Stone, also predicted a race riot here.

Most Washington Negro leaders do not believe there will be a race riot here nor do they approve of such predictions.

Yet, despite the fact that many of them had been criticized in print by Stone for "lethargic" and "inept" leadership, nearly all of Washington's Negro leaders attended a dinner rally for Stone's benefit. Some attended because it was a place and time to be seen in evidence.

Their attendance also showed a prevalent Negro attitude: They might not make inflammatory statements themselves, but they nevertheless felt it was well that someone made them, thereby airing the growing discontent.

Anti-White Sentiment

Emerging for the first time among Washington Negroes is a tinge of anti-white and anti-Semitic feeling. It is not deep nor is it widespread. It represents the Negro rebellion against his status. As President James M. Nabrit, Jr., of Howard University says:

"In the Negro's gyrations at the moment, he is just attacking everybody. But if we're going to embrace racial discrimination against anybody, we're lost."

The whites of Washington took an initial pride in the gentle and honorable way that the city desegregated public accommodations and schools a decade ago.

Today, in a reaction to increased militancy and demands among Negroes, there is a feeling that things have not worked out so well.

ad 4 RACIAL—Sun .....

Many whites tend to reject the notion that crime has social and economic roots, and look upon Washington crime as "Negro" crime. Prevalent white attitudes support good housing for Negroes, but not next door; good jobs for Negroes but not at the expense of whites.

Whites are telling the Negro how far he has come; Negroes are telling whites how far they have to go.

Baker Mrs. Edstrom Terry

Miss Gustaitis Miss White Lewis

This is the team of six reporters for The Washington Post who collaborated in preparing the 7-part series, "Summer of Discontent," a depth study of race relations in Washington. It was written by staff member Robert E. Baker, The Washington Post's specialist in race relations, at left in top panel. Participating were Eve Edstrom on welfare and youth problems; Wallace Terry on Negro leadership attitudes; Rasa Gustaitis on housing; Jean White on employment, and Alfred Lewis on police matters.

Many whites have reacted with a hardening attitude to this increased Negro militancy. There seems to be some alienation between the white and Negro community.

The white man—who has also come a long way in the past decade—often tosses a challenge to Washington Negro leader: Why don't you urge responsibilities as well as demands, why don't you exhort your followers to help themselves as well as ask for help?

Negro leaders are conscious of this and have moved in this direction. Ministers report increased interest in the Urban League's "Future for Jimmy" program and educational television. Hospitality House operated by Nadine Winter is helping newcomers help themselves and adjust to urban living.

Howard University is offering, through its Youth Center planning, teaching, research and demonstration projects aimed at helping unwed mothers, families without husbands, delinquents, school drop-outs and Negroes needing housing relocation.

Often the white man will ask: Just what is it the Washington Negro wants?

Perhaps never before in the Nation's history has this question received the attention that it is getting now, in all sections, in all walks of life, through all communications media.

In a recent intensive analysis of national Negro attitudes, Newsweek magazine answered the question by stating most Negroes want what they now lack.

In this series of articles the Washington Post has attempted to report the Washington Negro's attitudes and demands and irritations.

His grievances come big and little.

His feeling of housing and job discrimination top the list of big grievances. He worries about the school drop-outs and idle Negro youth who fall into crime and may form the basis of a future generation of trouble.

Resegregation of the schools is a symbolic irritant to him, the result of housing and employment restrictions which confine him to the city. He is more concerned with overage schools and textbooks and the large number of temporary teachers who seem to remain on for years.

He objects to the vestiges of yesteryear—some abusive policemen, some bus drivers, some store clerks.

Perhaps Sterling Tucker, executive director of the Urban League, puts his finger on the point when, as a Negro, he tells what the Washington Negro wants:

"We want the stigma of race removed. We're tired of carrying every other Negro on our backs. And every Negro in America carries every other Negro on his back.

"The reason that Ralph Bunche couldn't get into a white tennis club or Carl Rowan into the Cosmos Club is because, for the moment his application came up, he was looked on like every other Negro—whether he be a criminal or poor Mississippi sharecropper.

"His qualifications meant nothing. It adds up to this: Ralph Bunche can't be free until the lowliest Negro sharecropper in Mississippi is free."

In the present situation, the Washington Negro can be expected to be oversensitive. He will see racial discrimination in instances where none exists, much as some American Jews of a generation ago, fighting anti-Semitism, saw it everywhere.

An example in point is the case of Frank D. Reeves, the respected NAACP attorney who was nominated by President Kennedy to be Washington's first Negro Commissioner. The nomination was withdrawn when it was found that Reeves had not filed his Federal income taxes on time. Most Washington Negroes felt that the tax liens would have been no barrier if Reeves had been white.

Yet the White House recently dropped consideration of James M. Landis, former dean of the Harvard Law School, for appointment to a high Federal office, perhaps the Cabinet, because he had failed to file income taxes.

This is a critical time for race relations in the Nation's Capital. The Washington metropolitan area has perhaps the best opportunity of all the big cities to meet it successfully for this community has the biggest concentration of well-educated people with the highest median income in the Nation, white and black.

Challenge to Washington

This community must decide now whether it intends to meet the challenge with the good sense and good will that has been shown, for example, in Greensboro, N. C., or whether it will become, like Danville, Va., a place of bitterness and defeat.

Last week, Chairman David L. Lawrence of the President's Committee on Equal Opportunity in Housing urged a group of Washington area builders to adopt open housing policies.

He said that what is happening in Washington and stirring in other parts of the country cannot be wished away or put aside for future attention. The drive will intensify and the barriers will come down, he said.

How effectively and easily this is done depends upon attitudes and decisions both of individuals and leaders, he said, adding that the eyes of the Nation are focused on Washington.

Lawrence was speaking of housing but his words apply to the civil rights drive in general.

As it enters this period, Washington already has a failure and a success on the record.

The failure was the melee that followed the annual Thanksgiving Day high school football game at D. C. Stadium last year, that, racial or not, awakened Washington and the Nation to the problem at hand.

The success was the ease and good will, shown by both whites and Negroes, that accompanied the civil rights demonstration by 3000 persons at the District Building on June 14. White and Negro leaders, the Stadium riot seared in their minds, had feared that turmoil and violence might break out. They share the same concern as Aug. 28 approaches, the date of the national civil rights march in Washington, the next big test for the city.

Vital questions are posed for Washington as it enters the challenge of the months ahead:

Will Washington Negroes accept the leadership that has brought them this far or will they turn to the extremists?

Will whites accept the challenge with good-will accommodation or will they engage in a bitter fight for the status quo?

In other words, will future historians record that Washington made a successful transition with peace and pride, or will they record a failure that was marked by turmoil or violence?

Military Chiefs Ask New A-Tests in Sky

SEE MARGUERITE HIGGINS' STORY ON PAGE 3

NEW YORK

Herald Tribune

THE LATE CITY

Established 123 Years Ago. A European Edition Is Published Daily in Paris

230 West 41st Street, New York 36, N. Y.
Telephone PEnnsylvania 6-4000

TUESDAY, APRIL 30, 1963

© 1963, New York Herald Tribune Inc.

TEN-CENTS

ELIJAH MUHAMMAD SPEAKS—above his gilt-decorated hat the invariable motto, "There Is No God But Allah, Muhammad Is His Apostle." Not just the admirers before him but 20 million Negroes in America listen. But in white society he is practically unknown. Now, Robert S. Bird, National Correspondent of the Herald Tribune and the first white reporter ever to interview "The Divinely Inspired Messenger of Allah," has written a portrait of the man, his message and his influence. Directly or subtly, for the 150,000 who devoutly believe and for the others who do not, he is making the most persuasive statement of what is wrong in America—White America. He is making the mass of Negroes prouder of their race, their color. His Black Muslim propoganda, without question, is forcing all civil rights organizations and even Negro politicans to take another step toward harder, more extreme positions. His preachings are loosening Negro ties to Christianity—not through conversion to Allah but through impatience with Christian slowness on segregation. This man's power is felt the breadth of the land and by every person treated in the series "Ten Negroes" which Mr. Bird begins today.

TEN NEGROES

By Robert S. Bird
Herald Tribune National Correspondent

After our interview Elijah Muhammad, leader of the Black Muslims, took me out from the living room through the kitchen into the high-walled courtyard of his winter home in Phoenix, and we stood under the Arizona sun while he said a gracious goodbye to me.

Brother Antonne X had gone to the garage to back the Cadillac out and drive me back to my hotel. I thanked Mr. Muhammad for giving me this unprecedented interview, and I mentioned that I felt he had spoken very forcefully.

This was an understatement, really, for never in my life had I heard the white race—my race—so unmercifully flayed, so thoroughly accused, so vividly denounced, so damned in judgment as from him during the

By Robert S. Bird

Herald Tribune National Correspondent

After our interview Elijah Muhammad, leader of the Black Muslims, took me out from the living room through the kitchen into the high-walled courtyard of his winter home in Phoenix, and we stood under the Arizona sun while he said a gracious goodbye to me.

Brother Antonne X had gone to the garage to back the Cadillac out and drive me back to my hotel. I thanked Mr. Muhammad for giving me this unprecedented interview, and I mentioned that I felt he had spoken very forcefully.

This was an understatement, really, for never in my life had I heard the white race—my race—so unmercifully flayed, so thoroughly accused, so vividly denounced, so damned in judgment, as from him during the preceding hour and a half.

Still, he had displayed an exquisite courtesy throughout the long declamation, glancing at me in a kindly way every now and then as I sat beside him on the couch, or giving me a questioning look as if to see how I was taking it. But most of his excoriation seemed addressed to the middle of the living room, as if that were where white America might be listening.

THE CHARGES

He is small and fragile of figure, this man who is regarded by many law enforcement officers as the most dangerous Negro leader in the country. And standing there in the courtyard in well cut dark gray suit, gray and white bow tie of smooth design and dark, stylishly narrow-brimmed hat, he looked like an unobtrusive man of importance.

Brother Antonne X, in snow-white suit or uniform (I couldn't tell which), maneuvered the sleek car up beside us and Mr. Muhammad gave a warm, almost shy, smile and said he had enjoyed my visit. Then, speaking in a voice so low I had to lean over to catch his words, he volunteered an interesting explanation of himself.

"You see, I am between life and death," he said, "and I have to say these things in the way I say them. There was a time when I had no knowledge of them. But they have been revealed to me, and now Allah would punish me if I did not say them."

I had sought this interview with the 65-year-old Mr. Muhammad because his preaching is touching, influencing or exciting the whole Negro world in this country, including those who are his severest critics.

Nobody can laugh him off. For even though his devoted formal following is hardly more than a small fraction of the 20 million American Negroes, his harsh message is helping to change the inner feeling and the scene of Negro America.

THE DENIALS

In my visit with him we talked for a good four hours in two sessions spread over two days. The first session of about an hour and a half was given over to my questions and his answers. In the second one I asked him a few more questions and he answered at length. Then, at my suggestion that he describe in his own way, without interruption from me, his view of the race situation in the United States and the place of the Black Muslim movement in it, he embarked on his declamatory monologue of about an hour.

The total interview dealt, first of all, with the charges made that he preaches hatred and violence against the white people—

The charges that he has organized within his movement a highly disciplined household guard or militia—

The charges that he teaches "black supremacy" and "segregation" of the whites—

The charges that he teaches that the white people are inferior and that all are inherently "devils"—

The charges that he is advocating insurrection in the future, and destruction of the white race, and domination by the Negro population in this country by 1970.

More on TEN NEGROES—P 10

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

To most of these accusations he gave denials, with explanations of why the charges were being made against him. But to that relating to the devilish nature of the white people he offered a regretful theological explanation as to why it was true, and he detailed supporting grievances to prove it, in chilling language.

He discussed the future possibility—but only a possibility, he insisted—of involving the Black Muslim movement in political voting, perhaps even in the next Presidential election.

He made it clear that there is absolutely no possibility in his view for any integration of the white and black races, or even a living together side by side in the long range future. Total physical separation in different territory and total independence for the Negroes are a "must," he said, and he described how this might be brought about at an unspecified time ahead.

He spoke pityingly about the various "foolish" Negro leaders, such as Dr. Martin Luther King jr., who are active on the scene today, and he described the Black Muslim elementary schools and "university" and its stores and other businesses in Chicago, Detroit and other places.

He dealt with what he calls the failures of Christianity in the Negro world, and he went deeply into his religion of Islam and the sacred nature and uniqueness of the black race, which he teaches was the "original" race from which the inferior white race was developed.

His Black Muslim preaching is spread through the Negro world largely by his own tabloid newspaper, Muhammad Speaks, published in Chicago, and by a column of his writings in certain Negro weekly newspapers, and his rare public appearances at Black Muslim meetings and rallies which have drawn audiences on special occasions of up to 10,000 persons.

But his message is being effectively relayed to even bigger audiences, perhaps, by his young "traveling minister," Malcolm X, an exceedingly articulate and forceful speaker who has gained a great deal of television "exposure" during the past year.

THE TAPING

Mr. Muhammad himself (his followers generally call him "mister") has shunned the spotlight and avoided interviews with white news men, and has stayed pretty much within the inner circles of his ministers and followers. He makes his headquarters in Chicago, but passes more and more time now in Arizona because of his severe asthma.

In this series of articles aimed at developing some new and perhaps deeper insights into the thoughts and feelings of Negroes, I had wanted to get a first-hand impression of this influential figure who is the earthly fount of the Black Muslim philosophy.

Through certain Negro intermediaries I arranged to speak with him in Phoenix by long distance telephone from New York, and he agreed to a two-hour interview in his home there.

I asked him if I might bring a tape recorder with me, and he instantly replied:

"That will be all right—because I will have one, too."

A few days later a Phoenix taxicab driver dropped me off at a little single-level, suburban-type brick house with red tile roof and a pretty, clipped lawn with newly planted flower border. The place was about 15 minutes' drive from downtown Phoenix in a very spruce, middle class Negro residential section.

I pressed the door bell, which had a white crescent insignia of Islam on the button, and a tall, stern Negro man in white opened the door. He turned out later to be Brother Antonne X, who is altogether friendly when you get to know him. He was expecting me, and passed me straight into the living room.

Mr. Muhammad was standing there waiting, and he came forward with a little smile and a handshake. He was gentle but a trifle stiff at first. Brother Antonne took a chair beside him and watched everything with an eagle eye.

We immediately went to work setting up our tape re-

WHITE SYMPATHIZERS—George Lincoln Rockwell, center, leader of the American Nazi Party, and a pair of his lieutenants sit up front as special guests at a giant rally of Black Muslims in Washington. Minority groups tend to lean toward one another in order to gain greater public attention, so in spite of the Muslims' desire to cut themselves off from white America, Muhammad's movement attracts "hate" affiliates like these home-grown Nazis, and his message is changing posture of Negroes.

London Sunday Times photos

IN THEIR HANDS—A white American Nazi, guest of the Muslims at a fund-raising meeting in Washington, sits alongside two Negro followers of Elijah Muhammad. One with strong, judo-trained fingers tightly clutched and the other holding a paper bucket into which the believers will toss their dollar bills for the ever-growing war chest. The Muslims wait, calmly and quietly, apparently within the law—for Allah's announcement of Armageddon. Hard core membership is about 5,000 to 6,000.

repeatedly that this was not done in the movement, that it was severely prohibited and would be punished. Speaking of a demonstration with strongly worded "police state" picket signs which I had witnessed on Fifth Avenue in front of Rockefeller Plaza, which was carried out with astonishing suddenness, efficiency and discipline, he commented:

"Well, I didn't see the signs but I heard that there were some protests made against the arrest of the innocent Brothers, and that's no more than natural; because the charge made against them they could not have been guilty of, because there were no such arms among the Brothers while they were in their meeting. That is absolutely prohibited, and they are not supposed to allow any one to come in with arms on them at the meetings.

"If that happens the guards or searchers will be also punished for allowing arms to enter the meeting, especially when it is at a stationary place."

Mr. Muhammad talks in a somewhat high voice and tends to falter at times, but when he gets emotional the words flow from him rather dramatically and far more easily. He got a little emotional over the police interference with the Black Muslim temple meetings in Los Angeles.

The leader's disclaimer of teaching black supremacy and segregation seemed to be more semantic than actual. In any case, when I asked him about this—and whether his teachings were not in one sense rather similar to the white supremacy and segregationist teachings of the white Citizens Councils of the South, he replied:

"Allah has revealed that the black man is the Original Man, and that's what I teach. Now where this supremacy teaching comes in, that is charged by the disbelievers—that I teach it in order to suit their particular purpose of charging us with being an aggressive movement, or intending to become such, because of the teachings of one being superior over the other."

THE 'BLAME'

He elaborated on this at length, adding:

"We say that the black man is the first man in the sun, and then they take this and just change it around—that he is teaching supremacy. And that, we are not doing. We already know that we are inferior to you here in Amer-

Meredith and his success in getting into the University of Mississippi with the help of the United States Army.

"Poor fellow," Mr. Muhammad said, "trying to force himself in a school where it is 100 per cent white, and they're telling him they don't want him. And then the Army is standing around trying to force him in there—that's their crazy idea. I wouldn't want the Army to think about coming to help me against a white man, to allow me to come into his house or in the school or his restaurant, or anything else that he owns.

"If you tell me, I don't want you here, that's sufficient. I'm gone."

He said that "our people" would make room for the Muslims "but not for people like Mr. King and Meredith and other leaders who are yet ignorant of the knowledge of themselves."

"They will not accept them," he said, "because they don't have the knowledge of self, and therefore they hate self. They don't have as much love for self as they think they have; they don't have love for themselves if they want to let a strong people swallow them up."

Knowledge of self is a big aim in the Black Muslim teaching, and among other things it means to Mr. Muhammad a "cleaning up" of his people. He puts it this way:

THE MORALITY

"I am not so foolish a teacher to teach my followers to go and force the white man to allow us to become equal members of his society without cleaning up my people and making them self-respecting first. They must be qualified to demand even a black independent society.

"Therefore I start at the root of the matter. Go clean yourself up and show the world that you have self-respect, and seek education wherever you can get it, and make yourself equal with the civilized society of the earth, and they will accept you.

"Otherwise you are a dog in the society, or you are a rejected human being or beings in the society of the world, and I don't blame them. If you are not qualified and not their equal, stay out of it."

Cleaning up also means a rigorous morality characterized by modesty in women's dress and also by learning to asking. We can't get along with you in peace, you don't want us in peace.

"If we sit over there in that house across the street, peaceful all day and all night, after a while that worries you. You will send someone around to see what is going on over there in that house. 'I don't ever see them, looks like they're doing nothing over there. Go on over there and see. I never hear what they're planning. Maybe they're planning something over there.'

"It's the white man's way of starting trouble. Breaking the peace of people by interfering with their peace. We're not sitting over there in that house planning anything, but are trying to plan peace for the house."

The Black Muslims, though forbidden by Mr. Muhammad to use weapons, are taught self-defense and to fight back if molested.

"In a case where the person will not accept this and he wants to fight, and he pounces upon us, sometimes without even warning us, we want our own men and women and our girls to learn to try to protect themselves the best they can in case of attack.

"But in the case of the so-called American Negro we have nothing to fight back with. If you come to the door shooting, we have no guns here to shoot back, so therefore the right is with God, as it is written in the Book. He will defend us if we believe in Him and trust Him, and we're not going to start fighting with any one to have Him to defend us. But if we are attacked we depend on Him to defend us because He has stripped us."

Mr. Muhammad's teaching about a separate territory for the American Negroes is open to negotiation, he indicated. He said, "They use this teaching of separation as something that we plan to make war, or cause insurrection in the country for even talking about it, and that it's out of place because we can't solve the problem by separation."

Here's what he says on that subject:

"The American white man is not going to move out of his estate to give to the so-called Negroes. We are not asking you to do any such thing. No, only unless you prevent our going to our own. If you are going to prevent us from going to our own, or back where we came from, where you found us, okay, then give us a place here to ourselves.

THE TERRITORY

speak with him in Phoenix by long distance telephone from New York, and he agreed to a two-hour interview in his home there.

I asked him if I might bring a tape recorder with me, and he instantly replied:

"That will be all right—because I will have one, too."

A few days later a Phoenix taxicab driver dropped me off at a little single-level, suburban-type brick house with red tile roof and a pretty, clipped lawn with newly planted flower border. The place was about 15 minutes' drive from downtown Phoenix in a very spruce, middle class Negro residential section.

I pressed the door bell, which had a white crescent insignia of Islam on the button, and a tall, stern Negro man in white opened the door. He turned out later to be Brother Antonne X, who is altogether friendly when you get to know him. He was expecting me, and passed me straight into the living room.

Mr. Muhammad was standing there waiting, and he came forward with a little smile and a handshake. He was gentle but a trifle stiff at first. Brother Antonne took a chair beside him and watched everything with an eagle eye.

We immediately went to work setting up our tape recorders, and I quickly discovered that the leader of the Black Muslims was a most considerate host, for he fretted a little to make sure that I was in a comfortable place and that all was well for going ahead.

Actually we ended up sitting side by side on a big, soft, curved green couch, with my recorder on a glass coffee table and his on a side table.

He watched politely to see that we synchronized the start of our tapes, and then we were off.

THE VIOLENCE

The thing that is most worrisome about the Black Muslims to most white people who follow their activities is the hatred and violence that seems to emanate from the movement. Mr. Muhammad denies preaching either, but there appears to be a distinction between his tough talk against white treatment of the Negroes and anything suggesting the possibility of overt violence by the Black Muslims. As to this last, here is what he told me—and rather impassionedly, too:

"We are not going to take part in any violence whatsoever. We're not going to do anything other than what we are doing. That is trying to deliver the truth to our people and teach them that they are supposed to be Muslims, and that means they are supposed to be righteous people and that we have shed off all things that pertain to wickedness.

"We have stripped ourselves of harm to let you know that we are not people of violence. We don't intend to attack you. We have no idea or knowledge of anything like that coming in the future. Because if we attacked you we would have to have superior weapons to attack you with, and we don't have factories, nor earth to dig metals to manufacture tools or weapons such as you have.

"All this is your own creation, and therefore if we would get some of this you would have to let us have it—and you would not give me a gun to shoot you with. Therefore, God forbid us even to accept weapons, and even to carry anything like weapons to fight with. Because to fight is with Him, and you are not with us."

I asked Mr. Muhammad why, in view of this, a part of his movement was organized as a military unit. I referred to the so-called "Fruit of Islam," a contingent of husky finely trained young Negroes who are, in the opinion of some law enforcement officers, seemingly the cadre for a potential Black Muslim militia.

"The Fruit of Islam means the first converts to Islam here in America, and the first people to be cleaned and made fit to be called Muslims," he answered.

"And their training is on this basis, as being Muslims, to keep in practice; not just say it is their faith or belief. You must put into practice the principles of Islam that you believe in, and serve as an example for others who would accept Islam.

"They take physical training and exercises in many ways to keep physically fit and healthy and to try to get away from many of the physical ailments that they have suffered long before coming into the knowledge of Islam.

"And trained into the knowledge of what the aims and purposes of Islam is for. It is to clean up a people who are not clean, morally as well as spiritually, in America; and to make them fit to become good members of the society."

A little later in connection with this discussion he added:

"I notice that the white people are very keen and alert about who teaches us and what is being taught us. Well, I don't say that I would not do the same if I had brought up a people subjected to slavery under myself. I would like to know what my slave learned or is being taught other than that which I have not taught him."

THE WEAPONS

As to the disciplined demonstrations in the streets by the Black Muslims, such as were held in New York during the early spring in protest against the arrest of certain members of the movement in Rochester, N. Y., he said, "I can't tell you whether we will have any future demonstrations or not."

"We're not people who actually like to get out in the public for any show," he explained. "We don't like that. If we have to go out in the public we want this going-out to be in a good way, and for a good cause, and to know that it is for justice."

As for carrying weapons, the Black Muslim leader said with the Black Muslim temple meetings in Los Angeles.

The leader's disclaimer of teaching black supremacy and segregation seemed to be more semantic than actual. In any case, when I asked him about this—and whether his teachings were not in one sense rather similar to the white supremacy and segregationist teachings of the white Citizens Councils of the South, he replied:

"Allah has revealed that the black man is the Original Man, and that's what I teach. Now where this supremacy teaching comes in, that is charged by the disbelievers—that I teach it in order to suit their particular purpose of charging us with being an aggressive movement, or intending to become such, because of the teachings of one being superior over the other."

THE 'BLAME'

He elaborated on this at length, adding:

"We say that the black man is the first man in the sun, and then they take this and just change it around—that he is teaching supremacy. And that, we are not doing. We already know that we are inferior to you here in America. We cannot say physically or even mentally that we are equal. We can't do it because we're not. We have undergone such treatment that it has absolutely made us inferior to you, and therefore we can't be your equal; not, say, your superior, when it comes to actual physical or educational ability."

To my question whether this black supremacy charge was, then, a distortion of his teaching, he said, "Yes, in order to add to the charge of aggression."

He does, however, believe along with the Southern segregationists that integration is wrong and that intermarriage is evil and that segregated education is all right so long as the Negroes get the same textbooks.

"What are we going to integrate for?" he asked. "What do we want to marry a white woman for, when we are black men? That is going to ruin our family. We will spotty up our family. What does she want a black man for? Or what does the black man want the white one for? This is ignorant on both parts even to want to intermarry with each other. The very desire there is ignorant and evil. It's against divine law for either side to integrate in such a way.

"God made all of us as we are. We have black nations, brown nations, red ones, yellow and white. We have all these five major colors in races or nations. Why should they not remain like that? Why should they be thrown in like bones or birds into a pot to make soup out of?

"I don't blame the white man in the South for not wanting my people to marry with them. But I blame the South for mistreating him. Why don't the South let him go free? Why don't they teach him that, look here, Negro, I freed you a hundred years ago. Now come on, I'm going to put you on the road to freedom because I don't want you in my house as a member of my family. I don't want you sitting down at my table. Go make a table for yourself. Come on, I'll show you how to do this."

But "educational integration," that is good, Mr. Muhammad said.

"We should try to get the same education that is available to all other living people, and if the white man has it in his school, if we prove ourselves intelligent enough or decent enough to get in that particular class—we expect him to allow us to study the same courses he studies," he asserted.

"It doesn't have to be right in his own school if he doesn't want us in his own classes. Just give us the textbooks, that's all. Let us learn what is in the book where he is learning. We don't have to stand together in the class."

THE SCORN

The black nationalist Mr. Muhammad had only scorn for Negro leaders who sought the help of the United States Constitution to gain Negro rights because, he pointed out, "the Constitution was written up while the white man owned slaves, and he didn't have the slave in mind when he was writing the Constitution."

There always will be bloodshed over any Negro effort to gain equality with the white man, he said, as witness "the example in Mississippi and Alabama today while we are talking." Then he heaped scorn on Dr. Martin Luther King jr., head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, of Atlanta, Ga.

"The head of this movement, Mr. King, is trying to force the white man in the South to do that which is against his will and nature, because some of the Northern parties of the white people, maybe in Washington, have said to him that it should be done, and you should have this in the Constitution and therefore you should enforce it, and therefore have it enforced by the government.

"But Mr. King has not learned as yet that the white man in the South is brethren to the white man in Washington, and the Washington white man is the brother to the Southern white man, that they are not going to go to war over the Negro and kill each other for the sake of the unlearned Negro—of the knowledge of self and others—to integrate into that which they don't desire him to be in. They are not going to kill themselves for the sake of a Negro.

"Therefore Mr. King is making a fool out of himself in the South, and acting like a dog around the house, where the master stands at the door and the dog wants something to eat and he just waddles all around the door, around the master's feet, whipping his tail on the ground and grinning and leaning his ears back on his neck to show that he is a good, peaceful dog; and that, master, give me a piece of your meat that you have there in your house. And this while there is plenty of meat for the dog in the bushes out there, if he would go out there and hunt for it."

It was only pity that Mr. Muhammad felt for James

Knowledge of self is a big aim in the Black Muslim teaching, and among other things it means to Mr. Muhammad a "cleaning up" of his people. He puts it this way:

THE MORALITY

"I am not so foolish a teacher to teach my followers to go and force the white man to allow us to become equal members of his society without cleaning up my people and making them self-respecting first. They must be qualified to demand even a black independent society.

"Therefore I start at the root of the matter. Go clean yourself up and show the world that you have self-respect, and seek education wherever you can get it, and make yourself equal with the civilized society of the earth, and they will accept you.

"Otherwise you are a dog in the society, or you are a rejected human being or beings in the society of the world, and I don't blame them. If you are not qualified and not their equal, stay out of it."

Cleaning up also means a rigorous morality characterized by modesty in women's dress and also by learning to eat the right foods, he said. He scathingly opposes the eating of pork.

I asked Mr. Muhammad how he felt about other Negro people who, though perhaps not leaders in the civil rights cause, were persons whom he knows or has dealings with in business and professional ways, even though they did not believe in his movement.

"We have respect for them and their professions and we try to treat them as we treat ourselves, for that matter," he answered. "We know they are not believers as we are, we know that.

"But as long as they tolerate with our faith we tolerate with them, and we treat them as brothers."

But what about the persons who are sometimes referred to by Black Muslims as the "Uncle Toms," I asked.

"That doesn't mean that we are in any way aggressive toward them and seek an aggressive act," he said. "We only just criticize them for being like that.

"I love all my people," he continued, "and I believe one day they all will be going to believe as I believe. If they don't, why then the prophets have lied, and we just can't make liars out of them."

I asked him what he meant exactly in referring to members of the white race as "devils," and he said that this is the white man's essential nature because he was made that way. He made it clear that he was not speaking rhetorically but in a theological sense—this was what God had revealed.

"It's what He revealed, and what He revealed is what I am teaching and believe in, and this term 'devil,' or name 'devil,' is applied to wicked people, people who are by nature wicked.

THE INDEPENDENCE

"They were made white, or different color," he said, "because they had been grafted out of the darker people, and therefore they have that color."

This conforms to the version given in Elijah Muhammad's Volume II of "The Supreme Wisdom," in which it is said that the history of the black man goes back to the beginning of creation, but that the history of the white race goes back only 6,000 years.

However, he explained to me that the only point about this that he is teaching is "that the person is the same by nature but he can be better than another one of the same family or race." I took this to mean that all whites have the devil-nature, according to his teaching, but that some can be better than others and that those who do a good deed "will be rewarded for their goodness and their time will be extended."

For his view of the white man in relation to the American Negro, he had this to say:

"This is the real trouble, the whites oppose us, the black people of America who were their slaves once upon a time, from ever becoming anything like self-independent. They want to keep them subject to themselves in a more educational and scientific way, other than their fathers'.

"Their fathers only used the common knowledge of enslaving our people. But today their children can use one of the smartest scientific ways against our people to keep them subject to them that ever was invented by a race of people since time was."

Without saying what this particular kind of knowledge is, he went on to assert:

"We want what you want today, and that is independence. We want peace, and whether you want peace or not, we want peace and security from you. You are our worst enemy. We have no other people who is an enemy to us but you, because we don't live in the country of other people. We live only with you, and we have been here for 400 years, and you say now that we are free, but yet you are doing everything to keep us from exercising the rights of or equals of a free people."

THE MONOLOGUE

Mr. Muhammad at this point was deep in his long monologue. His talk came flowing out as if from a self-replenishing wellspring. He declaimed his points in a tone of boundless grievance. Several times he was interrupted by his asthmatic cough; he begged pardon for the interruption and continued.

"This I want you to understand," he said. "We are tired of suffering, brutality, beatings, killings, just because you don't like us, and just hate us, and absolutely knowing that we are powerless to resist because you have every odd against us. You are absolutely the boss, and we have nothing. And we are asking to leave you, that's all we're

"But in the case of the so-called American Negro we have nothing to fight back with. If you come to the door shooting, we have no guns here to shoot back, so therefore the right is with God, as it is written in the Book. He will defend us if we believe in Him and trust Him, and we're not going to start fighting with any one to have Him to defend us. But if we are attacked we depend on Him to defend us because He has stripped us."

Mr. Muhammad's teaching about a separate territory for the American Negroes is open to negotiation, he indicated. He said, "They use this teaching of separation as something that we plan to make war, or cause insurrection in the country for even talking about it, and that it's out of place because we can't solve the problem by separation."

Here's what he says on that subject:

"The American white man is not going to move out of his estate to give to the so-called Negroes. We are not asking you to do any such thing. No, only unless you prevent our going to our own. If you are going to prevent us from going to our own, or back where we came from, where you found us, okay, then give us a place here to ourselves.

THE TERRITORY

"This has gone to too much talk about separation, and about our acting or demanding a territory here. We're not demanding territory in America. No, sir, we're asking America only if they don't allow us, or will not allow us to go back to our own people and to the country from which we came.

"Then give us a place to ourselves, as you know and we have learned through experience for 400 years we can't get along in peace together. You're not going to accept us as your equals and we know you're not going to do so. We disregard your promises because you are not going to live up to them because 100 per cent of your people will not agree with such. And we have proof today in the South."

In answer to a series of questions on this subject of a territory for settlement he told me that " I have in mind the place where I think it would be."

"But I will not say that until my people want to be separated, and until the government itself wants to separate them and give them such a place."

He indicated that the place for settlement, whether in this country or abroad, has not been decided on because it is altogether premature at this point.

He did suggest, though, that the Muslims would be glad to have the government make available to them right now land suitable for growing food.

"I don't think we should, many of us, work without a focus," he said. "If the government will give us the land to farm on, and it should give us some farm land to go and raise our own food. They can do it to us. But we will buy it if we have the money to buy it. If we don't have the money to buy it, we can't buy it, but the government should do so because the government has plenty of land according to statistics."

He said that if the land were made available the Muslims would begin work "tomorrow morning."

"You won't have to drive us to it, we would do that religiously, because we want our people to have something for themselves and to grow food for them and clothes."

In answering my questions about Black Muslim finances he said that no member is forced to give money but that if they want to buy a piece of property they agree among themselves how much each will give of his earnings toward the purchase price.

"It may demand $50 of each of us, and we buy it and we sacrifice ourselves to give that $50 out of our wages for so long a time, a month, two months, three months, four months, something like that."

I mentioned that I had heard that active members were required to contribute a total as high as $90 a month to the movement.

"Those who are able might give that much," he replied, "but he's not forced. But as I said, after we learn that you have an income of $100 a week we ask you how much of this do you have to pay out for the house rent, food, clothing, and other overhead expenses, and you tell us. And how much the government has to take out for taxes and whatnot. Then whatever is left, then you will tell me and you will tell me what you can give out of that. It's not for me to tell you. That's forcing you."

THE TARGET DATE

On the subject of using the power of the vote, Mr. Muhammad said this was all "future talk" at this point, but he indicated that there was a possibility that this might be used in the 1964 election. In order for a candidate to gain an indorsement, he said, "he would have to be in sympathy with us and he would have to have some knowledge of the aims and purposes of Islam in America."

"The aims and purposes of Islam here among my people," he added, "is to give them a knowledge of self and a knowledge of God, knowledge of their religion Islam and to separate them in time, that these 17 million or 20 million American dark people should go for themselves. This is the basis of the whole, it is to separate our people and put them by themselves."

Although he kept emphasizing that the voting idea was in a very indecisive stage now, I asked, if it should materialize as a Black Muslim policy, would that change the movement's position with respect to military service? At the present time it opposes military service and its members refuse to serve.

"If it became materialized, naturally military participation might take place, but I don't know yet, not as yet myself," he said.

Replying to the reports that he had set the date 1970 as the time when the Negroes would take over in the United

More on TEN NEGROES—P 11

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page 10.)

States, Mr. Muhammad said this was misrepresented, and that what he actually had said was that "by 1970 all of my people, or most of them, at least 90 per cent of them will be believing in Islam—that's all that was said."

Asked about whether Fidel Castro was included by him in the group of "original men," he said:

"I am so concerned where the so-called Negro stands and what he should be and who he should try to join onto that I have no time to study the history of Castro and the Spanish people in the South."

The Black Muslim movement was started in the early 1930s by Wallace Fard of Detroit, who later disappeared. Mr. Muhammad, who was born Elijah Poole in Georgia 65 years ago, took over the leadership after the founder's disappearance.

I asked Mr. Muhammad about this. Is there, I asked, a mystery about what happened to him?

"No sir, there is no mystery of what happened to him," he answered.

Could Mr. Muhammad say what happened?

"He is just waiting for his proper time to deliver speeches."

Did Mr. Muhammad consider Mr. Fard (whose name he pronounces Farad) to be not only a holy man but actually a divine person?

"He is God Himself. He is the One that we have been looking for for the last 2,000 years to come. He is the One and His word bears witness to the fact that He is the One."

And you knew him, I asked?

"I do know him."

Is Mr. Muhammad in touch with him now?

"Yes, spiritually."

I asked him about a successor. Did he have in mind the identity of his own successor, since he himself is known as the inspired Messenger of Allah?

TEN NEGROES:

"It never occurred to me until I was deep in the interviewing of Negroes for the series that a preconception was hampering my understanding, for there is in truth only one kind of American."

By Robert S. Bird
National Correspondent

Negroes say that it has always been hard for them to communicate their thoughts and feelings to white Americans, and that the fault has been mostly on the white side.

Not only has the white population been generally inattentive to Negro efforts to be heard and understood, they say, but even when the whites have tried to listen they have been impeded by an unreal image of the Negro.

The Negroes say it has been this image which the white people have heard speaking rather than the real Negro. And they contend that this artificial, ideological notion of the Negro, whatever its variations, has been deeply embedded in white American culture since slavery days. And that essentially it is a slavery image of the Negro.

All of this was impressed on me by Negroes during my earliest interviews for the series of articles on Negro thinking and feeling which I wrote under the title, "Ten Negroes," for publication in the Herald Tribune in ten installments between April 30 and May 10.

In the deep and enlightening experience I underwent during months of interviewing dozens of Negroes in many fields and in different parts of the country I became fully convinced of the truth of this Negro viewpoint, though not necessarily of all their other viewpoints, which are very diverse indeed.

A THREAT of boycott and segregationist retaliation yesterday took some of the gloss from the shaky peace engineered in Birmingham between business men and Negro leaders. There may be trouble ahead. For a report from the scene, read Charles Portis' story, on page 14.

Though I had spent much time in the last eight years on assignments involving desegregation conflicts, and had watched with sympathy the Negro struggle for civil rights and equality in riot-torn places in the Deep South and here in New York City, I learned that my own "hearing" of the Negro was being obstructed.

Take one seemingly simple but subtle point—their status as American citizens.

I had never doubted that the Negroes were in theory full American citizens in every respect and legally entitled to all their civil rights. I knew full well that they were being systematically impeded by white groups and institutions in attaining these rights, and privately I deplored that.

But I felt more or less unthinkingly that they were a separate group of Americans, one which was in a slow, sure process of winning full acceptance and participation.

It never occurred to me until I was deep in the interviewing of Negroes for the series that a preconception was hampering my understanding, for there is in truth only one kind of American. That is a full American, entitled to all rights, privileges and equal enjoyment of opportunities, and all the rest, without having to earn these and without having to prove himself.

Unless, perhaps, he is a convicted criminal.

Then the sense of outrage which the Negroes feel today dawned on me. The outrage of being required, seemingly forever, to earn their way to full enjoyment of their rights as Americans.

More on TEN NEGROES—P 14

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

Now this becomes a hard point to develop clearly in words here. It's like talking about one's humility. The humility vanishes when you explain it and the words end up seeming merely pompous. Still, in this case the effort seems worth the risk.

I came to look on Negroes for the first time as just plain Americans like myself and like everybody else whose forebears came to these shores from some foreign land. They now seemed to be no different except as we all are different as individuals. The illumination which had dawned on me neutralized in my mind in a radical way the preconceptions and loaded overtones which looking on the Negro color had formerly cued off in my mind.

Like a young schoolboy who half believes an overheard cliche that all blondes are dizzy and unreliable but grows up to find that is pure nonsense, I came to see that Negroes are all kinds of Americans. Poor Americans and rich ones. Boring and fascinating Americans. Sloppy and fastidious Americans. Mean and courteous Americans—just like the rest of "us."

Further insights came to me when the articles began to appear in the newspaper and an avalanche of mail descended on me. Much of it was praise from Negroes and whites, but that is irrelevent here. More to the point is the fact that much criticism of the series came from Negroes.

Some told me with great annoyance that they knew all about the things "my" Negroes had revealed but the articles had said nothing whatever about what they, the letter writers felt.

Black nationalists condemned my choosing certain moderate viewpoints to be aired, and some moderates said I had overloaded the series with the extremist Black Muslim philosophy. A couple of important Negroes objected personally to having been left out.

I began to see—indeed, feel—what numbers of Negroes had tried to tell me during the interviewing, that there are many Negro viewpoints and a great deal of conflict among the Negroes themselves over their diverse viewpoints.

An Angry Woman

All this criticism proved one thing to me, that the series had communicated something at least—for these Negro critics were certainly communicating to this white man in their angry letters.

One of the bitterest, angriest and most contemptuous letters—and one of the most literate—came from a woman. I telephoned her and asked her permission to use it with her name. In the nicest way, she agreed.

I believe her letter makes a good point, and one missing from the series, and that it is a fine example of a Negro person communicating fully to the white side. So I reproduce it in full here:

Herald Tribune photo by TERENCE McCARTEN

Miss Melba Tolliver, who wrote the letter.

"Dear Mr. Bird:

"What happened? Did you find the lake of Negro opinion too chilly for the nice long swim you intended? You certainly dived in with all your might with the lead-off article on the Black Muslims. Then, as your series on the 'Ten Negroes' progressed, it seemed as if you decided to get out of that cold river of controversy as rapidly as you had dived in.

"We wouldn't THINK of using dogs against Negroes up North!"

brief about herself that I could use with her letter. She said that she is 25, was born in the South but lived later in Ohio, became a nurse and worked as one in New York, and now is employed by a pharmaceutical company.

For the sake of the interest—and criticism—shown in the mail response over how I put the series together starting from cold, here is the rundown:

The assignment was to do ten articles on the race decided that I ought to try to make my interviews really deep, extending over, say, three hours or so. And to record them on tape.

I fell far short of the 100 interviews but most of those I did do went pretty close into three hours and some much longer.

My choice of those selected for the individual articles was wholly arbitrary. Many Negroes who are important on the American scene I never approached, and never intended to—and for reasons having nothing whatever to do with my estimate of their worth, influence or anything reflecting on them.

They have their job to do and I have mine and I didn't think they fitted into the ten-article format as well as certain others, including a couple of altogether unknown persons.

I decided that the leaders of the two opposite extreme movements most spectacularly active on the American scene ought to be represented. But I didn't think the series needed other highly influential organization leaders. I mean people like Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, Whitney Young jr., head of the Urban League, Jim Farmer, of CORE; A. Philip Randolph, the Negro labor statesman, and many others equally active in Negro affairs. Or even Rep. Adam Clayton Powell.

In this retrospective examination of the series I think reference ought to be made, however, to the fact that the popular reception among the Negro masses of the Black Muslim denunciation of white oppression on the one side and the successes of the non-violence demonstrations in the South on the other side have tended to make an old-line civil-rights organization such as the NAACP "harder" and more extreme in its public statements.

A Hardening

The NAACP some months ago got in a hassle with white "liberals" in the labor movement, accusing the white liberals of job discrimination. On top of this, Rep. Powell, who has gone extremist in the anti-white direction with a vengeance, jumped on the Negro NAACP leadership, calling for ouster of the whites in leadership positions.

None of that seemed of interest to the series, especially since these persons have well aired their views in the news reports, and there is every indication they will be continuing to do so in the future.

In the case of the NAACP, this is not meant to diminish in any way the lustrous achievements of that organization over the years, achievements which are continuing at an accelerated pace into the present, in advancing Negro rights.

Federal Judge James B. Parsons, of the United District Court of Northern Illinois, told me in Chicago that the massive accumulation of NAACP briefs over the years had helped to build up much of the civil-rights laws of this nation.

Judge Parsons is one example of many Negroes whom I did approach for interviews, and who patiently gave me of their valuable time and who were not, in the end, profiled in the series. This was not for any lack whatever in the thoughts and feelings they communicated to me, but because of reasons of "fit" in the series, factors which lay altogether outside the content of their interviews.

Judge Parsons is one of those Negroes who believes matory" but that they have no understanding whatever that these are news articles about problems which are daily occurrences with Negroes.

"We must portray what the Negroes feel, and in so doing we may be accused of exciting or inflaming the people, our readers," he said.

"I don't think the average white person has had the contact with Negroes that we must have in this country sooner or later," he added. "The question is one of communication, if we are really going to solve the problem. White people know nothing about it, and they really can't feel it. It's difficult to try to explain to them what we feel and what the Negro would like for them to understand.

"I know a number of executives who rarely come in contact with any Negro except their chauffeur or maid, and they more or less put all Negroes in the same category.

"I can go to some affair," he continued, "as John Sengstacke, the publisher of The Defender, and that's one thing. But walking in as a Negro, that's something else again. I'm treated differently, then. And this is the thing we're trying to correct.

"Wherever we go we want to go on the basis that we are qualified to meet the standards rather than on the basis of being a Negro or white. This is the difference we are trying to get over to the white people. That plus the fact that there are differences in people, and you can't put everybody in one classification just because they are colored."

At the very outset of my researches I went to Clarence B. Jones, general counsel of the Gandhi Society, a legal aid organization headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King jr., for orientation. He was immensely communicative in the best sense of the word, and it was he who discussed the white man's image of the Negro with me for the first time.

"It comes as a surprise, the intensity of James Baldwin's writings," he said, "because the white population has not known the Negro—has not known him in any way except in the way he has wanted to know the Negro.

"I would assume that if you have created an entire structure of how another individual is supposed to react and supposed to be, and you operate within the framework of that, it comes as a great shock to find that the image you have created is only an illusion, and does not correspond in any way with the actual factors."

"Whites have wanted to understand the Negro as someone who was content, so long as you treated him occasionally in a nice way and so long as you set aside a place for him so he would be a good and faithful person, and a good friend," he continued.

"The white man has simply heard himself for many years—his own self talking. He has not let the Negro speak."

There was Dr. William Stuart Nelson, vice-president of Howard University, who traced for me, among many other aspects of race, the development in American culture from the slavery days of the image of inferiority which permeates white thought about the Negro this very day.

And there were many other Negro figures in different walks of life who patiently explained their inner thoughts to me on many aspects of the racial subject.

The conclusions I drew from all these interviews were clear enough to me at the end.

First and foremost, the Negroes want their rights without any further stalling. They are in no position yet to force a quick resolution of the struggle for their rights, but they no longer will accept the "rightness" of the gradualist approach.

An Attitude

And they want more than their rights, they want equality and freedom. These goals are not easy to spell out in precise definitions, but the people who have bespoken in

Herald Tribune photo by TERENCE McCARTEN

Miss Melba Tolliver, who wrote the letter.

"Dear Mr. Bird:

"What happened? Did you find the lake of Negro opinion too chilly for the nice long swim you intended? You certainly dived in with all your might with the lead-off article on the Black Muslims. Then, as your series on the 'Ten Negroes' progressed, it seemed as if you decided to get out of that cold river of controversy as rapidly as you had dived in.

"What happened? Weren't you able to find any interviewees who could or would give you the real reasons for the bitterness, disenchantment, and despair of the Negro in America? Were you unable, in all your travel and investigation, to find just one Negro who could or would tell you what it's like to be an American Negro?

"I cannot believe that you could not find one Negro who could tell you what it's like to walk down the street in a predominately white community with all of the stares and whispering. I cannot believe that you could not find one Negro who could tell you of all the little things that happen to him every day of his life on his way to work or school. All of the small things that are a prelude to his work or school day. The things that he accepts, but not quite. The multitude of his 'small' things that sink into his unconscious self, but display themselves in his early morning scowl and his pre-coffee grumpiness. The 'minor' things that cause his white co-workers to wonder why Miss or Mr. Negro is so 'darned evil.'

"Mr. Bird, I would rather believe in the things stated in the United States Constitution, the Bill of Rights and the Supreme Court Decision of 1954 than believe that you could not find just one American Negro who could shed some real light on what it's like to be a Negro in the United States.

"For the past week I, and others like me, have been waiting patiently to see one white person, through a series of profiles on ten Negroes, enlighten other members of his race on the reasons why the Negro feels and acts the way he does. I, and others like me, have been sorely disappointed. Negroes have not been disappointed in the same way as whites have been. We have not been expecting you to tell us things that we did not know, for we are intimately knowledgeable about the things you wrote and did not write, as well as the most minute goings-on in the lives of most white people. Not, in the case of the latter, because we want to but because we have had no other choice.

An Accusation

"Yet, in all this time no one has wanted or tried to know anything about us. No one cares when they run those beautiful shampoo commercials that we have kinky hair, most of it black with no hopes of finding out 'whether blondes have more fun.' No one cares if our hands never become 'soft and white' no matter how many jars and bottles of 'Brand X' we use.

"I won't waste the time, Mr. Bird, to go on with this little story because the things I have just written about are only 1/100,000,000,000 of the many things that go into the making of a bitter, disenchanted, and despairing Negro.

"The invisible man that no one knows or cares about. The invisible man that the white world wishes would completely disappear and solve the 'American Dilemma."

"But we're not going anywhere, you know. We're here to stay. That's why I, and so many others, are disappointed, Mr. Bird. Because you had the opportunity to shed some light on America's 'dark problem' and you failed, you failed miserably.

"As we say 'uptown,' Mr. Bird, why didn't you 'come on down front and tell it like it really is?'

"Cordially,
(Signed) MELBA TOLLIVER."

"P. S. Miss Calloway wasn't too much help either when she said 'she forgot she was a Negro.' The majority of us are not seeking to forget, but rather a little remembrance on the part of white Americans!"

I asked Miss Tolliver if she would tell me something

None of that seemed of interest to the series, especially since these persons have well aired their views in the news reports, and there is every indication they will be continuing to do so in the future.

In the case of the NAACP, this is not meant to diminish in any way the lustrous achievements of that organization over the years, achievements which are continuing at an accelerated pace into the present, in advancing Negro rights.

Federal Judge James B. Parsons, of the United District Court of Northern Illinois, told me in Chicago that the massive accumulation of NAACP briefs over the years had helped to build up much of the civil-rights laws of this nation.

Judge Parsons is one example of many Negroes whom I did approach for interviews, and who patiently gave me of their valuable time and who were not, in the end, profiled in the series. This was not for any lack whatever in the thoughts and feelings they communicated to me, but because of reasons of "fit" in the series, factors which lay altogether outside the content of their interviews.

Judge Parsons is one of those Negroes who believes that much progress is being made in race relations.

"There is no question," he told me, "that the Mississippi of this year is ten years in advance, so to speak, of the Mississippi of a year ago."

At another point he said: "I think that Negro novelist James Baldwin's point of view is very good. I think his view is that it's exceedingly difficult for you to become acquainted with what's really going on in this Negro-America relationship. One of the reasons it's difficult for you—thinking of you in terms of the 'White Man,' if there is a 'White Man'—is that it is a matter of tradition for the whites to think in terms of 'The Negro.' And there is no 'The Negro.' There are many 'Negroes.'

"You can't learn to communicate with Negroes academically. You can't sit around a desk and read books and learn how to do it. You have to get out and do it. And Negroes can't learn to communicate with white people across racial barriers. They have to get across the barriers and start living and working and thinking together and their communication becomes common.

Another man who leveled with me in a genuine effort to communicate was John H. Sengstacke, publisher of the Chicago Daily Defender and affiliated Negro newspapers, and one of the more active Negro figures in Chicago.

Answering accusations which are often made against situation, each focalized around a particular Negro person who would speak his views in his own words. I decided that for each of the ten persons profiled in the series I ought to talk to ten others—a hundred altogether. I also the Negro press for being overly sensational, he said that white people "see headlines that they think are inflam-

The Writer

Contrary to the popular impression of a professional journalist, Robert S. Bird is a slow man coming to grips with the typewriter. After spending 35 of his 57 years in this business, he has almost as many awards as grey hairs and he likes to worry out all the aspects of every problem before he sits down to write.

He's the kind of man in unrimmed glasses and neatly pressed suit who sometimes seems to melt into the scenery and not be there at all, but he can take his middling height and weight and Amesbury, Mass., accent and plant himself in front of a situation and not budge for all the officials in a bureaucracy.

Because he often carries a tape-recorder with him, he has been mistaken for an FBI official. He is not.

He is a reporter who started as a boy and kept going through crime reports, fire stories, political crises and international incidents to become one of the top men in his profession today. When he is at home—and he has been travelling constantly for the past five months to work on "Ten Negroes"—he lives in Greenwich Village with his wife, the former Hester Faison. His son, Robert jr., is a reporter for another newspaper. This week, Mr. Bird will be taking some time off to see them both.

ROBERT S. BIRD
Our National Correspondent

There was Dr. William Stuart Nelson, vice-president of Howard University, who traced for me, among many other aspects of race, the development in American culture from the slavery days of the image of inferiority which permeates white thought about the Negro this very day.

And there were many other Negro figures in different walks of life who patiently explained their inner thoughts to me on many aspects of the racial subject.

The conclusions I drew from all these interviews were clear enough to me at the end.

First and foremost, the Negroes want their rights without any further stalling. They are in no position yet to force a quick resolution of the struggle for their rights, but they no longer will accept the "rightness" of the gradualist approach.

An Attitude

And they want more than their rights, they want equality and freedom. These goals are not easy to spell out in precise definitions, but the people who have bespoken in their thoughts have tried to explain in their various ways what they mean.

If they, or Negroes in general, have failed to communicate what they mean by freedom and equality in America today this does not matter. They still want these enjoyments. Perhaps one way for a white to understand what they mean is to match in his own mind every freedom and opportunity for equality which he enjoys with the same for any Negro who is similarly endowed with intelligence, ability and other traits.

All this leads me to another conviction, that the push by the Negroes of America for these objectives is harder than it ever was, it will get even harder in the future, and the more the Negro gains in this intensifying struggle the more he will demand. And there will be no end to it until "equality" is achieved. Then skin color will carry no ideological meaning whatever.

The drive for advancement will become increasingly spectacular, for the conviction is abroad in the Negro world that white America needs to be shocked and shamed before the world into giving the Negro his rights.

There is, moreover, a buoyant new spirit rippling through much of the Negro world—pride of the black man. This comes in part from the spectacular emergence of the African people into nationhood and the presence in the world councils of the United Nations of their leaders and diplomats. Proud, highly educated, and black as black can be. Black men of kingly self-confidence, standing up straight, tall and level-eyed to the white man.

And partly this pride in race comes also from the yeasty ferment of the Black Muslim philosophy which pervades the entire Negro world. Though it is not converting Negroes in mass numbers yet, it is making them feel mighty proud of their Negro-hood, so to speak.

Along with this, pride of race goes out from the Black Muslim preachers who are holding the attention of masses of Negroes, a denunciation of the white man which is balm to Negro self-esteem.

An Escape Valve

The bulk of Negroes in the great cities of the country are especially happy to see the white man kicked around rhetorically. It is for these Negro people a wonderful escape valve for their long-smouldering resentments. It accounts for the popularity of Malcolm X, the Black Muslim spellbinder who is afraid of nobody and loves to engage in a chilling kind of brinksmanship in his speeches. And for the new extremist fling of Rep. Adam Clayton Powell.

Most of the Negroes I interviewed believe that there is a possibility—though by no means a probability—of outbreaks of violence among the urban masses in the future. They seem to feel that this will depend upon economic conditions and the degree of frustration which Negroes will be allowed to encounter through discrimination affecting the fundamentals of their life. Fundamentals such as food and shelter, education for their children, hope for the future.

Unemployment is the great danger, and tokenism in employment the big evil of today, most of them say.

Among the Negro leaders and men of affairs, and among large numbers of the non-despairing people, there is a feeling also of an approaching fullness of time for them, a sense of destiny, a feeling that the oppressive restraints are somehow about to give. Hopefully, a feeling that this will come about through a new awareness and show of good will by white America. But otherwise through a breaking of the restraints themselves.

NEGRO EDUCATOR'S SEARCHING LOOK AT OUR SOCIETY

By Robert S. Bird
Herald Tribune National Correspondent

In his cloistered office on a campus in Washington, D. C., a Negro university president distinguished with degrees and honors answered a bitter question that rattles in the minds of most white people in the nation's Capital.

Why don't the Negroes themselves do more to clean up crime among their own people?

Negro crime in Washington is becoming a global scandal as foreign diplomats in the Capital watch and wonder at the American failure in handling the peril of violence there.

But what about the Negroes themselves? Why don't they do something about policing their own people?

I asked the question of a number of Negroes in Washington and other crime-afflicted cities. But the answer of Dr. James M. Nabrit jr., president of Howard University, the nation's biggest predominantly Negro university, seemed to embrace most searchingly and vividly a viewpoint shared by all.

It was a little surprising to hear a noted educator from the academic world—even though a Negro one—speak almost as devastatingly about white America's failures in race relations as the Black Muslims themselves, while disagreeing utterly with their philosophy and what he called their hate declarations and talk of violence.

This is the second article of the ten-part series, "Ten Negroes," by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird on the Negroes' views of white America.

Herald Tribune photo by BILL SAURO
Howard University's Dr. James M. Nabrit jr.

But Dr. Nabrit insisted that the question needed to be put in perspective, and he gave it bluntly.

"Many of my white friends come to me from time to time to sympathize with me because of something the Negro has done or something some Black Muslim has said," he began. "They tell me they are very sorry about it. But I reply, don't come feeling sorry for me. You ought to sympathize with society. It is society which has all the aberrant personalities—the white ones as well as the Negro ones.

"I tell them that we Negroes don't indict the white race because of the John Birch Society or the Klu-Klux Klan or George Rockwell, the American Nazi leader, or any other persons who deviate from the accepted standards. We simply hold that these are persons who have broken off in some abnormal way within society. We think of them as belonging within the confines of the group."

Dr. Nabrit knows the Negro crime subject from first hand experience. He holds a law degree with honors from Northwestern University and an honorary doctorate in law from Morehouse College in Atlanta, where he got his bachelor of arts degree with honors in 1923. Sixty-two years old now, he was a practicing lawyer in both the South and the North before becoming a national authority on civil rights and constitutional law.

More on TEN NEGROES P 10

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

As an educator he taught law for twenty years at Howard prior to his appointment as president of the university in 1960. He comes, moreover, from an Atlanta family of scholars who have made important careers for themselves.

Taking all these things together, he can afford a disarming affectation when he settles in his chair to talk. Dr. Nabrit discourses in the leisurely, round-about fashion of a crack-voiced country preacher—making, however, impressive good sense in every sentence. He smokes a cigar and waves it around as he drives home a point, and a half dozen spare cigars are stacked in a breast pocket.

"I say to my white friends," he continued, "you ought to understand that we Negroes aren't going to be better than American society itself. We're part of it. You're talking to me as if the Negro ought not to have any of these aberrations. But I say the Negro should mirror everything in American society—because he's part of it. That's why I don't get upset over the Black Muslim and over all these other things.

"I'm not pleased with them, but I am not made hopeless or led to feel that everything is going to collapse. Rockwell doesn't represent America, he just represents some people who have peculiar ideas."

Taking his time in circling around to the target question—Washington crime—Dr. Nabrit warned that if his blunt views and those of other equally frank speaking Negroes were printed here they would disturb many well-meaning whites who have come to feel a little self-righteous about the "progress" of the Negroes.

"But they ought not to be disturbed," he growled from his tilted back chair, "because this country was conceived and developed and built under a revolutionary set of principles—principles that agitated and stirred up all Europe and England and the Americas from the 1700s straight through to the adoption of our Constitution and since.

"The point is, some of the fire and enthusiasm and adventurousness and keen perception of all that has become blunted by an affluent society, and by the fact that we are in a leadership role in the free world. But if people in other countries don't think that the United States is big enough to embrace differences in people they're not going to accept the leadership of this country."

Howard University's campus is vibrant with the hum and life of students of many foreign nationalities, of varied skin colors, and diverse languages. Of the approximately 7,000 students, more than 1,000—more than any other university in the country—are from other countries all over the world.

Friend of Statesmen

Dr. Nabrit himself has sat, moreover, on international conferences in other countries and has a wide acquaintance with both the statesmen and the capitals of foreign nations.

He argued that if the race issue is "unsettling" to many white Americans it was the facing-up to such unsettling issues in the past which made this country great. He voiced a thought heard everywhere in Negro America, that time is running short in this country for redeeming for the Negro minority the vaunted promises of democracy. America does not have the time left that the Roman Empire, or ancient Greece, or even England, had to build and maintain world leadership, he warned.

"It seems to me that we ought to be grasping for the kinds of things that would make our leadership survive," he said. "And I think one such thing is tolerance and understanding and respect for people who differ from us.

"We Negroes will work out our solution in this country in any case, because we have more time than the country has. I don't mean we want the time—but psychologically and chronologically we have more time to work out our solutions than the United States.

"As for the country, we ought to set up as a pillar of our society the idea of aligning our nation with the philosophy that men differ in their backgrounds and thoughts and languages and colors—but they are all men."

Meantime, he emphasized, Negro resentment at the disadvantageous position in which they remain a full cen-

Herald Tribune photo by BILL SAURO

Dr. James M. Nabrit jr. On a Recent Visit to New York

". . . I have lived in the South. There the Sheriff is the man. I don't care what people write in books, it's the Sheriff who has contact with the jury list, with the taxes and assessments, and all the legal and illegal activities going on in the county. He can make a person's life miserable by harassment—I mean white or black."

Negro in these counties in the South the image of America is the image of the Sheriff. This is what people don't understand. Many of the Sheriffs are good people, however, else the Negroes would not have survived.

"But the importance that this Southern Negro sees in the elections in the United States is not who is elected President, all he wants to know is who's going to be Sheriff. That's the person who's going to be on his back. I'm not talking about Negroes in the universities, I'm talking about the ordinary Negro whose life is just one risk after another."

Dr. Nabrit, who spent much time in the South working as a lawyer in behalf of these rural Negroes, spoke with pain and compassion in his voice.

"For people to talk about the trend in the United States being a trend toward equal opportunities, that's true enough—but this Southern Negro can't see it," he said. "He can't see any trend. The white people are not even talking to him.

"So if you asked him what the trend is he would say people are getting meaner and meaner, and he has taken all he can take. And he just has to do something about it. And this surprises the white people in the South."

Dr. Nabrit circled back on the crime-in-Washington question, offering a profound insight into this problem.

A basic difficulty is, he said, that the Negro masses are being asked by the whites to assume citizenship responsibility before they are allowed citizenship freedoms.

"My first answer to this crime problem is," he said, "that all of us need to work on the deficiencies of our society which prevent people who want to work from working. And which don't let people get the kind of education for life in society that they want. Now if we are willing to do that, I am willing to address myself not to what the Negro is doing in Washington about the crime matter but what the citizens are doing about it.

"I was called into a meeting with very good white terested in studying. They may have high I. Q.'s but they get talking to some fellow on the corner and he says I am studying electricity and you're foolish to try it because I can't get a job.

"Meanwhile, here we are trying to tell them, if you don't get an education you'll be lost, because you can't live in America unless you have the education that will fit you to deal with the machines and the techniques of today."

Dr. Nabrit said that to prevent hatred and violence in America three things are especially needed in society—"and for conformity to the basic principles of this country call for conformity to the basic principles of this country and a little moral leadership in places where it ought to be shown."

The three basics, he said, were:

"One, to do something about more evenly distributing education of citizens in all groups.

"Two, to enable people to live where they are able to live and where they have a desire to live.

"Three, to enable people to work and hold a job and get promoted on the basis of their ability."

The Howard educator, constitutional lawyer, and international figure spoke scornfully about the "depressing" statement made by a Southern Congressman a few weeks ago proposing that the Marines be called in to help clean up the Washington crime situation.

"The trouble is we are not dealing with the things that produce this situation," he said in summation. "But if we don't do something about it then in ten years we will have to have troops in all the big cities—because we'll have hundreds of thousands of people who will have no way to make a living and will be either on welfare or out with a gun trying to take something from society to live on."

TOMORROW: Another revealing conversation. Mr. Martin Luther King tells what Ameri

kinds of things that would make our leadership survive," he said. "And I think one such thing is tolerance and understanding and respect for people who differ from us.

"We Negroes will work out our solution in this country in any case, because we have more time than the country has. I don't mean we want the time—but psychologically and chronologically we have more time to work out our solutions than the United States.

"As for the country, we ought to set up as a pillar of our society the idea of aligning our nation with the philosophy that men differ in their backgrounds and thoughts and languages and colors—but they are all men."

Meantime, he emphasized, Negro resentment at the disadvantageous position in which they remain a full century after slavery is running higher than ever.

"And one of the ways it is manifesting itself," he said, "is through those 300,000 people whom Elijah Muhammad has got in the Black Muslim movement. We ought to understand, though, that it is a marvel that more of this resentment has not been stored up within the Negro, that he has been able to take all he has taken without becoming absolutely anti-American, anti-white, anti-everything.

"It shows qualities which the Negro and America both ought to be proud about because, given the same circumstances, I don't know of another race that would have reacted this way over that period of time."

Coming around to the subject of Negro violence, Dr. Nabrit continued:

"Some of the Negroes do feel violent, of course. But we don't have anybody in the Negro group preaching that sort of thing in organized fashion except in the Black Muslims. And I would hope we would have fewer of those, because it's futile and destructive of everything that would make life worth having.

"We are trying to narrow the circumference around them, and to show the weaknesses of their arguments about separation and that sort of thing. But these people are shrewd. They can do some things that not even the churches can do. They can control their people.

A Consuming Hatred

"These Black Muslims don't drink, they don't smoke, they don't run around with other women. They stick with their families and pay their debts. Their people do a lot of things we would like to see everybody practice. So you have to watch them because of those things, to see that they don't capture people. Because the other thing is worse. It's a consuming hatred they have, and they may erupt in violence as they have already done in some places. All these things call for America to do something about these things that are wrong in our society."

The university president frequently referred to the good intentions of many white citizens, contrasting them with the harsh realities as seen through Negro eyes.

"I think this country would like to see us get an even break," he philosophized, "but the image which so many Negroes get from this country is not that at all. If you have been down in Mississippi or Alabama or Georgia—where I have been—you know that's not the image there.

"Their image is of fear, and bodily harm, and economic boycotts, and intimidation of all kinds. These are with the Negro every day. His fear is of getting less justice in the courts even if he shows the nerve and ability to get somebody to represent him.

"I have lived in the South. There the Sheriff is the man. I don't care what people write in books, it's the Sheriff who has contact with the jury list, with the taxes, and assessments, and all the legal and illegal activities going on in the county. He can make a person's life miserable by harassment—I mean white or black.

"Only a few white people in the county can do anything with him, and they work hand in glove with him. So to the question, offering a profound insight into this problem.

A basic difficulty is, he said, that the Negro masses are being asked by the whites to assume citizenship responsibility before they are allowed citizenship freedoms.

"My first answer to this crime problem is," he said, "that all of us need to work on the deficiencies of our society which prevent people who want to work from working. And which don't let people get the kind of education for life in society that they want. Now if we are willing to do that, I am willing to address myself not to what the Negro is doing in Washington about the crime matter but what the citizens are doing about it.

"I was called into a meeting with very good white friends of mine recently when a white woman who was there, and who is a friend of mine, asked me what we were doing about this crime situation. She said she couldn't walk in the park at night.

"I said, this thing affects us all. You're not the only one who can't walk in the park at night. I told her we have had fear of walking in parks at night all our lives—but not for the same reason she had. After we got that straightened out we were able to make some headway in that meeting."

Dr. Nabrit moved to the heart of the Washington problem, saying:

"The Negro cannot assume the responsibilities of a citizen unless he understands what they are.

"I say in all my speeches that the Negro must assume the responsibilities before we get the rights. But that's all right for me to preach it—and I do try to convince as many Negroes as I can—but too many of these people I am talking about don't have this fine line of understanding.

"They can't see that. All they think is that they are not being treated like others in our society. So when we begin talking about what their responsibilities are it doesn't make any impression on them at all.

"Now I think this is one of the responsibilities of Negro leadership, to try to get this across, and I think Negro leadership is trying. I notice that Dr. Martin Luther King jr. advocates it in all his speeches, and the N. A. A. C. P. is advocating it. They all realize that there are citizenship responsibilities which free people have to assume, and if you're reaching for freedom you had better assume them. But that's not easy to get across to the Negro people as it is to sit here and discuss it."

Though Dr. Nabrit insists that the prevention of Negro crime is a task for all society and not for the Negroes alone, still he personally ordered the university months ago to initiate several different kinds of programs to improve Negro family life and living conditions in slum or run-down areas in the vicinity of the Howard campus. He keeps in close touch with these programs, and he was thinking of them when he said:

"If you went out and talked to families near the university where a white policeman beat up a Negro father of a family last week—a family that lacked food and heat—and if you spoke to them about what you and I are discussing right now, they would not know what you were talking about.

One Step at a Time

"I have to tell these people things one step at a time. I say, if you will do this first, then the policeman will not beat you up, then you will get heat. All the philosophy about citizenship responsibilities and freedom doesn't reach this man and his family at all. The family doesn't have anything you can hook into. It's like trying to hang up a suit of clothes in a closet without hooks. The clothes just fall right down on the floor.

"The lives of these people are a scramble for existence, and the rules we live by don't mean anything to them. It's as if the rules don't exist. Certainly, they would listen if you could hold them that long—then they'd go out and mug somebody. Or mug you."

Dr. Nabrit detailed the difficulties qualified Negroes have in getting anything but menial jobs in the big private firms and offices in Washington, and he spoke with deep feeling about discrimination in the important building industry in Washington against allowing Negroes into the various construction unions.

He himself was under attack by student groups at Howard this Spring because no Negroes were allowed to be employed in the construction of a new $4 million gymnasium on the Howard University campus. He told about the frustration he had encountered when he protested to contractors, unions and Federal agencies the (gym is being Federally financed). But still no Negroes were employed on the project.

Such discrimination has devastating effect on the motivation of youngsters who are studying, or would like to study, vocational skills such as electricity, he warned. Speaking of such youngsters from the Negro masses in Washington, he continued:

"They don't have any books in the home and they don't have enough food or clothing. They may have a radio or a television—that would be their only contact with our culture. The parents themselves are short of motivation and ambition, the whole family sees nothing behind them, nothing in the present, nothing in the future.

So the youngsters drop out of school. They're not in-

Crime Box Score:

Dr. James M. Nabrit's comments about Negro problems in Robert S. Bird's article were made against the background of a city where the population is dominated by Negroes and where crime problems are staggering.

Negro slums in the nation's capital rank with the worst. Muggings, robbery and other violence have taken place within sight of the White House. Racial violence reached a peak last Thanksgiving in a riot at a high-school football game that shocked the city. Some of the facts and figures in the situation follow:

¶Population (1960 census), 763,956; Negro, 411,737; white, 345,263; other, 6,956. Percentage Negro, 54.

¶Gain in Negroes, 1940-1960, 224,000. Decline in whites, 1940-1960, 130,000.

¶Percentage of adult Negroes among all adults arrested, 1962:

| | |
|---|---|
| Murder and non-negligent manslaughter | 85% |
| Forcible rape | 91% |
| Robbery | 88% |
| Aggravated assault (use of force in robbery) | 89% |
| Burglary, and breaking and entering | 87% |
| Larceny, involving sums of $50 or higher | 81% |
| Auto thefts | 74% |
| Crimes of all sorts | about 80% |

statement made by a Southern Congressman a few weeks ago proposing that the Marines be called in to help clean up the Washington crime situation.

"The trouble is we are not dealing with the things that produce this situation," he said in summation. "But if we don't do something about it then in ten years we will have to have troops in all the big cities—because we'll have hundreds of thousands of people who will have no way to make a living and will be either on welfare or out with a gun trying to take something from society to live on."

TOMORROW: Another revealing conversation. Mr. Martin Luther King tells what American Negroes seek in the civil rights field. The key word is NOW.

TEN NEGROES

Martin Luther King Describes the Hurry

This is the third article of the ten-part series, "Ten Negroes," by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird outlining the Negroes' views of white America.

By Robert S. Bird
Herald Tribune National Correspondent

Dr. Martin Luther King jr.'s office in Atlanta is not much larger actually than some of the jail cells in which he has served time with what many people think has been honor and distinction.

When he is not in jail or out on the road protesting, preaching or lecturing, the 34-year-old Dr. King can usually be found in this cubicle-like office in the Southern Christian Leadership Conference Headquarters on Auburn Ave. in Atlanta.

This is where I interviewed him one day recently—before he went down to Birmingham to end up in jail again. For the thirteenth time.

THE PROBLEM

Dr. King had made an interesting calculation on the progress of school integration in the South, and he offered it to me as an explanation of why there seemed to be so much "hurry" by the Negroes for advancement of their civil rights.

"We face the frustrating problem," he said, "of having a Supreme Court decision that was handed down some eight years ago. Yet only 7.8 per cent of the Negro students of the South are attending integrated schools this year, a hundred years after our emancipation from slavery.

"This means we are barely making 1 per cent progress a year, and that if it continues at this pace it will take 92 more years to integrate the public schools of the South."

I made a fast calculation of my own. Adding 92 to 1963, I got the year 2055 A. D. as the one when—at that rate—school integration in the South would be completed.

"The shape of the world today just doesn't afford us the luxury of such slow movement," Dr. King said dryly.

THE URGENCY

As a Baptist minister in Montgomery, Ala., in 1955 he launched during the Negro bus boycott there the first history-making experiment in non-violence techniques and philosophy of creative protest against segregation. Since then the non-violence movement for Negro rights has spread around the country, and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), which he heads as president, has become the principal co-ordinating agency for a number of affiliated non-violence groups.

Dr. King's own stature as a Negro rights leader is perhaps unsurpassed in the nation now, and he moves through a broader band of the spectrum than probably any other figure in the country. His name and his presence are powerful symbols among the 20 million Negroes of America.

In an interview which lasted almost two hours he was especially interested in explaining the sense of urgency that pervades the Negro world today.

"There is abysmal ignorance on the part of many,

More on TEN NEGROES—P 10

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

many white people, even those of good will, about progress being made in civil rights," he said. "There is a feeling that much more progress is being made than actually is being made."

Then he went directly into the essence of this sense of urgency, reinforcing in his own calm way the same thoughts I had heard from other Negroes with flashes of anger in their words. What he said furnished the answer to the question often asked by white people—what is it the Negroes want?

"Three simple words can describe the nature of the social revolution that is taking place and what Negroes really want," he continued. "They are the words 'all,' 'now,' and 'here.'

"That is, we do not want some of our rights, we do not want token handouts here and there—because that is one of the great problems we must deal with now, tokenism.

"We are saying that we want ALL of our rights, not some, and we are also saying we want all of our rights HERE.

THE MOOD

We want ALL of them.

"Now when I say 'here I am speaking of here in the United States and here in the South. The mood of the Negro now is very interesting in connection with this idea. My experience is that Negroes who live in the South are now saying we are not going to run from this thing but we are going to stay right here and struggle for our rights HERE.

"The mood of Negroes now is that we are Americans, and America is our home—we don't need any back-to-Africa movement. I still contend that the black nationalist movement will never appeal to the great majority of Negroes. It will appeal to some as long as the problem is with us, and it is symptomatic of the discontent and frustration and bitterness of many Negroes.

"The third word is 'NOW.' Here again I find that many people feel we have a long time, and that it will take time to solve the problem, and all that. Of course we realize that the problem can't be solved overnight. But all too often those who live with the myth of time have the idea that time is going to solve the problem.

"They fail to realize that time is neutral—and it can be used constructively or destructively, and the people of ill will have used time more effectively than the people of good will.

"And this is why I say that we may have to repent in this generation not merely for the vitriolic actions and words of the bad people, but also for the appalling silence and apathy of the good people."

THE BRAVERY

Whether addressing a couple of thousand people in an auditorium or talking privately in this little office at his somewhat cluttered desk, Dr. King carries immense conviction.

This comes partly from his background, for his father was a clergyman before him; and partly from the nature of his dedication and special mission. I had watched him risking his life around the clock in Montgomery eight years ago when that city was torn with strife and when dynamite bombs were being set off, and he's still exposing himself to danger in trouble spots in the South. This kind of bravery helps to convey conviction when he speaks.

Actually his office is a kind of communications center with the world. For he is in touch constantly not only with protest groups around the South but also with national and world figures all around this country and as far away as India, where he is a friend and, in a sense, a student of Prime Minister Nehru.

"So, I can sense in the Negro community all over this country," he went on, "a feeling of 'now.' That is, a feeling of wanting freedom not a hundred years or fifty years from now, but tomorrow morning.

"There is also a feeling that some progress is being made. In the South you can see real signs of progress, because here there is an overt, glaring system that has legal sanction. So you can easily see progress when you know that last year Negroes could not go to theaters in Atlanta and they can go today.

"You know that two years ago the Negroes could not eat at a lunch counter in downtown Atlanta but today they can. This is a breaking down of the system of segregation in a gradual way, but at least it's moving."

THE DANGER

But in one area, Dr. King emphasized, there is retrogression and danger. That is in the area of Negro employment. And here he calls on President Kennedy for executive action.

"We are retrogressing in this area rather than progressing, and I am sure that a lot of this is the result of automation," he said. "So the Negro has been limited to unskilled and semi-skilled labor, and because of discrimination in the South he has been refused apprenticeship training.

"Now these jobs are going away, the unskilled and semi-skilled jobs, and this makes a great problem in unemployment. The danger is that if something isn't done about employment discrimination and housing discrimination—then social problems will continue to mount, and juvenile delinquency will grow."

Associated Press

TOWARD HONOR AND DISTINCTION—Dr. Martin Luther King in a 1958 arrest for loitering in Montgomery, Ala. Shortly after Bird interviewed Dr. King for this article, the minister was arrested for the 13th time—a record probably unmatched by any holder of a doctor's degree in systematic theology. He has been shot at, stabbed, and bombed since he sprang to national prominence by successfully leading the Montgomery bus boycott in 1956, is now appealing contempt term.

Associated Press

FIGHTING FAMILY—Dr. King's family has played an important part in his fight for civil rights. His wife, the former Coretta Scott, received a sympathetic phone call from President Kennedy when Dr. King was jailed during the 1960 campaign. Some said the call tipped the nation's Negro vote Kennedy's way. His son, Martin 3d, 5, is pictured at left after being refused admission to a private school in Atlanta. Last August, Martin 3d, Yolande Denise, 7, and Dexter Scott, 2, visited Dr. King in jail.

Dr. King predicted what a number of other Negroes in various fields have told me.

"If something isn't done in a hurry and in a vigorous way, explosive situations will develop, particularly in the large industrial areas of the North, where you have great numbers of Negroes with these frustrations emerging."

As far back as a year ago in May he himself had urged President Kennedy to sign a sweeping executive order to end discrimination in the whole broad Federal areas where Federal funds are being used. Dr. King's idea was that this would end segregation in many places where it exists now, and would create an atmosphere for integration on all levels.

His view of the President is rather sharply pointed. It may be recalled that in the heat of the 1960 Presidential campaign Presidential candidate Kennedy made a telephone call to Dr. King's wife in Atlanta sympathizing with her over her husband's particular jail confinement at that time. This gesture was credited with securing for Mr. Kennedy the Negro vote of the country.

But the Negro leader made it eloquently clear to me that he feels the President could do a great deal more than is being done by him to advance the cause of integration. Still, he did not want to be represented as suggesting that the President lacks good will.

"I know he has problems and I don't want to overlook them," he said, "and I certainly don't want to give the impression that the President isn't a man of good will. I think if one compares what he has already done in civil rights with that of his predecessors, he has done more.

"But still I feel this problem is so grave now that it takes more than applying a little vaseline to a cancer—it's going to take a vigorous approach that really goes to the roots."

THE DECISION

In essence Dr. King proposed that the President make a great moral decision, an historic decision.

"Now certainly he would get a great deal of opposition from members of his own party," Dr. King said. "I mean the Southern members of his party. It would mean they would take a stand against other phases of his legislative program. But as I have said to the President in discussing this very matter, these men are going to vote against many phases of his legislative program anyway. They were against medical care for the aged, against his farm bill, and they are going to fight the tax cut.

"So I don't see the consistency here of saying that I need these men for my total legislative program, for my foreign aid bill, and this and that, and so we can't arouse their ire too much on civil rights because they are going to vote against most of it anyway.

"I think it is better for a man to go down taking a strong moral position than to go down anyway, and you compromise in the process. I believe it would be—I am sure it would be—the right moral decision. And every great decision that has been made by a great President in this area has brought opposition. But when we look back over it we see that it put the nation in the right direction from the signing of the Emancipation Proclamation by Abe Lincoln right on through."

The Negro leader summed it up in these words:

"I feel that ever and again in history you find those moments when that which is morally right is also politically expedient. And I think it would be politically expedient, for it would not hurt the President in terms of getting re-elected because it has been demonstrated that it is going to be in the large industrial areas of the North—New York, California, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and some others—that one must think of winning an election.

"And in these communities you have enough liberal forces in the white community and enough Negro folks to turn an election. So I don't think it would be political suicide for the President. I think it would be a wise political action as well as one of great moral value. And it is very seldom that one has the opportunity to do that which is morally right and also that which is politically expedient."

THE UNTOUCHABLES

Dr. King had a couple of other points to make on the general worry to him of Negro employment. One is that the Federal government ought affirmatively to move out to help the depressed Negro classes in the same way the government of India has financially assisted the caste of Untouchables after discrimination against them had been outlawed by the new constitution of the newly independent nation.

"I remember when in India hearing Prime Minister Nehru make speeches condemning Untouchability on at least three occasions in six weeks," he said. "I think, rather frankly, that not even yet since 1954 has a President of the United States made a major speech or major statement really saying that integration was right and segregation wrong.

"It's always a 'we must do this because the law says do it' sort of thing. It never comes out that the purpose of the law is to establish justice, and that which is right, and that Mr. Meredith must go to the University of Mississippi not merely because the Supreme Court rendered a decision but because he is your brother and this is right, and that Mississippi will never come into its right relattouships until this can be done in a natural and normal and moral manner. "But I saw this in India, where the Prime Minister constantly brought this out.

"But again another thing is, from the beginning of the date when the nation gained its independence it started out giving millions of rupees a year for the improvement and development of the Untouchables who had been discriminated against for thousands of years.

"When I talked with Nehru about that he said, we couldn't think of talking about refusing to discriminate against Untouchables without thinking somehow of doing something ourselves and taking some responsibility to lift the standards of the people whom we have exploited all these years.

"He said that might be a little discrimination in reverse, giving them something we don't give others—but this, he said, was our way of atoning for what we have done to these people for thousands of years. Well, the Negro has not had that help in America, and it's only natural that some of these problems of lagging standards will produce problems in the transition period."

The other approach Dr. King is undertaking toward helping Negro employment is through the "selective buying" campaign that is being pushed around various cities in the country against firms that discriminate against Negroes in employment. This, he said, will be a major program for this year.

Dr. King stands at the opposite pole from the Black Muslim leader, Elijah Muhammad, who scathingly criticized Dr. King in an interview with me. Dr. King, on the other hand, was critical of the Black Muslims.

"I think this Black Muslim movement is very sensational," he said, "and consequently it will excite and get a good deal of coverage. But the thing that amazes me is not how many Negroes have been willing to join this movement but that more Negroes have not joined it. When you think of the number who have given overt allegiance by joining, and those who somehow share the views of this group, it's amazing.

"Their membership really is almost less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of the Negro population. The FBI estimates its membership at perhaps 75,000 for the whole nation, but I would think many more would share its philosophy. I would think a great number of Negroes are at least in agreement with them on their statement of the race situation.

"But it seems to me that this other movement that is all around the country now, engaging in non-violent direct action, has appealed to many more people because they see a way out through this. You can channelize legitimate, healthy discontent through creative channels in the non-violence movement.

"The Black Muslim movement channelizes it through negative and bitter channels. The non-violent movement says that the anger I have is an anger that is almost inevitable in a situation I am in, but this discontent which is necessary for a change in the social situation can be channelized in a creative channel.

THE DISCONTENT

"You don't need to hate in the process, and when we talk about love at this point we are not talking about emotional bosh or sentimental affection. It's nonsense to tell an oppressed people to love their oppressors in an affectionate sense. But we're talking about something much deeper. Now this is why the Muslims can't get off the ground in cities where you have powerful non-violent movements.

"They've been in Atlanta three years and it was interesting that the Atlanta Constitution had a series of five articles on the Muslim movement, and at the end of the series they said that the Muslims had sixty-five members in the temple in Atlanta.

"In the non-violent movement we've had as many as 4,000 students participating at one time. But we've never had a series of articles on that."

Dr. King warned that grave elements of danger reside in the Black Muslim movement. This is because it appeals to people on the periphery of life, he said, and he added:

"I think that this is a danger. There is no doubt about it. If this movement grows and continues to grow it can create an atmosphere for a great deal of bitterness and hatred, and can bring about a nightmarish situation in any big city in the country. It has dangerous overtones, and no doubt about it."

TOMORROW: Reporter Bird is introduced into the "Snick way of life" in an interview with Carver Neblett at the headquarters of the Students Non-violence Co-ordinating Committee, or "snick" for short.

TEN NEGROES

This is the fourth article of the ten-part series, "Ten Negroes," by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird giving Negroes' views of white America.

By Robert S. Bird

Herald Tribune National Correspondent

I met Carver Neblett in about the same way you reach in and pull a number out of the hat. I dropped into what is called "Snick" headquarters in Atlanta and buttonholed for an interview the first typical, Negro Snick kid I found who was fresh off the firing line, so to speak.

Snick is the way they pronounce the initials of the Students Non-Violence Co-ordinating Committee—SNCC.

These are the non-violent, Negro and white student commandos who are risking their lives in the Negro voter registration drives in rural Georgia and Mississippi with courage not easy to understand.

And these drives to get for Negroes in the Deep South the tool of voting power to improve their lot is becoming this year the most important breakthrough of any in the struggle for Negro rights. SNCC is one of several organizations, including the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), that are active in this turbulent and dangerous field.

More on TEN NEGROES—P 8

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

"But we go into more hell than any of the others," Carver said.

Their headquarters is in a very small building off Hunter Ave. in the Negro section out beyond Morehouse College. When you enter the door you find yourself in a cramped little warren of small, connecting offices, all busy with the comings and goings of students in all kinds of dress—boys and girls, white and Negro.

At a desk near the door I saw a white girl with scuffy sneakers on her feet and owlish spectacles over a nice-looking face, and an air of supreme calm amid all the hurly-burly. She absorbed the explanation of my mission faster than I could say it.

"Follow me," she said cheerfully, and led me into the labyrinth of offices to a corner where two Negro youths were chatting. She pointed to one of them and said:

"He's Charles Neblett. He's been working in Greenwood, Miss., but he's leaving today to go on tour with the Freedom Singers. The other one's his brother, Carver. He's working on voter registration in Terrell County and he's just in from the field. Maybe he's the one you want."

So I ended up the following morning with an interview with Carver, trying to pry out of him something he couldn't quite put into words.

It was typical of this action-minded boy that as this is being written he has taken time out to make the walk from Chattanooga to Mississippi with the band of ten Negro and white youths commemorating the killing of Baltimore postman William Moore. Moore was shot on a lonely road in Alabama while on a lone demonstration march on this same journey.

The Snick youth is a tall, rangy lad with a somewhat loungey, off-hand manner and a low but quick way of speaking. He has very alert eyes. He was wearing a bright red sports shirt and black slacks of collegiate-slim styling, and he was feeling mighty good in them.

"Can't wear these things on the job in Terrell County," he said, fingering his red shirt and grinning. "You gotta wear work clothes there."

Whence Comes Courage?

What I was searching for from him and others was, what is the nature of the dedication and strength these students have got that enables them to stand up to prolonged strain of white hatred, threat, beatings, arrest, jail, and even shooting?

Carver Neblett is nineteen, and a sophomore at Southern Illinois University, who has been on leave for more than a year. He was born into a share cropper's family in rural Tennessee. The family moved North six years ago, to Carbondale, Ill., but he was not able to rid himself of the resentments he had felt in growing up as a segregated Negro boy in the South.

When he was in his last year of high school in Pulaski, Ill., in 1960, his brother Charles, now 21, wrote him from Southern Illinois University that he was joining in a SNCC desegregation "action" in Cairo, Ill., and why not come along?

Carver went to Cairo, promptly got arrested, and went on a hunger strike in jail. That was the beginning of his conversion to the non-violence philosophy of "creative protest," and to what he calls the "Snick way of life."

He learned the non-violent techniques in endless SNCC workshop sessions, and found himself greatly moved by the power of the non-violence philosophy and by the examples of SNCC leaders who had been through the fire.

Although he had become well embarked on his studies at the university, he decided to quit school temporarily and go South to throw himself into the most perilous "action" of all.

Telling how the first student workers to enter a new rural area go in with nothing but the clothes on their back, placing themselves deliberately on the charity of the frightened Negro community, Carver said:

"Usually they don't know who we are, except they think that we're dangerous to them. Most of them never heard of SNCC, but they have all heard the term 'Freedom Riders,' and they tend to think that's what we are. They have been told by the whites that if any Freedom Riders come into the town, stay away from them, they're troublemakers, and it would be very dangerous to talk to them.

"But in any of these rural areas you are going to find a few dynamic Negro persons who will take you in and understand the situation. That's how we get the first toehold. These few members of the community give us food and a place to stay, and they know that we are doing nothing wrong but are working for the betterment of the Negroes.

What's to Lose?

"So what do we have to lose? The ordinary people at first think we are crazy in a funny way, that we are absolutely fearless, sort of inhumanly brave. We have to get that idea out of their head fast and make them understand that we are completely human, though not fearful in the way they are.

"How do we do this? In different ways. One is to persuade a frightened Negro family to let one of us sit in the living room with them and watch the television some evening. You don't say much but by the end of the evening they've got the feel of you and they begin to look on you as human beings like themselves."

Herald Tribune

ONE OF THE AROUSED COMMUNITIES—This is a recent scene outside City Hall in Macon, Ga., as Negroes line up to register to vote. Members of Snick—Students Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee—have worked actively in this town to promote the rights of Negroes to vote in elections.

In all these areas, Carver said, the Negro community in general has a pervasive feeling that they cannot go down any lower, that the only place they can go is up. He continued:

"Gradually you start dealing with the Negro people on several different levels. You go to the night clubs. You go to the churches. You go everywhere that people gather and talk. And very slowly they begin to respect you and to look on you as symbols of the respect which they themselves want and should have."

The slowest to respond in many cases are the Negro ministers of the local community, and it is they who have always been "set up on a pedestal," Carver explained.

"In the beginning they shy away from us. I guess they are afraid of their position in the community and afraid that their churches will be bombed. But SNCC knows how to use a little psychology on them. We get things going, and pretty soon the idea of freedom is in the air, and we're having mass meetings and people are getting involved, and the doctor and the lawyer and the field hand and the servant girl are all going to jail together.

"Then it is that we have become part of the community ourselves, and everybody is knit together and the whole Negro group is ready to do anything—anything—to get their goal."

Carver was not able to express very well the quality of the peril that envelops such a Snick-invaded rural Negro community like a chill miasma. But older and more mature Negro workers who help to guide these missionary students on the scene did provide me with moving accounts.

His Car Shot Up

One was Randolph T. Blackwell, the Negro field director of the Voter Education Project, a law graduate and specialist in government and economic studies, who was in a car with SNCC workers that was shot up outside of Greenwood on Feb. 28.

"I don't know how these kids are able to stand up to the strain and danger," he said. "As for myself, it seems like being in combat, where you move through the town expecting anything to happen and looking ahead of you and behind you both at the same time.

"But I have learned that it is helpful if you have in mind an absolutely clear understanding of the nature of your opposition. One of the experts taught me that it's not too difficult to stay in such a community if you start with the following assumptions:

"No. 1, that there are a lot of white people in the community who will want to kill you and who will try. No. 2, that the police are hostile to you and not your friends. No. 3, that the courts are not going to be fair with you. No. 4, that a sizable portion of the Negro community will not understand what you're trying to do at first.

"And No. 5, that it will require great persistence and continuation of effort before the nation will wake up to the point where it will call on the Administration to live up to its national responsibilities."

Here is how the strain of peril falls on both Negro and white workers in such a danger area. It summarizes the account given to me by Mr. Blackwell:

On Feb. 28 Mr. Blackwell drove in a rented car to the SNCC office in Greenwood, arriving at 1 p. m. He noticed a white car with no license plates parked in front of a Negro cafe near the SNCC office which later was burned down. Three white men were in it. Just sitting. They were still in the car, still sitting, at 2 o'clock, at 3 o'clock, at 4 o'clock, at 5 o'clock, at 6 o'clock.

At 6 o'clock they switched on their lights and stayed there, just sitting. They were still sitting in the car at 7 o'clock, at 8 o'clock, at 9 o'clock. At 9:15 p. m. Mr. Blackwell, fully aware that trouble was in the offing, got into his car and prepared to leave.

The white car instantly pulled away and drove around the block, coming in behind Mr. Blackwell's car as he was leaving his parking place. It followed him, and so he drove around the block, returned to the office and warned the eight or nine student workers in the headquarters to close up for the night and be careful in leaving because he was being followed.

He got back into his car with two other workers, Robert Moses and James Travis.

They drove to a near-by gas station, where they refueled the car and ate sandwiches. The white car with the three white men followed them and circled while they ate. Then, with Mr. Travis at the wheel, he headed his car out on the main highway toward Greenville, Miss., with the white car following them.

Attack Coming, but When?

All three were in the front seat. They knew they would be attacked. The only question was when. For a while there was too much traffic on the highway for the other car to come up beside Blackwell's. But they knew that when the white car began to pull up they could expect bullets.

Very soon that time came. The white car moved forward. Mr. Travis, at the driver's window, was in the most exposed position. Mr. Moses was in the middle and Mr. Blackwell at the right window. The car pulled up beside them. The gun appeared in the white car. One of the white men opened fire.

Seven shots were fired. Mr. Blackwell shouted to Mr. Travis to pull over to the right and stop. But Mr. Travis cried that he had been shot—in the neck, as it turned out. Mr. Moses grabbed the controls and pulled their car to a safe stop while the white car sped away.

The bullets had smashed both side windows in front and the left side window in back. They found succor at a near-by Negro vocational school and Mr. Travis was removed to a hospital, where the bullet was taken from his neck and the wound closed. He recovered. The others were not hit.

Carver Neblett assured me he is prepared to take any risk whatever, fortified as he is by his non-violence philosophy and spiritual feeling, though up to now he has not been shot.

"No matter what happens to me I am going to participate in the movement for as long as possible, even when I go back to school," he said, simply. "I was not always non-violent"—he laughed at the thought—"but we won't go into that.

"I was brought up—all Negroes in the South are—with a fear of jail. But I don't care about jail now. Sometimes I get lonely there, or frustrated, but I think of our freedom song, 'Paul and Silas were bound in jail, had no money to go on bail, keep your eyes on the prize, hold on—' Or I think of what that poet said, about bars do not a prison make if a fellow's soul is free, and that gives me content. And I pray."

Some of the things that Carver was not able to explain about the spirit of people in these aroused communities—unable to express them because he is so totally immersed in "action" itself—were explained to me by a young minister of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. He is the Rev. Andrew Young, who is active in the program for teaching citizenship to the largely illiterate rural Negroes.

"The predominant mood of the masses of Negroes in Mississippi is religious," he said. "It's impossible not to see the religious parallels that have always been made since slavery days—'Let my people go.'

"The whole struggle of the Old Testament Hebrew people in the midst of adversity is continually quoted and is the foundation of their thought. Mixed now, however, with the new freedom songs.

In Spite of Fears

"You have the feeling that while these people do not get completely free of fear when we come in with outside help, they will go along in spite of their fear. And the lower classes are not nearly as controlled by their fears as the middle classes of Negroes. They are the ones who have been most successfully brain-washed by the segregationist whites.

"Then there are the ones who had got away for a while and had a taste of freedom in the Army. They are helping greatly to produce a kind of mood for freedom in these Deep South areas. Freedom is not a word that is ever quite defined by them, but it is their mood.

"Another thing, since these are a very religious people they have a deeply religious idea of the fullness of time, a period when time does have meaning, when everything clicks. We almost have the feeling that this is the time in Mississippi."

It was this same Rev. Young, a co-worker in the movement with Dr. Martin Luther King jr., who made this interesting observation:

"The only place that the students are afraid to work is at Sen. Eastland's plantation. You can shoot at them in Greenwood or harass them anywhere else, but they're afraid to set foot on Eastland's plantation. They're almost sure they'd be murdered. I don't know—Sen. Eastland doesn't actually run it. And that's the problem with the plantation—they're run usually by lower classes of whites, low-mentality whites who are effective disciplinarians.

"But the thing about the students which makes them sure they'd get killed is that they wouldn't back down if they were confronted. They wouldn't run. If asked a question, they would answer it directly.

"You can be nearly beaten to death in Mississippi for not saying, 'Sir,' and this has become one of the students' silent forms of protest—to get away from this whole subservient attitude of the Negro. They sing all the time, 'Before I'd be a slave, I'd be buried in my grave.'"

Carver Neblett talks a little awkwardly about his feelings of spirituality, and I felt it was because he hesitated to commit to words things he feels as deeply as the spirituality of the non-violence philosophy.

'Amounts to Conversion'

Still he tried to explain it, and this is what he said:

"I don't believe in approaching a person and asking him to accept non-violence as a way of life. It's something you have to come to yourself. But if you are on the demonstration line, the opposition will start engaging in things that are so unpleasant that you really have to use non-violence in order to survive.

"You see, we believe we can overcome hate with love, overcome violence with non-violence. And this is a tremendous force. It amounts to a conversion to a new attitude toward life."

Many Carver Nebletts are working today in the brooding rural countryside of the Deep South, where the War Between the States and the days of Negro slavery seem very close.

Some of the rural Negroes they are trying to rouse to a reaching and grasping for citizenship rights are almost childlike in their view of themselves and their world. These student workers are bringing them among other things the rudiments of citizenship education.

In the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's "Citizenship Workbook," below sections on "New Words to Study" and "Be Polite," is a section on "Our America." It tells what all this voter registration business is about. It says in part:

"The Supreme Court building, where the Justices decide legal disagreements, is the symbol of law. The Capitol, where our Senators and Representatives make the laws, is the symbol of free, representative government.

"The White House, where the President lives and his Cabinet meets, is the symbol of our country in world affairs. We accept the results of elections and abide by the rulings of the courts.

"We in America know that voting is important for good citizenship, but we know that educating our children so they will vote wisely is a part of good citizenship, too. They have to know how to stand up for their rights.

"In America we want law and justice.

"We love our land—America!"

SUNDAY: Dr. Kenneth Clark, professor of psychology at City College, director of the Northside Clinic for Children and head of a new Harlem youth project called Haryou, takes a grave view of a new trend in Negro thought, affecting both the intellectuals and the masses.

TEN NEGROES

THIS is the fifth article of the ten-part series, "Ten Negroes," by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird on the Negroes' views of white America.

By Robert S. Bird
National Correspondent

Photographs showing police setting dogs on Negro citizens in Mississippi and Alabama produced in the Negro world a kind of feedback reaction which white people can scarcely realize.

White America looked at the pictures and undoubtedly deplored the action as savage and wrong. But Negroes felt within themselves that the hour has long passed for looking and deploring, and that the white world's good will has been smothered by the hypocrisy prevailing in the nation.

The feedback reaction was against sacred American institutions—the American system of justice, for example, for those men with dogs wore the uniforms of an arm of the law; and the Church, which many Negroes believe has failed in moral leadership.

A confrontation of race crisis now challenges the country, and danger looms.

This is the calm but worried appraisal of an eminent Negro social psychologist and educator who is one of the country's most perceptive observers of racial tensions.

He is Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, professor of

Herald Tribune photo by NAT FEIN
Professor Kenneth B. Clark

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

psychology at City College, co-director with his psychologist wife of the Northside Center for Child Development, director of the newly started "Haryou" youth program in Harlem, and author of the classic study of race "Prejudice and Your Child."

His research for the book was cited by the United States Supreme Court itself in it epoch-making, 1954 school desegregation decision.

"America is confronted with a stark crisis in race relation and it is no longer verbal and no longer academic," Dr. Clark told me. "From Greenwood, Mass., we saw pictures of police dogs attacking not criminals but human beings who were asking only for elementary rights as American citizens. Asking not for complex things such as social relations but only for the right to register to vote.

"It recalls to my mind those indelible pictures I saw just before the war of men in Nazi uniforms in Germany forcing old Jewish men to scrub sidewalks.

"Seeing people in uniforms who, in this case, were not Nazis but American police with dogs, unleashing them not on persons who were violating the law but on those who were seeking to have the law upheld—that is one example of the present crisis.

"Then there are the jailings of scores and even hundreds of Negroes in Birmingham merely because these people are insisting upon their unqualified rights as American citizens, that is another example of the nature of the present crisis.

"The crisis has now reached a point of confrontation, and I borrow a phrase in saying that it is an eyeball-to-eyeball one, this present situation in race relations in America."

Dr. Clark, a friendly, professional man not given to undigested thoughts and statements of alarm, has been searching deeply into what he believes may be a very basic shift in Negro attitudes in this country, and one with foreboding possibilities.

He discussed this with me at considerable depth, starting in his office in the "Haryou" project at the Harlem YMCA, and later during a drive up to Kent School, the boys' preparatory school in Connecticut, where I was invited to sit in with a group of students on a race-relations seminar conducted by Dr. Clark. His son, Hilton, is a recent graduate of the school.

"The perspective that dominates my thinking now is the problem of increasing alienation of a substantial part of the American Negro population from the American—well, I was going to say the American 'mystique,' but let's say the American habit, or the American perspective, or way of looking at things.

"Two years ago I felt, and said, that the American race problem would have to be resolved within the context of the fact that the American Negro is American.

Despair

"I said that his insistence upon his rights as an American citizen is his attempt to establish beyond doubt that he is an American, and he will settle for nothing less than the rights that the American Constitution and the American creed and American ideology grant or guarantee for other American citizens. This was the basic rationale of his push.

"I have not shifted this position totally yet. I have not reversed it. But it is certainly being modified.

"I say this because, as I read the things which Negro intellectuals are writing—James Baldwin and others—and as I watch the relationship between that and the black nationalist movements, I sense a stronger undercurrent of alienation and despair among the Negro people.

"This is not too clearly articulated yet except in the black nationalist and Black Muslim movements, where we find a total rejection of the American pattern as being incorrigibly hypocritical and corrupt and therefore unworkable in terms of a meaningful change in the status of the Negro. They seem to be coming into a terrifying and frightening thing."

I was talking with Dr. Clark at this point in his office at the YMCA, and I asked him to develop his view a little more deeply.

"If one dares to look for the common denominator of such seemingly different forms of Negro protest one gets into many areas of the American scene, including into politics.

Associated Press

GREENWOOD, MISS—". . . police dogs attacking not criminals but human beings who were asking only for the elementary rights of American citizens . . . only for the right to register to vote. . ."

Nor did he except Negroes from this affliction. He described New York's Negro Congressman, Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, as an exponent of "political slicksterism."

"He could become a symbol of a cynical disregard of any meaningful value system in the larger society by his exploitation of the prevailing hypocrisy, by his deliberate use of it," Dr. Clark said. "This seems to me to be the major contemporary danger in the country, and all the more dangerous because it is reflecting certain fundamental realities.

"Chief among them is the reality that the susceptible people in America have settled for racial hypocrisy and have been, in fact, for centuries parties to the perpetuation of these things."

Speaking about Congressman Powell, Dr. Clark said, "His greatest strength is that he can always make himself stronger simply by shouting, 'The whites are picking on me because I'm a Negro!' "

The psychologist pin-pointed a trend which other Negro men of affairs also had emphasized to me in these interviews—that Negro leadership today is in a crisis position along with race relations in general. He said:

"The confrontation now is clear, and what is required of the Negro leadership now is clear—namely, thrust and the push for full citizenship rights now. Responsible Negro leadership must dare to take the risks which they must take in order to achieve significant breakthroughs—not tokenism any longer, because tokenism is a part of what is precipitating the present alienation.

"If responsible Negro leadership is battle-weary and not able to mobilize itself and make the war significant—the movement in this direction of breakthroughs—then the result will be chaos as I see it.

"Chaos either in terms of overt social confusion, or what to me would be even worse—quiet dry rot. From the point of view of the national image, I think the latter would be worse."

The same points which Dr. Clark made on the need for a harder push and the greater insistence by Negroes that they be accepted as "human beings" also was emphasized to me by another Negro professional man. Dr. Clarence B. Jones, lawyer and general counsel for the Gandhi Society for Human Rights, Inc., a legal aid organization headed by the Rev. Martin Luther King jr., had said to me during an extended interview:

Frustration

"Negro demands are greater now, and the Negro wants . . to be accepted now as a man, completely, in our American . . society. He wants to be able, really to be able, to walk down . . the street as if a big burden had been relieved from him—to be able to walk into a restaurant here in New York and know that the only consideration is whether the menu is good, and he has the money to pay. Not to feel that he is walking in and suddenly there is a concern that this is a of racial controversies or crises. The bigots, the flagrant segregationists, alone could not be held responsible for a system of flagrant injustice and cruelty which seems to permeate our society. They, in order to have their way, would have to have the silent consent of our Christian churches. They need the alliance and the conspiracy of our labor unions and our labor leaders.

"They need and generally get the polysyllabic rationalizations of educators. They need the cynical connivance and conspiracy of our elected officials, North and South."

Cynicism

Analyzing the ways in which the Negroes have undertaken to meet the growing mood of despair and hopelessness, Dr. Clark said they have stepped up their traditional techniques of protest within the democratic processes, they are still lobbying, and their organizations are still trying to improve the plight of the Negro in America.

"But I think we ought to face the fact that our courts have been subverted and their edicts cynically evaded, ironically, even by those who have been sworn to uphold our laws. Negotiations have not worked in any effective way except in a few individual cases."

Saying that the traditional techniques have, however, been pushed aside lately for "more direct action techniques," dramatizing the injustices and bringing them to world attention, Dr. Clark discussed the Rev. Martin Luther King jr. in some detail.

Though praising Dr. King's efforts generally, the psychologist called Mr. King's "philosophy of love of the oppressor" as "psychologically unrealistic" and "guilt-producing" and "too close to the stereotype of the Negro for comfort, really."

His appraisal of the Black Muslims was that their philosophy is pure "racism."

"This is the mirrored image of the racism of the White Citizens Councils. It's a dangerous doctrine because the basic premises are true. I think this is the essence of the danger of the Black Muslim movement, the fact that they are not inventing nor for that matter are they even exaggerating or distorting the basic fact.

"White America has permitted a system of cruelty and barbarity to be perpetrated and perpetuated on citizens of dark skin color and the Muslims are very effective in saying this over and over again. They have the effectiveness of the simple target—statement of an undesirable fact. And they are dangerous also because hatred is an emotion that can be manipulated in the masses.

"Not just the Negro masses but one needs look at only recent history of the world to see how effectively hatred can be used to build powerful movements. There is no reason to believe that American Negroes are any more immune to the seductive lure of racial hatred than are other human beings."

Justice and equality for the American Negro must

"I say this because, as I read the things which Negro intellectuals are writing—James Baldwin and others—and as I watch the relationship between that and the black nationalist movements, I sense a stronger undercurrent of alienation and despair among the Negro people.

"This is not too clearly articulated yet except in the black nationalist and Black Muslim movements, where we find a total rejection of the American pattern as being incorrigibly hypocritical and corrupt and therefore unworkable in terms of a meaningful change in the status of the Negro. They seem to be coming into a terrifying and frightening thing."

I was talking with Dr. Clark at this point in his office at the YMCA, and I asked him to develop his view a little more deeply.

"If one dares to look for the common denominator of such seemingly different forms of Negro protest one gets dangerously close to identifying this as the rejection by the Negroes of the American promise."

"The Black Muslims state it categorically that way. In fact, they re-state it with such vehemence that it is easy to disregard the significance of it.

"But when you re-read what Baldwin was saying as he reacted to the Lumumba affair—on what was the meaning of the prompt attack on Ralph Bunche when Bunche attempted to apologize for the Negroes who disrupted the United Nations session—you found a 'Oh, the hell with you polite Negroes now' sentiment.

"You found a 'You had your chance to negotiate, to use the democratic processes, to use the courts, to use lobbying, legislation, and where has it gotten you? It's gotten tokenism, it's gotten moderation, it's gotten a new form of the same hypocritical adjustments that were standard before the Supreme Court decision. But it's gotten you no substantive change.' The conclusion is suggested that no substantive change is possible within the present power structure."

As to where identification with this kind of thinking is leading Negroes, the psychologist said:

"It could lead to lots of things. I am looking very hard at the possibility that it might be leading to increased forms of quiet, personal deterioration, despair and apathy."

Having noted evidences of this alienation of the Negro from the American "habit" among the intellectuals, and again among the masses at the bottom, who are giving most attentive ear to the Black Muslin preaching, I asked Dr. Clark about the Negro middle class which is growing in size.

"It is paradoxical," he said, "that although the Negro middle class is an expanding group, reflecting expanding prosperity and some advances in housing, still this trend of thinking in that group is not only not excluded but it's more profound there.

Primitivism

"It is true that on the surface the expanding middle class seems to be much closer to the middle-class American norm. But the irony is that this sense of alienation and despair seems to me as profound in this group, if not more so, as they approach closer to the so-called white norm.

"But its manner of expression is different. For example, you don't find this group with the Muslims. You find them, to the extent they take a stand at all, against the extremism, emotionality, fanaticism, primitivism, of the stark black-white approach of the Muslims.

"What you do find in your better-educated, middle-class Negro group is a confused, complicated despair of a different form. In a sense, the bigot is right when he says that to give the Negro anything merely makes him more impatient and insatiable for everything.

"As your middle-class Negro group approaches more equality, what remains to be done is more difficult to get done, because these include the areas of strongest defenses on the part of the more privileged status quo people. This includes housing and such things as total acceptance of the Negro as a human being in terms of his humanity rather than in terms of his skin color.

"If a man says to you, 'All right, you can come to this school,' that's not the whole battle, you know. When am I a man, just as another man, to this person? Or when is he constantly seeing me as a Negro with all the past inferences that go with this view of me?"

Dr. Clark turned to the failure of the Church, explaining that he was brought up as an Episcopalian and had served on the altar as a boy, but that when he got to college he began to sense a "hypocrisy" in the Church in its attitude toward Negroes and the race question.

In recent years, he said, "the hierarchy of the Church has been trying to get me back into policy discussions on this matter of race, and I've been working with the Department of Christian and Social Relations, analyzing the Church's position on it.

"I have reviewed and summarized a report, which I submitted to the Presiding Bishop, on the hypocrisy of the Church and the fact that the Church had been accessory to the Black Muslims by cutting the ground from under more responsible Negro leadership. This was done by its helping to perpetuate the hypocrisies which the Black Muslims exploit so effectively."

Later, in talking to the students at Kent, Dr. Clark said:

"Certainly the Christian Church has defaulted in its role as custodian of moral and ethical values and is now no longer relevant or significant as a factor in the amelioration of American racial tensions."

He spoke to me vigorously about American hypocrisy, saying that a kind of "slicksterism" is spreading insidiously sized to me by another Negro professional man. Dr. Clarence B. Jones, lawyer and general counsel for the Gandhi Society for Human Rights, Inc., a legal aid organization headed by the Rev. Martin Luther King jr., had said to me during an extended interview:

Frustration

"Negro demands are greater now, and the Negro wants.. ..to be accepted now as a man, completely, in our American.. ..society. He wants to be able, really to be able, to walk down.. ..the street as if a big burden had been relieved from him—to be able to walk into a restaurant here in New York and know that the only consideration is whether the menu is good, and he has the money to pay. Not to feel that he is walking in and suddenly there is a concern that this is a Negro, a black man, who is walking in. To be accepted as a man, that's it."

As to the urgency of the Negro demands, Mr. Jones had said:

"There is nothing inconsistent in my saying that the Negro wants his freedom now more than he wanted it yesterday, because there has been a passage of time between yesterday and today. And so he will want it even more urgently tomorrow than today because he didn't get it today."

In the seminar at Kent School, Dr. Clark summed up his picture of the present race crisis in there words:

"The crisis, I think, is a reflection of the profound frustration, despair, and the growing sense of hopelessness among Negroes that they can ever obtain justice, equality and democracy within the American system.

"There is a deep bitterness and disillusionment over recognition of the fact that white Americans can settle for the hypocrisy of tokenism as the price of social and racial peace. And awareness that the alleged gains in race relations within the past three or four decades are more illusory than real.

"Negroes are still segregated in schools, both in the North and the South. Job discrimination is still rampant and normative in the American economy. Indeed, the discrepancy in the economic status of the average white and the average Negro family is greater today than it was during the depths of the depression.

"Not that the Negro has not gained economically, but in terms of relative position with the whites the latest census material shows that there are much larger gaps.

"By all meaningful indices, the Negro is still and unquestionably of the downtrodden, disadvantaged group and he is systematically being robbed of his dignity as a human being, not only in the South but in many regions of America. And the major indictment here is that all of this is being done with the knowledge, and at times with the connivance, of respectable, moderate people who are not overtly bigots or segregationists.

"They are people who really want peace and don't want to be disturbed by direct involvement or knowledge danger of the Black Muslim movement, the fact that they are not inventing nor for that matter are they even exaggerating or distorting the basic fact.

"White America has permitted a system of cruelty and barbarity to be perpetrated and perpetuated on citizens of dark skin color and the Muslims are very effective in saying this over and over again. They have the effectiveness of the simple target—statement of an undesirable fact. And they are dangerous also because hatred is an emotion that can be manipulated in the masses.

"Not just the Negro masses but one needs look at only recent history of the world to see how effectively hatred can be used to build powerful movements. There is no reason to believe that American Negroes are any more immune to the seductive lure of racial hatred than are other human beings."

Justice and equality for the American Negro must either come now "or we must gird ourselves for a kind of disaster which I think is too horrible to contemplate," Dr. Clark said.

And Fanaticism

"By horror I mean not that there would be civil war in America, but I think it could be worse. I think we could have in America an American version of what happened in Nazi Germany."

Later, Dr. Clark told me that it was his belief that the Black Muslims would not win mass converts to the movement, "but almost for irrelevant reasons."

"It would be extremely disturbing to me if the Black Muslims were flexible enough to modify an aspect of their program which, so long as they keep it the way it is, tends to block a mass following.

"These people are austere, humorless, rigid, fanatic in their basic style, in their approach. The Negro masses are not fanatic in this literal, rigorous sense.

"The Negro masses are flexible. They've had to be in order to survive, for one thing. They are people whose love of life has been deep enough for them to be able to survive in the face of overwhelming oppression and cruelty and barbarity, and almost a death-wish apparent among whites has been countered by a life-wish among the Negroes."

Negroes are not puritanical, but want to smoke, eat well, and drink, the psychologist said, and this is the opposite of the qualities which the Black Muslims try to mold in their converts. The Black Muslims say, "No, you must be more virtuous than Caesar's wife," he added.

"As long as they keep saying this, I don't think I would worry about their mass attraction," Dr. Clark said. "I'll start worrying when they modify their demands on the Negro members and make these demands more consistent with what the Negro is able to respond to. Then I'll really worry about the Black Muslims."

TOMORROW: A Negro professor and poet looks back over thirty years of effort to advance Negro rights.

Herald Tribune photo by IRA ROSENBERG

Dr. Rayford W. Logan, left and Sterling B. Brown.

TEN NEGROES

This is the sixth article of the 10-part series, "Ten Negroes", by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird, on the attitudes of Negroes toward white America.

By Robert S. Bird
National Correspondent

An Angry Young Man of the 1920s, a Williams College man who took his master's at Harvard, was arguing with another Angry Young Man of the 1920s, also a Williams man who had taken his doctorate at Harvard—both Phi Beta Kappa—that things really haven't changed much in 40 years despite all the dramatics on the current scene.

It was a wonderful conversation to listen in on because it was so rich in wit, irony, insight, contradictions, affection and nostalgia.

And because it dealt with a most serious subject, one usually filled with rancor—race relations in America. The two men were Negroes.

Sterling B. Brown, author, essayist and poet, and one of the giants in literary scholarship on the Negro, was the Angry Young Man of the 1920s who was trying to convince his friend—who needed no convincing whatever—that the supposed young "New Negro" of today is no different from the one of four decades ago. Nor are many other aspects of the race situation.

The two men were talking on two or three levels at the same time, having fun with each other and fun with me, the interviewer, but all the while getting across to me some serious and deeply-felt points.

Mr. Brown is professor of English at Howard University in Washington, D. C., the biggest predominantly Negro university in the country. Among his serious points were:

¶That the Negro youngsters of 40 years ago were

More on TEN NEGROES—P 10

1,000 NEGROES MARCH ON BIRMINGHAM
Story of the Intense Fight for Civil Rights [illegible]

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

animated by the same high spirit of revolt and demands for Negro rights as those of today.

¶That it is "the times" rather than the young people which have changed.

¶That even though race conditions are being improved steadily in the country, certain basic problems remain exactly the same.

¶Above all, that the Negro youngsters of today tend to be too impatient for speed in race advancement, and they need perspective as to what the Negro has done during the last four decades and more.

"Nobody does his homework any more on the literature and history of the Negro in the past, and on what we were doing in those days," Prof. Brown said.

Angry Old Men

His friend, who couldn't agree more, is also a titan in the world of scholarship—Dr. Rayford W. Logan, professor of history, author of many books, articles and scholarly papers dealing with historical aspects of the Negro in America.

Prof. Brown explained that he and his friend are really Angry Young Men who have become Angry Old Men. People call them "conservatives," he said, because they believe in a slower but more realistic approach than the "all," "here" and "now" demands for speed which Dr. Martin Luther King jr. is advocating in the civil rights field.

I got the impression that the professors don't mind being called conservatives because they stand for a more gradual approach, but they don't want to be called "moderates."

"My position in the 1920s was that I knew that segregation couldn't be changed swiftly," Prof. Brown said. "I knew the South. I didn't need any talk about 'all deliberate speed'—although I think it has been too deliberate. But I couldn't conceive of anybody believing that it could be ended just like that—." He snapped his fingers.

"I knew enough sociology for that. So I didn't see why there should be a radical-to-moderate viewpoint in this matter. My point about the 'moderate' view was—and is—that, if the door is open, either you go in or you stay out. I don't see anybody standing in the middle of the door, just standing.

"The Meredith case at the University of Mississippi is an example of what I mean. There you had extremists on both sides at work. One group wanted Meredith out of the university, another group of extremists wanted him in.

"I didn't see any moderate position there. What do you do as a moderate, leave Meredith standing in the hallway? I can't conceive of the moderate position. The mob says, stay out, Mr. Meredith, and President Kennedy and the NAACP says, get him in. If the 'moderate' says he knows it won't happen over night, I don't know of any Negro with any sense at all who believes it will hapen over night."

"That's my criticism of some of these Angry Young Men of today," interjected Prof. Brown's friend, Dr. Logan. "When they say, we want it now, that's nonsense for they're not going to get it now."

Going on to Dr. King's strategy in the demonstrations in the South, Prof. Brown continued:

"Dr. King can't say to the public that these things will come later. You see, he's engaged in demagoguery in a good cause—he's not a social scientist. And to get all those people stirred up, he can't go telling them that 'time will take care of these things.' He's got to keep them feeling this sense of urgency, and that is the way these youngsters here at the university feel, too."

"Will you pin that point down, Sterling?" asked Dr. Logan. He is a short, round-faced man in contrast to Prof. Brown, who is tall, erect and large-framed. "This is the role, I think, that we Angry Old Men should play."

Firm Stand

"Yes, this is the role we've got to play in the presence of men who are saying things which privately I don't think they believe themselves," the English professor answered. "One of us has got to take the position, and state it publicly, that you cannot do it now."

Herald Tribune photos by IRA ROSENBERG

Dr. Rayford W. Logan, Professor of History

". . . they are not going to get it now . . ."

Sterling B. Brown, Professor of English

"I'm not belligerent . . . but I have had a gun pulled on me."

accounts for the widely held belief that what individual organizations are asking for 1963 is being asked for for the first time.

"To be specific, I don't believe that anyone has stated any better than Dr. W. T. B. DuBois at Harper's Ferry in 1906 what the Negro wants. He said at a commemorative gathering there:

" 'We will not be satisfied to take one jot or tittle less than our full manhood rights. We claim for ourselves every single right that belongs to a freeborn American, political, civil, and social, and until we get these rights, we will never cease to protest and assail the ears of America.' "

Something New

Prof. Brown listened with absorption as Dr. Logan enunciated, almost with declamatory effect, those words.

"I am impressed, Rayford, you have actually memorized that," he said. "I will have to second the things you have said. The times are new and people can get more now than did the youngsters I taught back 30 years ago. But those other youngsters had the same drive, even if not the organization. Nor was the world ready to take them, nor was the Herald Tribune as ready to publish our interviews. This is all something new."

Turning to a consideration of the agonized writings of James Baldwin today, Prof. Brown said:

"Baldwin is writing with passion, and Baldwin has a big following, but even he is saying nothing that Prof. E. Franklin Fraser has not said, that Dr. Rayford Logan has not said, that I have not said—except that Baldwin says it in his style, and it is an excellent style.

"The point is, Baldwin is THE Negro writer of the moment. The New Yorker magazine wouldn't take an article by us. The magazines wouldn't trust a college professor, he's too stuffy. Baldwin will admit this. Nevertheless, Baldwin knows from whom he has learned. I think he's a very skillful propagandist.

"My resentment is that some of the critics talk as if they came upon this Negro problem last night. They know nothing of the whole literature of the '30s and '40s."

Dr. Logan took over at this point to pay a compliment to Prof. Brown.

"A lot of the so-called original literary criticism in 1963 has been all too frequently taken without credit to Prof. Sterling Brown, who wrote it in his books years ago."

One book to which both these professors had contributed they particularly wanted me to have. That was because of the theme and title, "What the Negro Wants," [illegible] thanked the participants "for expressing their real opinions and making this book possible."

I asked about students' attitudes today, apart from their "hurry" to advance. Dr. Logan made an interesting point in contrasting the students of his day and those of today.

"We came from a community which was not rich but which had standards of respectability that did not result in the kind of problems which are all too common in Washington today," he said, referring to high crime rates and racial tensions. "We came from the best Negro high school in the United States, the old M. Street High School in Washington. Most of us went to New England colleges; Sterling and I to Williams, others to Amherst, Harvard, Bates, Wesleyan, Colby, and so on.

"But many of the students of Howard today are graduates of inferior schools in Washington, and you know the reasons why they are inferior. The Congressional people are just not giving the schools the money to construct the necessary facilities, to provide the teachers, and all the rest.

"But many of the students in the inferior schools are inferior students, comparatively speaking, because there have been three separate migrations of Negroes from the South into Washington. Many of the students today come from families which have suffered greatly in previous generations from the inequalities and inequities in the South.

"What amazes me is the fact that, despite these handicaps, many of our students perform very well. Some go off and get their doctorates at the best universities in the country."

I looked out the big bay windows of the study where we were sitting, and into the gathering dusk, and saw Dr. Logan and Prof. Brown, old warriors both, on a distant scene—one described in a paragraph in Prof. Brown's reminiscence in the volume, "The New Negro 30 Years Afterwards":

"Gay with youth, heady from attention, caught up along with much of America in ballyhoo, flattered by influential creators, critics, and publishers who had suddenly discovered the dark world at their doorstep, many Negroes helped to make a cult of Harlem. They set up their own Bohemia, sharing in the nation-wide rebellion from family, church, small town, and business civilization, but revolt from racial restrictions was sporadic. Rash in the spurt for sophistication, they typified one phase of American literary life in the '20s. A few magazines such as Fire and Harlem flared like rockets; good experiments jostled against much that was falsely atavistic and willfully sense at all who believes it will hapen over night."

"That's my criticism of some of these Angry Young Men of today," interjected Prof. Brown's friend, Dr. Logan. "When they say, we want it now, that's nonsense for they're not going to get it now."

Going on to Dr. King's strategy in the demonstrations in the South, Prof. Brown continued:

"Dr. King can't say to the public that these things will come later. You see, he's engaged in demagoguery in a good cause—he's not a social scientist. And to get all those people stirred up, he can't go telling them that 'time will take care of these things.' He's got to keep them feeling this sense of urgency, and that is the way these youngsters here at the university feel, too."

"Will you pin that point down, Sterling?" asked Dr. Logan. He is a short, round-faced man in contrast to Prof. Brown, who is tall, erect and large-framed. "This is the role, I think, that we Angry Old Men should play."

Firm Stand

"Yes, this is the role we've got to play in the presence of men who are saying things which privately I don't think they believe themselves," the English professor answered. "One of us has got to take the position, and state it publicly, that you cannot do it now."

"If these people who are being told they should have it now don't get it tomorrow, then they become desperate and run to the Black Muslims."

Dr. Logan nodded affirmation, saying, "This is very important, because we have it in Washington right now—the kind of disillusionment which makes for converts to the Muslims and to Communism."

We were gathered in the old 19th Century former residence of Howard University presidents, and a heavy rain was beating down on the campus outside our pleasant study. It helped to pull a curtain down around us and made it easier to go back 40 years in reminisence.

"I started out as a young fellow teaching at Virginia Seminary in Lynchburg in the 20s," Prof. Brown recalled. "Many of my students were young ministers who played on the football team, and they made trips on which they came to resent segregation more than ever.

"They would steal the signs, 'Whites' and 'Colored' for waiting rooms and bring them back to the dormitory rooms. They would try being surly to conductors on the trains. But they didn't have any discipline or organization such as CORE and SNCC give the students of today.

"There is a new behavior now, I must say, but the spirit is not new. You fought in those days and you fought alone. I'm not a belligerent person but I have had a gun pulled on me."

Rambling back through the years, Prof. Brown, who is 62, and Dr. Logan, 65, lingered with a mixture of bitterness and relish over their recollections of sleeping and eating in Pullman dining cars in the old days. There they were, distinguished scholars with degrees from leading colleges, gingerly kept out of sight in the railroad cars as if even the glimpse of them would be offensive to members of the "superior" white race.

"There was a compartment at one end of the train and the railroad company would give a Negro the whole compartment for the price of one ticket and one berth," Dr. Logan recalled. "But to keep up the fiction of inferiority, we were not permitted to close the door. The berth would be made up with the curtain hanging down just as if it had been in the open car. This was always called 'Lower 13.

"Then we could go back and eat in the dining room after the third call, not at the first call or the second call. But, you see, those white folks who lingered over their coffee at the end of the second call, who would have been, presumably, outraged at a Negro passenger coming in to eat, had to suffer our presence at a table when we came in after the third call.

Injustices

"But World War II did away with the third call for Negroes—only because there was too long a line, sometimes stretching out to another car. That's when the railroads decided to put up with us.

"They reserved two tables for us and we could go in any time. But the two tables were at the pantry end of the diner, and a green curtain was suspended from the ceiling to the floor around these tables so that the white passengers in the dining car couldn't see us eating."

"Do you remember, Rayford, the waiting room in the railroad station in Louisville?" asked Prof. Brown. "There were two doors side by side leading into the waiting room, one marked "White" and one marked 'Colored.' We had to go in the 'colored' door. But both doors led into the one waiting room and when you got inside you bought your tickets at the same window and mingled and rubbed shoulders with the white people.

"I was entering the waiting room with a white friend and he had to go in his door and I had to go in mine and just inside we joined up and continued our conversation. Oh, it was fantastic."

Both professors agreed that the full story of past injustices needed to be retold to the present generation which is so angry at even lingering traces of the commonplace mistreatments of yesteryear.

The idea of the "New Negro" was coming into first flowering in the 20s, they emphasized, and they gave me a 1955 booklet to which each of them had contributed an article commemorating the late Alain Locke's "The New Negro: An Interpretation," published in 1922. Howard's division of social sciences got out the paperback volume entitled "The New Negro 30 Years Afterward," in which distinguished Negro contributors re-created the yeasty ferment of the Negro Angry Young Men of those days, including the bursting new bohemia in New York's Harlem.

"There is practically nothing being asked for, or urged, or demanded by Negroes today that was not asked for, urged and demanded many years ago," Dr. Logan said. "The failure to realize this is a result of ignorance of the history of the Negro in a very large measure, and this Herald Tribune as ready to publish our interviews. This is all something new."

Turning to a consideration of the agonized writings of James Baldwin today, Prof. Brown said:

"Baldwin is writing with passion, and Baldwin has a big following, but even he is saying nothing that Prof. E. Franklin Fraser has not said, that Dr. Rayford Logan has not said, that I have not said—except that Baldwin says it in his style, and it is an excellent style.

"The point is, Baldwin is THE Negro writer of the moment. The New Yorker magazine wouldn't take an article by us. The magazines wouldn't trust a college professor, he's too stuffy. Baldwin will admit this. Nevertheless, Baldwin knows from whom he has learned. I think he's a very skillful propagandist.

"My resentment is that some of the critics talk as if they came upon this Negro problem last night. They know nothing of the whole literature of the '30s and '40s."

Dr. Logan took over at this point to pay a compliment to Prof. Brown.

"A lot of the so-called original literary criticism in 1963 has been all too frequently taken without credit to Prof. Sterling Brown, who wrote it in his books years ago."

One book to which both these professors had contributed they particularly wanted me to have. That was because of the theme and title, "What the Negro Wants," and because of the fact that the publisher, W. T. Couch of the University of North Carolina, "disavowed" it in his introduction.

The volume was published in 1944 and Mr. Couch apparently thought that the editor, who was Dr. Logan, and most of the contributors, including Prof. Brown, were reaching too far.

"While I disagree with the editor and most of the contributors on basic problems," the publisher had written, he South into Washington. Many of the students today come from families which have suffered greatly in previous generations from the inequalities and inequities in the South.

"What amazes me is the fact that, despite these handicaps, many of our students perform very well. Some go off and get their doctorates at the best universities in the country."

I looked out the big bay windows of the study where we were sitting, and into the gathering dusk, and saw Dr. Logan and Prof. Brown, old warriors both, on a distant scene—one described in a paragraph in Prof. Brown's reminiscence in the volume, "The New Negro 30 Years Afterwards":

"Gay with youth, heady from attention, caught up along with much of America in ballyhoo, flattered by influential creators, critics, and publishers who had suddenly discovered the dark world at their doorstep, many Negroes helped to make a cult of Harlem. They set up their own Bohemia, sharing in the nation-wide rebellion from family, church, small town, and business civilization, but revolt from racial restrictions was sporadic. Rash in the spurt for sophistication, they typified one phase of American literary life in the '20s. A few magazines such as Fire and Harlem flared like rockets; good experiments jostled against much that was falsely atavistic and willfully shocking . . ."

Two scholarly, urbane and charming men who are pleased to call themselves Angry Old Men, and ought to be allowed that right.

TOMORROW—An "average" Negro girl of taste and refinement tells of the discriminatory restraints she feels living in New York, and compares them with the freedom she felt when she lived abroad.

TEN NEGROES

This is the seventh article of a 10-part series, "Ten Negroes," by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird, on Negroes' views of White America.

By Robert S. Bird
National Correspondent

Who wouldn't wish for Eloise Calloway happy days and blessings true, golden joys and fortunes bright, and a heart that's ever light?

In most ways she already has nearly everything the average girl would want except a million dollars.

She's conspicuously attractive, has impeccable taste and a flair for dress. Her figure is superb with health and grace. Her voice is warm and her almond eyes lovely and upsetting. Her smile is radiant, and she hasn't a mean thought in her styled-hairdo head. She's 27, regularly dates several interesting men, and has a good secretarial job in lower mid-Manhattan.

She is also a Negro. And she is deeply discontented.

This you would never know unless she confided in you, for her mouth is framed in a gay greeting to the world. Miss Calloway believes that this deep-down-inside feeling of dissatisfaction comes from her profound urge to travel and live abroad. Not to live abroad permanently but, say, for a couple of years at a time. Then a spell back here at home, then more time abroad.

She is not just day-dreaming about this. Several years ago that deep restlessness impelled her to get a job with the foreign service, and she lived in Israel for two years as a secretary with a Point Four mission in the United States Embassy in Tel Aviv.

During those two years, her discontent vanished completely. She felt she was living in paradise. Then, after two years, the mission was phased out of Israel, its job accomplished, and she had to return to New York. The old feeling descended on her again when she got off the plane at Idlewild Airport a year and a half ago. And now, beneath the surface of her life, it bothers her more than ever.

I interviewed Miss Calloway at great length for this series on insights into Negro thinking and feeling, because I had known, when living in Israel myself, something of her popularity and happy times even though I was not acquainted with her personally.

My thought was that she would be able to draw an

More on TEN NEGROES—P 12

Herald Tribune photo by MORRIS WARMAN

Eloise Calloway in her office on E. 16th St.

". . . my color made no difference to them. . ."

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

interesting contrast between the experience of an "average" nice, American Negro girl living in another country and living here in New York. Though it turned out that she was not able to appraise the difference, she was able to discribe it vividly to me.

We were sitting in a restaurant in Greenwich Village one evening recently when she recounted to me her unforgettable experience of arriving in Israel—she's a sensitive and refined girl brought up in Harlem, educated in an integrated high school, with a year of study at City College.

She had high expectations from the start but it was a long trip, that 7,000 miles from New York to Tel Aviv, and it was 2 o'clock in the morning Israeli time when she arrived at the airport in Lydda, near Tel Aviv.

"It was in January and it was lightly raining but quite warm, and a group of people from the mission had come to the airport to meet me," she said. "I was introduced around to everybody and made to feel I was one of them right from the start. But I was terribly tired as well as happy, and it was a long drive from the airport to my apartment. I had never had an apartment of my own before.

"But I hardly had time to think about that then, I was so tired. All I wanted was to lay down my poor, tired, body and go to sleep—and that I did. I was told that I would have breakfast the following morning with one of the girls who worked at the mission.

"And then I woke up in the morning. At first I didn't know where I was—then it hit me, I was in Israel. I jumped out of bed and saw there was a balcony right outside my bedroom.

"I slipped into a negligee and went out on the balcony into a bright, sunny day, a gorgeous day. There were flowers everywhere. Everything was so green. It was a Sunday. I thought, 'My God, what a beautiful place.' I remembered about how far away I was from home, and it was a joyful feeling. I suppose that was because the sun was shining so brightly and everything was so green and beautiful and it was just, you know . . ."

Her voice trailed off in ecstatic silence just thinking about it. It was much later in our conversations that Miss Calloway mentioned to me that all thoughts of race and race problems had on that morning dropped away from her for the first time and were gone from her mind for the next two years.

I asked her how fast or slowly her social acquaintance began in Israel, and she indicated that it had started with a rush.

"As a matter of fact, it started the next day, on Monday, when I became very friendly with a white girl employed in the mission. She invited me to her apartment for dinner, and then one of the men in the mission invited me out. And they introduced me to Israelis, and Israelis invited me out.

"Very quickly I was going out on dates, going here and going there, to parties, to dinners—I didn't have a free night."

Miss Calloway's life in Israel was completely interracial, and largely international in the sense that her friends were both white Americans and Israelis.

I asked Miss Calloway to tell me what she enjoyed most in this life abroad, and she made it clear that it was this free social life and the joy of travel—for her diplomatic passport made it possible for her to move freely with her other American friends from the embassy staff across the borders into the nearby Arab countries. And these were unforgettable experiences, too.

But the key thought this Harlem girl offered in contrasting life in a foreign country with life in America was this:

"I guess mainly the thing when I was away was that I didn't come in contact with the racial problem. As a matter of fact, I'm not really in contact with that sort of thing now. I mean, I just read about it.

"But while I was away I didn't experience any of this racial—" she didn't complete the sentence. "I just sort of forgot about the whole thing, sort of left it behind. And I was treated on an equal basis along with the whites in Israel, and there was no such thing as discrimination. You were accepted as a human being.

"Then after I got back home, then I realized—I guess it just hit me much harder than it did before I went away."

She looked at me solemnly and thoughtfully for a moment or two, and then she brightened up as if determined not to spoil my enjoyment of my chicken pie by [illegible] I had heard often in my weeks

So when she returned to New York and to her old inner discontent she took up her former, familiar life in Harlem, but in the new job with the Air Force.

The girls do not double date. As a matter of fact, her roommates tell her she is too choosy about her men friends.

"I think I AM choosy," she said complacently, "I know what I want when I date a man. I like the ambitious type, well-educated, interested in lots of things, a man who knows where he is going."

From the complete inter-racial social life of Israel, she now dates only with Negro men. I asked her if it bothered her that she doesn't have more of an inter-racial social life now.

"Oh, no, no, no," she said. "It doesn't bother me at all that I am dating only Negro boys. It isn't that I want to date white boys in particular—as a matter of fact it doesn't make any difference what color they are. Color does not make the difference. If I feel like dating a white boy I will date one. It's not that I want to date one as badly as all that."

'Forgot I Was,' 'Negro'

"I have never been discriminated against, I don't think, except once or twice when I was looking for a particular job. I did experience discrimination in that field—but working on the job, I have never been discriminated against. It's not a feeling of discrimination that I have in New York. I don't know how to explain it but when I went away I completely forgot that I was a Negro, more or less.

"In Israel I was treated as something special, I guess, and when I came home I became an ordinary individual."

Why, I asked her, is she not married? She smiled brightly on that one.

"I don't know, i'ts just that I don't think I am prepared to get myself bogged down in married life yet. I certainly want to travel some more. My social life was far more interesting abroad than it is here. I had a much better apartment, I could entertain, I imagine I could get a nice apartment here, too, but it would be much more expensive."

She is currently dating three men regularly but is not involved in heavy romance with any of them. Nor do they konw each other. She did not want to discuss them except to say that she enjoys going out with all of them, and all of them treat her very nicely. One is a dentist, one a real estate broker, and one a police officer.

It is very evident that when Miss Calloway goes out for the evening she goes with a certain amount of style. She dresses exquisitely, and she has innate dignity.

On her dates she often goes to prestige restaurants downtown, she said, but even more often drops into one of the Harlem places—Carl's Corner, Small's Paradise, the Red Rooster, and places of that kind. She and her "date" have cocktails and dinner and talk mostly about the theater, entertainment subjects and such chit-chat, with occasional conversations on racial matters which are in the news. But not much of that.

"I like nice people around me, a nice decor, an intimate atmosphere and some entertainment or dancing, because I love to dance," she said.

On my own workaday date with Miss Calloway at the restaurant in the Village she was wearing a soft gray suit of genuine distinction and a black, armless blouse. She had a turquoise necklace and a turquoise ring on her finger and a gold bracelet. She can carry all this without seeming to be a bit overdressed.

I asked her about the origin of her jewelry. She said she had bought the ring in Cairo, the bracelet (made of small, thin gold coins) in Turkey, and the necklace came from Iran.

She does her shopping in Fifth Avenue stores, she said, and her intellectual reading fare consists of a national news magazine, the morning paper and the Atlantic Monthly magazine.

She has no intellectual pretensions but she visits a museum exhibit occasionally, likes good movies, and goes frequently to the theater and ballet with her "dates." As to marriage, that's a subject she always shrugs off as something for the future—after more travel.

I had in the back of my mind as I talked with Miss Calloway a thing which Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, City College profesor of psychology, had said to me. He is an outstanding Negro psychologist himself.

Dr. Clark had said:

[illegible] of the American racial prob-

I didn't come in contact with the racial problem. As a matter of fact, I'm not really in contact with that sort of thing now. I mean, I just read about it.

"But while I was away I didn't experience any of this racial—" she didn't complete the sentence. "I just sort of forgot about the whole thing, sort of left it behind. And I was treated on an equal basis along with the whites in Israel, and there was no such thing as discrimination. You were accepted as a human being.

"Then after I got back home, then I realized—I guess it just hit me much harder than it did before I went away."

She looked at me solemnly and thoughtfully for a moment or two, and then she brightened up as if determined not to spoil my enjoyment of my chicken pie by talking killjoy talk. But I had heard often, in my weeks of interviewing, other Negroes also say they wanted to be treated as human beings.

The Explanation

"Exactly what does that phrase, being treated as a human being, mean to you," I asked Miss Calloway.

"The feeling that I got was," she explained, "that the fact I was a Negro—my color—made no difference to them over there. I felt freer. It didn't matter to them that I was a Negro."

As a matter of fact, Israeli friends told me that Miss Calloway was one of the most popular American girls among the younger set of any in Israel.

But in her reminiscence, it seemed to me that what Miss Calloway felt most of all was an atmosphere, an enchanting atmosphere which was certainly real but which may also have been in the nature of an escape.

"I used to love to sit at the cafes on Dizongoff Circle and watch the people pass back and forth," she said. "It was just wonderful."

But what, I asked, was so wonderful about it (although I knew it was wonderful)?

"I don't know," she answered with a faraway look in her fresh-as-morn eyes, "just watching, I guess. Watching the people walking up and down. Sometimes you'd see the same faces three or four times, passing back and forth. Oh, that carefree air about the Israelis, laughing and talking and meeting with their friends, and then sitting at the cafe themselves.

"They would sit there for hours and hours and sip their coffee or their soft drinks as if they didn't have a care in the world. Such a relaxed feeling! It made me feel good, it really did."

From time to time, members of the mission would plan excursions for week ends to Beirut in Lebanon, to Damascus in Syria, to the fabulous Old City of Jerusalem through the Mandelbaum Gate into Jordan, and once she went on a tour lasting for more than a week into Egypt, visiting Cairo and Luxor and the other fabulous places.

Everywhere she went she felt free and happy and very much alive.

But there was a nagging thought away in the back of her mind. She was attached to a dying mission. It was under directive to phase out of Israel by degrees, and even from the time she first went there the mission was in process of slow liquidation.

"I often did not have enough work to do and I felt useless. I often thought why don't I just request a move to another mission. But I liked Israel too much, and I never made the request. I just thought as each day came along, maybe it will get better. But it got worse and in December, 1961, I found I was leaving Israel."

It was far more difficult for Miss Calloway to explain how the matter of race has affected her now that she is back in New York—because she does not feel any specific, personal discrimination against herself.

What she feels is more the atmosphere of race distinctions, race troubles, and race outrages on the general scene. This atmosphere is all around her again. And it seems as if she has become, after her return, a kind of unwilling, indirect participant in a problem which is very unpleasant—for even her younger, student brother at Clark University in Atlanta is joining in race demonstrations.

It is evident that her life is much more circumscribed here, and that she is more of a "loner" than in earlier years before she went away.

In fairness to her, she did not say these things directly but this was the interpretation that I got from what she did say.

Although Harlem-born, her mother was careful to see that she got as much education as possible in integrated schools—first the Joan of Arc Junior High School on 93d Street, then the Washington Irving High School at 16th St. and Irving Place. She made many white friends in these schools and they did a lot of socializing while they were in school, but over the years they have lost contact with each other.

And her parents moved out to Long Island about eight years ago, leaving her faced with a choice to make about her own life and career.

She decided to stay in Harlem because she was "used to it," and she joined with two Negro girl friends in setting up an apartment together in lower Harlem. It is a big place with a bedroom for each girl, a living room large enough for all, and a working-size kitchen with a well-stocked larder. The girls have got along together fine for eight years—with time out while she sojourned in Israel. from Iran.

She does her shopping in Fifth Avenue stores, she said, and her intellectual reading fare consists of a national news magazine, the morning paper and the Atlantic Monthly magazine.

She has no intellectual pretensions but she visits a museum exhibit occasionally, likes good movies, and goes frequently to the theater and ballet with her "dates." As to marriage, that's a subject she always shrugs off as something for the future—after more travel.

I had in the back of my mind as I talked with Miss Calloway a thing which Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, City College profesor of psychology, had said to me. He is an outstanding Negro psychologist himself.

Dr. Clark had said:

"Among the complexities of the American racial problem is the fact that problems of personal adjustment and personal difficulties which would be true for individuals without regard to race, we Negroes have complicated even more in this overriding racial problem of ours.

"It becomes extremely difficult at times to tell where one begins and the other ends in trying to understand the role of a particular person."

I repeated this view of Dr. Clark to Miss Calloway and asked her if she thought she was seeking an escape from the fact that she was a Negro girl.

She smiled and said in her gentle and lovely voice:

"I don't think so. I want to travel for very real reasons. I love travel. Take my trip to Egypt. I had read as a child about the pyramids and the Sphynx and riding on camels and all those wonderful things. And then I went to Egypt and I saw them, and I rode on a camel. And it was all much, much more wonderful, even, than imagining them when reading about it. Isn't that good enough reason for wanting to travel?"

I answered truthfully that I couldn't agree with her more. This much is certain: She will make some husband a wonderful traveling companion, and she will enhance the scenery wherever she goes.

TOMORROW: The Negro principal of a high school in the District of Columbia's racially troubled 2nd Precinct describes forward-looking programs being tried out.

Herald Tribune photo by IRA ROSENBERG

Dr. Bennetta B. Washington, educator

One-third of her 9th graders are below 5th grade level

TEN NEGROES

THIS is the eighth of the 10-part series, "Ten Negroes," by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird, on Negroes' views of white America.

By Robert S. Bird
National Correspondent

The growing horde of semi-literate and largely unemployable Negro youngsters who are being released from city school systems as "drop-outs" is being cited on all sides as a tragedy and peril for this country.

The problem is especially aggravated in the District of Columbia—in the heart of the nation's capital—where an unending debate centers on the situation.

One day recently I visited a high school in the slum-ridden and racially troubled part of Washington that lies just to the west of Howard University, scarcely 20 minutes' drive from the White House.

My idea was to talk with the Negro principal, Dr. Bennetta B. Washington, about the human side of her 1,700 pupils—avoiding altogether the morass of arguments in the vast, endless abstract debate that is going on.

Cardozo High School is a huge, four-story structure that looks like any of a hundred big city high schools built between the two World Wars.

More on TEN NEGROES—P 12

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

It stands with a dominating look of importance in the neighborhood, which is itself not at all a noisome tenement area but a place of shabby single, double and multiple-family houses, many with their own tiny porches, lawns and yards. Rows of trees along the sidewalks attest to its former better-class status.

Dr. Washington is a warm, slightly plump woman whose high reputation as an outstanding school principal was described to me by several Negro educators and professional men who are worried about the general situation.

She is one of those extraordinarily busy women who are somehow able to make time for a visitor. She made me comfortable in her office near the front door of the school, ordered coffee for us both, and plunged right into the problem.

'Pathetic Despair'

"We have about 163 of the 450 ninth-graders who are below the fifth-grade level," she said. "They are products of the overcrowded educational situation. They have such despair it's just pathetic. And when we look into the community we find a great lack of jobs, broken homes, and parents who just don't think that education is the answer to their plight.

"The consequence is there is a lack of aspiration among the children, and we find a kind of acting out in the behavior of some of them—hostility toward other children and teachers—and among others a quiet acceptance, a withdrawal and a passive resistance.

"This is a real challenge in the field of education, the ability to understand and perceive the problem of these youngsters. And it is hard to expect this from a great many of the Negro teachers who come from middle class backgrounds.

"Some of these teachers who have come out here simply cannot relate to it because it's too close to them. Some Negro people can't handle it. It's too agonizing. Such teachers often feel that what they see in the school is just too symptomatic of the larger problem.

"Why is the pupil acting the way he is acting? Why doesn't he have respect for school? What are the things against which the child is being defensive? Such teachers understand all right, I think, but they identify with it personally and find themselves unable to face up and work through the problem."

Dr. Washington's high school is what is called a comprehensive mid-city school devoted to the development of students from a cross section of the city's population. She herself is an authority on problem youngsters. Author of "Background Factors and Adjustment," she earned her bachelor's and master's degrees from Howard University and her doctor of philosophy from the Catholic University of America. She is the wife of Walter E. Washington, and is the mother of a teen-age daughter herself.

The great part of the pupils at this school are in the two middle "tracks" or courses of study—the general track which can prepare pupils for college if they measure up, and one which brings them to a terminal point in their education and gives them skills for business jobs.

A lower track gives "basic" education to children who, though not necessarily below normal in ability or aptitude, are nevertheless functioning on the basic level.

But the study courses which seem to excite Dr. Washington the most, and are intensely "human" to hear about, are the Honors course for exceptionally talented youngsters from the Negro slums, and a course aimed at enticing potential male drop-outs to stay in school a little longer so as to become, at least, employable in the outside world.

'A Work-Study Course'

This last course in effect prepares boys to become maintenance men—janitors—but not ordinary ones. Rather knowledgable ones who are able to say how a particular floor covering ought to be cleaned and how one kind of paint differs from another.

Actually, this is an experimental work-study course for boys who are retarded in reading and mathematics. handicapped in many ways by their background environment. They carry an extra load of subjects and are supported all the way through by the teachers in maintaining the highest morale. There are currently about 25 students in the Honors program, Dr. Washington said:

"The same teachers work with them right through their course—and these are teachers who like kids, who don't look down their noses at them, who expect the children to learn, and who are able to stimulate a response in the youngsters. For despite his despair, every child has an urge to learn.

"Also, underneath all a parent's problems and excuses, every parent is concerned about his child's education. He just doesn't want to be blamed for the obvious problems. And this is why we try to work with the parents, too.

"In the Honors program we provide a complete orientation job. We give support to scholarship talent. We work with the American Association of University Women in special programs to acquaint the youngsters with the theater, the art galleries, museums, and to learn about the colleges.

"Beyond the regular school counseling, many of these women holds teas in their homes to establish a rapport with the youngsters and to introduce them to the college idea.

I asked Dr. Washington to tell me more about the background aspects of these children.

"In some ways their background is distinctive," she said. With these exceptional pupils, there has not been the same kind of distorted childhood as with many of the other children. These are children who have experienced some success. Somewhere along the way they experienced a positive constructive relationship with some adult who was close to them. Everything wasn't hatred in the household.

"It was not necessarily a parent, but some one within the family, even if it was a broken family. Some adult—perhaps an adored grandmother—held the child to a high level of expectation, and this helped to produce the high motivation which the child has today."

A White Teacher Talks

The principal had telephoned to an Honors course teacher, inviting her to tell me a little about these bright pupils, and soon there appeared in the office Mrs. Joan Wofford, a young white teacher. It didn't require much more than a look at Mrs. Wofford to see that she must be practically perfect as a teacher for a bunch of brainy young kids from underprivileged backgrounds.

Mrs. Wofford has a built-in, upbeat grin; eyes that are so alert it seems surprising that they are also filled with warmth and enthusiasm, and as quick a mind as any one I ever talked with. She is married to a young Rhodes Scholar lawyer, and she was teaching in an upper-class white suburban high school in the Boston area when Dr. Washington persuaded her to come to Cardozo.

"Many of these youngsters are not caught up yet to the point where my pupils were in the white school," Mrs. Wofford said, "but they are every bit as bright and three times as excited. It's a thrill to work with them.

"They're not in the slightest bit blasé, as they were in my white school, and they are not hampered by the same preconceptions. In my other school they started out with a bias against Shakespeare, certain that he was boring. But these youngsters never heard about Shakespeare until they got into this program.

"Really, it's a thrill to see them react. I suggested to some of them that they try reading Plato, and a few days later I came into the classroom and found them all arguing heatedly, passionately, over Plato's ideas. Remember, they're only ninth-graders.

"These are unusual kids in another sense, considering the backgrounds of most of them. Somewhere they got the idea early in their school life that books could be interesting. Maybe there was a book or two at home, or perhaps somebody in the home was a reader, or a parent was terribly strict and made the child read.

"Even at this age level it is not too late to pull these children up to college level. But we don't have half enough money for books. They have a hunger for books. They're reading like mad. I buy paperback books for them, but we really need lots more books.

though not necessarily below normal [illegible] are nevertheless functioning on the basic level.

But the study courses which seem to excite Dr. Washington the most, and are intensely "human" to hear about, are the Honors course for exceptionally talented youngsters from the Negro slums, and a course aimed at enticing potential male drop-outs to stay in school a little longer so as to become, at least, employable in the outside world.

'A Work-Study Course'

This last course in effect prepares boys to become maintenance men—janitors—but not ordinary ones. Rather knowledgable ones who are able to say how a particular floor covering ought to be cleaned and how one kind of paint differs from another.

Actually, this is an experimental work-study course for boys who are retarded in reading and mathematics. These are indicators which help to measure the youngsters who have a high degree of absenteeism from school and are heading for the swelling multitude of drop-outs starting out in adult life unable to find jobs for themselves.

"The idea of this course," explained Dr. Washington, "is to give these boys a good training in building maintenance and along with that to give them a positive concept of themselves. It is to lure back into classes for this kind of special training boys who were coming to school only sporadically or not all.

"We are already able to see a great change in many of these boys who have come back to learn the job of maintenance—the composition of different materials, how to clean windows, and practical things like that.

"As they learn from this course a new respect for the vocation of maintenance work, we see in them a new neatness in the way they dress. Most of them are doing part-time work. We are teaching them how to operate on a budget, and we have a school bank. It's amazing to see the change in them."

Actually, Dr. Washington's enthusiasm is based on the measure of what, potentially, can be done with these youngsters rather than on any mass program to help solve the larger problem. This is only experimental, and at present not more than 20 boys are taking the course. But it points in a hopeful new direction.

"We have two goals for potential drop-outs," Dr. Washington said. "Either to return them back into the main school life and try to get them to finish high school, or to enable them to make the transition from school to an actual job.

"In support of this employment effort we are writing to prospective employers in a beginning effort at job placement, we are teaching the pupils how to talk to people, and we are giving them needed help in reading. A few boys have responded enough to go back to taking four subjects in the regular school."

In the middle track groups, special encouragement is needed for pupils, too, according to this understanding principal.

"The average student in the college course track does not have high enough motivation and is not well book-oriented. Nor do they recognize the scholarship opportunities. So they need to be constantly stimulated and taught that college is achievable for them, that it is not beyond their grasp.

"Those who want to go from high school into business also have to be stimulated, and we really work hard to ease the transition for them from school into business jobs. Our aim is to make them acceptable for Grade 4 clerk-typist jobs in government, and to equip them for the Civil Service examination they would have to take."

But there is still another course of study in this school —and this is the one that is yielding the most spectacular results of all. More than that, it emphasizes in the most human terms possible the tragedy in neglect of these young Negro children from broken and impoverished homes.

The course is the top one in the school—the Honors course, now in its second year. For this, Dr. Washington has found it most important that the pupils have an integrated staff, and her teachers in this course are exceptionally well trained. This is for exceptional children, pupils who, though they may come from an environment of poverty, have an unusually high I.Q. and unusually high motivation .

These youngsters are top-notch college material, though

"Really, it's a thrill to see them react. I suggested to some of them that they try reading Plato, and a few days later I came into the classroom and found them all arguing heatedly, passionately, over Plato's ideas. Remember, they're only ninth-graders.

"These are unusual kids in another sense, considering the backgrounds of most of them. Somewhere they got the idea early in their school life that books could be interesting. Maybe there was a book or two at home, or perhaps somebody in the home was a reader, or a parent was terribly strict and made the child read.

"Even at this age level it is not too late to pull these children up to college level. But we don't have half enough money for books. They have a hunger for books. They're reading like mad. I buy paperback books for them, but we really need lots more books.

"They are so interested and so unsophisticated that they will read anything—from Chaucer's Middle English and Shakespeare's poetry to 'To Kill a Mockingbird.' All of it is exciting to them."

The principal and Mrs. Wofford emphasized that these young people in the Honors course were simply picked right out of the general body of pupils.

"I can't believe that we couldn't up the number of kids of college caliber by one-third," Mrs. Wofford said. "But we would need money, books and counseling."

The Teacher Problem

Dr. Washington discussed the teacher problem in a school such as hers, where many of the pupils have fear and hostility. Washington public schools are reported to be plagued with physical violence by the pupils. But this principal says much of the trouble occurs when teachers fail to understand that the children have no way of curbing their anger, and the teacher responds with "power" instead of understanding. Instead of understanding the child, she said, these teachers speak back and exacerbate the situation.

"Everything depends on how the teacher handles her power," she explained. "Some teachers act as if the kids were a captive audience, held there by force. The teacher parades her power. The child recognizes this power and in turn tris to exhibit his own power, and the two get into a power struggle.

"A better way for a teacher to act would be to take the attitude, 'I accept you as a person, I value your worth, but I don't accept your behavior.'"

Having in mind the slum environment of these children in Cardozo High School, I asked, altogether separately, a professor of sociology in Washington, Dr. J. Franklin Edwards, about the effect of environment on the pupil.

"Many of these youngsters live under the most adverse conditions emotionally," he said. "Broken families, tense situations, poverty. Also, many of them are not getting enough to eat. A study was made on this here in Washington and they found that in the kindergarten and first grades, pupils who were not doing well had low hemoglobins.

"They just didn't have enough hemoglobin, and so they didn't feel well. But more than that, they had all kinds of emotional problems. They drooled and they cried easily. They were hypersensitive, they slept in their chairs. These were youngsters who should have been in the third grade, but were still in first grade."

In one aspect of home environment, Prof. Edwards agreed completely with Dr. Washington and Mrs. Wofford —that cultural poverty was handicapping these youngsters, and one sign of it was that they just didn't get to read early, and they went on through the grades increasingly handicapped.

"The 1,700 youngsters in this school," Dr. Washington told me, "do and must represent every facet of the general population. We have some superior pupils, and it is up to us to devise a program to try to identify these and give them as stimulating a course of study as possible.

"We must try to enrich academically their backgrounds and raise their sights. And this means working with the wamilies. Until the community can give this support to the school, until it can do this kind of thing, the problem will remain."

TOMORROW: The leading Negro magazine publisher of the country views the race situation from a self-made successful business man's viewpoint.

Herald Tribune

Ebony's publisher John H. Johnson

TEN NEGROES

THIS is the ninth article of the 10-part series, "Ten Negroes," by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird, on Negroes' views of white America.

By Robert S. Bird
National Correspondent

Besides wanting their full civil rights and equality with white Americans, most Negroes would like to have —just as most white Americans would—mink coats for their women, beautiful automobiles, lushly decorated homes, talented careers, fascinating friends, trips around the world, castles in Spain, and all the rest.

Negroes are by no means excluded from this life of grandeur but, as in the case of the white population, only a small fraction of them manage to scale the heights.

The rest read about it and enjoy it in articles and pictures in Ebony, a slick-paper, prestige magazine for Negro readers modeled after the format of Life magazine.

The world depicted in Ebony is primarily a Negro world, but also an interracial world of glamour and achievement. Basically it is a real world for those who have reached it, although somewhat prettied up for presentation to the readers.

One Negro who has made the climb into this prestigious world is John H. Johnson, president of the Johnson Publishing Co. of Chicago. He and his wife created Ebony, and they, together with his mother, own and publish it alnog with three other magazines for Negroes and a new but expanding list of book titles.

More on TEN NEGROES—P 14

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

It seemed to me, in seeking peepholes into Negro thinking and feeling, that the man who published Ebony might nave some interesting viewpoints, and I arranged to talk with him in his quietly sumptuous office in Chicago.

He is an impressive man of 45, brimming with physical and mental vigor, good cheer and friendliness. And he displays a frank simplicity of manner which invests him with special dignity and distinction.

He obviously enjoys his success. At the same time he seems to have forgotten nothing of his impoverished boyhood in rural Arkansas, and nothing of the early years in Chicago when he and his mother, a domestic who never got beyond the third grade, were on the relief rolls there. That was for a short time in the 1930s.

This gives him a real sense of identification with Negro youngsters who are at the threshold of their own careers, and he talked to me at length about it.

But before I touch on that, Mr. Johnson's view of the Negro world of glamor as depicted in his magazine Ebony, in articles and pictures about successful and interesting Negro people, ought to be given first.

"I think that all of us ought to devote all our effort toward improving the community and the world we live in," he said, "but I think at some point the Negro ought to have a right to be a human being in the fullest sense of the word. He ought to have the right to give a party, go to a country club if he likes, buy a mink coat for his wife if he has the money, take a skiing trip somewhere, visit the Riviera.

"Now I don't think the Negroes who are able to do some of these things are made alien to other Negroes, nor does it put them apart from the others. This is just another way of expressing his interest in being a human being.

"And I want to say this, I don't picture this world as a separate world. What we depict are Negroes who, through their own efforts, or by birth or accident or some other means, are able to acquire what all other people want. And it is exactly the same in the white world, where the majority enjoy reading about the people at the top.

"What I think I am doing is showing the readers that we have all strata in our society as in the general society. We're showing Negroes that some of us are able to make it. One of our most widely read sections is called 'Speaking of People,' and it deals with employment, really—new jobs that people have found for themselves."

Mr. Johnson's office is in the superbly decorated Madison Avenue executive style, with quiet-toned carpet and fabrics, richly upholstered furniture, inviting book shelves, a spate of foliage plants, and plenty of space for pacing up and down, which he likes to do as he talks.
per cent now.

The World of Achievement

"If you examine my magazine you'll find not so much a world of glamor any more as a world of achievement," he world of glamor but we have gradually become more in-continued. "What happened was, we started out with the terested in people's achievements."

I asked him what proportion of the Negro population was represented in the glamor-achievement world of Ebony, and he answered:

"Oh, I would think it's perhaps 10 per cent. I know years ago Dr. W. T. DuBois used to talk about the 'talented tenth,' and I think that even if he said that many years ago it still holds true. I mean by that, about 10 per cent of the Negro people are those who are able to enjoy many of these advantages we're speaking about. I think the proportion is increasing as time goes by, but I would hold it to about 10 per cent now."

"That glamor world is not my world," he said, in answer to my question. "I think my world is a more realistic one. But it's true, we try to find the glamor side in our magazine even though not all the people we glamorize believe that this is all their world either.

"We are like the movies—just as they tend to embellish and adorn the normal, I think we do the same. This is not to misstate the truth but simply expresses the search for something that will capture the imagination. And this is not the whole world of the people who like to read about it, either."

Mr. Johnson's magazine reflects dramatically a change ber of a highly respected Negro family in Selma, Ala., where her father was a physician. She became his beautiful and talented wife and co-worker and he left the company to launch Ebony.

In 1945, on a cash capital of $500 borrowed on his mother's furniture, Ebony made its appearance with 25,000 copies. Today its circulation is over 800,000.

After the magazine was well toward success, several years after it was started, Mrs. Johnson quit active work to devote herself to the home. The couple adopted two children, John jr. and Linda, and the family live in an integrated residential section of Chicago in a large and richly furnished apartment. Mr. Johnson owns the apartment house. He refuses to live in the country because, he says, he does not want to be reminded by too much landscape of anything from his rural Arkansas past.

'We Need All These Voices'

Getting down to a discussion of race problems, Mr. Johnson answered a question of mine about whether he feels personally integrated in the civic and business world of Chicago.

"No, I don't think so," he said. "I think integration encompasses the total activities of an individual, if you think of them in the broad sense. I get into these groups in the white world pretty much as a representative of the Negro community, even though I might not be identified as such. I don't think I am in there because I am a successful publisher. I think it's because I am a successful Negro publisher."

Speaking of the diversity of Negro organizations and personalities driving for diverse Negro goals, Mr. Johnson said:

"I think we need all these voices. We are living in an age of diversification. Even business is not able to make out with only a one-product development. The same way about the race relations problem. I feel there is no one way to do it. I don't think we can identify any one kind of leadership as the only one. Nobody quite understands why this is so, and nobody understands why a certain cola company that used to put its drink out in one size bottle now has to market in several sizes.

"There is something in the air that requires diversification of effort toward any accomplishment, and in the Negro field we need all of these people, even at the risk of appearing—well, whatever you want to call it. I think the Black Muslims are making a contribution to racial equality by simply challenging in a different kind of way. Obviously no thinking person who truly believes in democracy—and I believe in it—would follow a policy of hate, although the Muslims deny this policy. But the point I am making is, as James Baldwin points out, we have got to get white people to listen before we can convince them.

"I believe that the Muslims in their approach, despite the fact I don't approve of them are helping to get people to listen. If they get people to listen to us, then they make some kind of contribution.

"And if we must be critical of the Muslims then we must also realize that we, meaning the white population, are responsible for the conditions which created the Muslims in the first place. And the best way to get rid of them is not to criticize them but to improve the conditions of the black man, and make a mockery out of what they say by bringing about a real conversion to democratic practices.

"They are not going anywhere. They are going to keep preaching their philosophy as long as what they say is true, and as long as what they say is true it's going to grow."

The First Step—Confidence

Mr. Johnson is the pleasantest kind of man to interview. He is not only responsive to every question, but he grabs every idea and runs with it. He talks in a rather loud voice, as if he thinks better that way, pacing back and forth and looking always as eager as an interested boy.

"I think the first step toward overcoming a feeling of inferiority and low status is," he said, "to instill confidence in yourself through finding something in your background in which you can feel pride. I am publishing a Negro history series because I learned that Negro history is not taught in most schools and Negroes are not aware of the world of glamor any more as a world of achievement," he continued. "What happened was, we started out with the world of glamor but we have gradually become more interested in people's achievements."

I asked him what proportion of the Negro population was represented in the glamor-achievement world of Ebony, and he answered:

"Oh, I would think it's perhaps 10 per cent. I know years ago Dr. W. T. DuBois used to talk about the 'talented tenth,' and I think that even if he said that many years ago it still holds true. I mean by that, about 10 per cent of the Negro people are those who are able to enjoy many of these advantages we're speaking about. I think the proportion is increasing as time goes by, but I would hold it to about 10 per cent now."

"That glamor world is not my world," he said, in answer to my question. "I think my world is a more realistic one. But it's true, we try to find the glamor side in our magazine even though not all the people we glamorize believe that this is all their world either.

"We are like the movies—just as they tend to embellish and adorn the normal, I think we do the same. This is not to misstate the truth but simply expresses the search for something that will capture the imagination. And this is not the whole world of the people who like to read about it, either."

Mr. Johnson's magazine reflects dramatically a change in the Negro people's image of color. And this was a development that Mr. Johnson talked about vividly—the disappearance of prestige distinctions in the lighter skin colors of Negroes.

"The color problem is no longer with us any more," he said. "I think what happened was, first, that black-skinned Negroes began gaining better opportunities for education and to gain achievement on their own, and then the rise of the newly developing nations in Africa, where black has come to mean something important, also helped to erase these skin-color distinctions.

"All those color distinctions began generations ago during slavery days when the slave owner kept certain slaves for his personal pleasure, and from these were born children of lighter skin who got more privileges than the field hands."

He picked up an issue of Ebony and leafed through for me, to show how in the color advertisements there were more of the darker-skinned models, both male and female, depicted in the ads than lighter-skinned.

"Negro people are no longer ashamed of their naturalness," Mr. Johnson said. "You will see many Negro girls who are no longer straightening their hair, and I think in general black skin has acquired a new meaning. It's not necessary any longer for Negroes of lighter skin to stay together on that basis. We used to have thousands of Negroes 'pass' over from Negro to white, but we no longer have that happening now."

100 Negro Millionaires

Back in a January issue of this year Mr. Johnson ran a feature with photographs and sketches of 100 Negro millionaires in the country. They included persons in a great variety of fields and it was a presentation which had tremendous impact on the Negro people, for even these 100 are by no means all the American Negro millionaires.

The publisher did not include himself, although he might well have done so on the basis of a financial rating.

"Dr. Martin Luther King jr. can talk abstractly about goals for Negroes," Mr. Johnson said, only half seriously, "but here they could see it.

"I have been blessed to have been able to achieve some of the benefits of capitalism, and I am in favor of capitalism. People often say to me, yes, you're in favor of it because in a minor way you are a capitalist.

"Then I say, no, I felt the same way when I was on relief here in Chicago, because I felt that if other people had it, there was always a chance that I might have it.

"One of my editors told me a story going around in one of the Negro colleges in Atlanta. He said that a student went to the dean and said, you know there are a lot of cliques around this college, and they won't let some of us in and I am very unhappy about it.

"The dean said, okay, I'll tell you how to stop this—but the boy interrupted him. He said, no, dean, I want you to tell me how I can get into one.

"Well, in effect that's the way people feel. I don't think they begrudge the world they see, they simply want it themselves. And this desire just spurs them on."

Going back to his own days of poverty, Mr. Johnson told me that his mother brought him to Chicago during the Century of Progress Exposition in 1933, ostensibly to see the exposition but actually, as he came to suspect later, to see if she could gain a toe-hold in Chicago and help him get some further education. He had finished the eighth grade in the country school in Arkansas, he said, and to keep him out of trouble his mother made him go through the eighth grade a second time. But she had ambitions for getting him to college.

His stepfather, a sawmill helper, remained in Arkansas while his mother got established in a servant's job in Chicago. She lost that job and they went on relief for a time.

Today his mother, Mrs. Gertrude Williams, rides around in a big chauffeur-driven limousine of her own, engaging in certain civic works in which she is interested and seeing to it that Mr. Johnson gets to church on Sunday.

While he was in high school in Chicago he got himself a clerical job in one of the biggest Negro-operated businesses in the North, the Supreme Life Insurance Company of America. He came to the notice of the president, the late Harry H. Pace, who urged young Mr. Johnson to go to college and work part-time.

He got into employee relations in the company, editing its house organ, and attended the University of Chicago and later Northwestern University. Meantime he rose rapidly in the company, and he met his wife, Eunice, mem-must also realize that we, meaning the white population, are responsible for the conditions which created the Muslims in the first place. And the best way to get rid of them is not to criticize them but to improve the conditions of the black man, and make a mockery out of what they say by bringing about a real conversion to democratic practices.

"They are not going anywhere. They are going to keep preaching their philosophy as long as what they say is true, and as long as what they say is true it's going to grow."

The First Step—Confidence

Mr. Johnson is the pleasantest kind of man to interview. He is not only responsive to every question, but he grabs every idea and runs with it. He talks in a rather loud voice, as if he thinks better that way, pacing back and forth and looking always as eager as an interested boy.

"I think the first step toward overcoming a feeling of inferiority and low status is," he said, "to instill confidence in yourself through finding something in your background in which you can feel pride. I am publishing a Negro history series because I learned that Negro history is not taught in most schools, and Negroes are not aware of the conspicuous gallantry and bravery they displayed in the Civil War.

"Our people have done many things of which they can be proud, and I think that we Negroes must first believe that we deserve equality before we can sell the idea to any one else."

He pointed to his big, important looking desk chair sitting behind his executive type desk, saying:

"I recall the first time we got this office. I came down the night before and sat in my chair so as to get used to it. I wanted to have a relaxed feeling"—he laughed uproariously at the thought—"when people came to see me on that first day. I just wasn't used to it, and I wanted to get used to it ahead of time.

"I think Negro people have to get used to equality themselves, personally, first, then once we're used to it and believe we really and truly deserve it, then we'll get it."

Mr. Johnson's Advice

He is deeply concerned about the lack of opportunity for bright Negro youths to acquire the necessary training in business that would enable them to gain promotions promptly. He said that if he had not happened to be put into a job in the insurance company he worked for, where he had an opportunity to learn the evaluation and decision-making processes from top executives, he never would have succeeded in business himself.

"This is the great void in Negro business life. What Negroes lack is an insight into how business operates, and experience and knowledge in how to deal with day to day problems. If I had not been able to sit in watching decisions being made and ask the men why they were doing things the way they did, I would never have learned how to do it. This must become a responsibility of leadership, to offer this kind of training opportunity to young Negro men."

This is his advice to young people:

"The United States Information Service did a movie on our company and they asked me the secret of my success. I said that if I have a secret it is that you set small goals and try to achieve them. Then after you achieve the first goal, you set another one within range of attainment and you try for that. You can't possibly see to the end all at once. The important thing is that you are making progress.

"I think the way people feel about my magazine is that perhaps they never will achieve as much as some of the people we depict, but this inspires them to do a little bit better than they are doing. And this is all I think any of us can hope for. As I go around the world, I find nobody has things quite the way he wants them."

TOMORROW: Three bright Negro college students discuss race problems in an uninhibited interview. One has a surprising ambition. The final article of the series.

Howard University student Vernon S. Gill

Bold ideas, even the Presidency

TEN NEGROES

May 10, 1963

THIS IS THE LAST ARTICLE of the 10-part series, "Ten Negroes," by the Herald Tribune's national correspondent Robert S. Bird, on Negroes' views of white America.

By Robert S. Bird
National Correspondent

A Negro President of the United States within, say, a quarter of a century?

You are not likely to hear this arresting idea dropped casually into a conversation unless you are talking with a person who is young enough to feel unshackled by the past and bold enough to see a different vision of the future.

In short, a bold Negro youth. One well enough organized in mind and personality to have thought the notion through. A lad such as Vernon S. Gill.

In my dozens of interviews with Negroes in several parts of the country, not one of them ever broached to me the idea of a Negro President of the United States. But when I mentioned to several Negro men of affairs that young Mr. Gill has proposed the possiblity to me they did a double take, as if the thought had never occurred to them.

Then a couple of them were willing to consider the idea seriously, and to analyze it a bit.

Mr. Gill is a senior at Howard University, the country's biggest predominantly Negro university, in Washington, D. C., and is president of the student council in the college of liberal arts.

He is not only an exceptional scholar but a thoroughly healthy youngster, able to talk seriously or laugh uproariously to suit the occasion. And when you mention romance he whoops in most unscholarly fashion, for he says that's for him—and he's unemcumbered at the moment.

I had arranged to talk at length with several bright

More on TEN NEGROES—P 8

A PERSONAL APPRAISAL BY ROBERT S. BIRD
His Own Views on "10 Negroes" in Sunday's Herald Tribune

TEN NEGROES

(Continued from page one)

students on the Howard campus on this particular day, and Mr. Gill showed up ahead of time. So we began the interview, which I had warned him would be somewhat searching of his thoughts.

He started off on a high, didactic plane, not so much answering my questions as delivering a classroom lecture on The Negro Problem with big, glossy words and everything but chalk, blackboard and pointer.

I heard him out for a while, deadpan, and soon he realized he was talking to a dead receiver. Then he apologized for "spouting off words," and we got down to what Vernon S. Gill really thinks.

We had covered quite a lot of ground when I got around to asking him what he saw for the future, and what inspired him to go ahead. He had already told me he wanted to study law and become a constitutional lawyer, and to engage in politics. All this was of interest because many, many Negro youths in Washington, ones who have come from deplorably poor homes and have been unable to take hold in school, are ending up as school drop-outs in a state of dangerous despair. This lad had none of that whatever—quite the opposite.

"I intend to go to law school in September, and then to go into the Army for a number of years—into military law, I hope—and after coming out of the Army to engage in politics and law," he explained.

"Now I think what inspires me at present is this—I believe that a person who does a job well, who seems at ease and cool while doing it, is an inspiring person. For example, the Kennedy brothers inspire me. And I believe in the utlimate worth of the individual and his abilities to use his whole potential—which I don't feel I have been doing."

A Secret Thought?

Mr. Gill was getting down now to, well, perhaps a secret thought.

"I don't expect that everything I envision will work out well, but I think there is a possibility from my own circumstances, and from my own abilities, to succeed even in national politics, for example," he said.

He looked at me with a level gaze and continued:

"Anyone who wants to be President, or wants to be in Congress, regardless of race, creed or color, is looked on with some suspicion as being sort of way up the clouds somewhere. But I do think this is a possibility."

He stopped to let the purport of this sink in. I was flabbergasted but I didn't blink an eye. You don't rule out, I inquired, the possibility of being President of the United States?

"President or Vice-President, no, I wouldln't exclude that. Seriously, I wouldn't. As ridiculous as it sounds, everybody wants their son to be President. I wouldn't discount that as a possibility for me. And I have said that to people. Some of them have thought I was sensible about it, and some have thought I was just being the son of a father whose ambition was to have his son become President."

So here was a young, bright, forward-looking, healthy Negro lad dreaming what used to be the American dream for any boy who thought himself lucky to be born in the United States of America. And not just dreaming it but thinking it out rationally. You don't hear white boys talking like this very often in these times.

I asked him what worries or fears might be lurking in the back of his mind about the future?

"The only fears I have are those of happenstance," he said, using one of those chromium-plated words on me. "Things might not go exactly as I envision them. Nothing will go exactly as you envision it, that's certain. But I want to get into a comfortable, rising groove in life and to be able to meet the situations as they come, and then move on to the next situation.

"I think any young person has a certain amount of fear about the instability of the future. But any particular fears, such as being run over by a car or that I might get defeated in a great election, or might have financial problems—those things don't disturb me."

Caucasian and Negroid

Herald Tribune photo by IRA ROSENBERG

AT HOWARD UNIVERSITY—Students Guy Draper, Jean Wheeler and Vernon Gill cross the lawn at Howard University in Washington. Gill, president of the student council of the college of liberal arts there, wants to enter national politics, and does not exclude the possibility that he could become President of the United States.

sent a cross-section of Negro youth, but a rather special group who undoubtedly will be heard from in the future.

For the next couple of hours all of us together canvassed a variety of questions dealing with the race situation. Such aspects as James Baldwin's anguished writings, President Kennedy's handling of race problems, the Black Muslims, intermarriage, the mood of Howard University students, and the like.

The others who participated were Miss Jean C. Wheeler, of Detroit, a liberal arts junior, majoring in chemistry with a full A average; Irvin Reid, of Charleston, S. C., a senior majoring in psychology, and A. Guy Draper, of Beverly Hills, Calif., a pre-law junior.

To hear these youngsters tell about the campus mood, this big university, with the bulk of its 7,000 students Negroes and with about 1,000 foreign students, is not especially caught up in the same turbulence of Negro student activity that is going on in the Negro colleges in the Deep South. Most of the Howard students were not—these four agreed—in a frame of mind to go out demonstrating. The majority are immersed in the university life but not in overt racial activity.

On President Kennedy

But these students follow developments in the news closely, and they had opinions on all subjects. Concerning President Kennedy, Mr. Reid gave the view that "over all, I don't see so much of a handling of the race problems by him as we were led to believe there would be during the campaign."

"I will have to agree with that," Mr. Draper said. "I think his recent actions have been nothing but political moves.

"It seems to me that what he said during the campaign, and many of the planks in the Democratic platform implied, that this race thing would be something that the Administration would get in and deal with. He has just backed away completely."

Mr. Gill disagreed. He said that while the President has backed away on occasion, he thought some of his stands were "more forthright than many Presidents." Miss Wheeler's opinion was that the President had come up against the hard realities and "he may yet demonstrate forcefulness."

After considerable argument on the matter, Mr. Reid summed it up with this observation:

"What we do agree on is this—considering that conditions are propitious and taking into account the effects of militant nature of the movement comes about. They look on the white man as the enemy. Here they have a group of susceptible Negroes who now find themselves together. They have someone to lean on now, and the white man is the enemy."

"I often wonder," interjected Miss Wheeler, "whether this is a destructive force or even whether it is a self-destructive force. I don't have enough information about it to make a decision, but it seems to me that there's a growinng dichotomy between Negro people—and the movement is not dying down.

"The dichotomy is between the Muslims and the Negroes who consider themselves intellectuals. They don't want to be bothered with this because they think it sounds so irrational. But these people, the intellectuals who reject the Muslims, will not say that any motion is good, any activity which makes a difference is better than sitting around praying or waiting for legal action to be effected.

"I don't know whether Elijah and Malcolm X have so much power over the people that they can get them to do things which would be to the disadvantage of the whole group. But they do get gleams in the eye, and a lot of these people have been in prison. And they are the kind of people who feel that if you hurt me, I'll hurt you."

Mr. Draper likened them to the Communists in many ways.

"They are strong people," Miss Wheeler said. "They don't play, they don't play. And they hate white people."

Intermarriage

I asked about the feeling on the campus about intermarriage with white persons. Mr. Draper took the ball on this.

"There's a feeling on the part of some people in the lower income group to want to succeed in life with a Cadillac and a white wife or white husband," he said. "But I think the great majority of the Negroes, especially the middle class ones and the highest class, feel in the back of their minds, first, on what grounds would you pick a person to marry—is it financial? Is it just because the person is white? What lies behind it?

"But I think once the cause that leads to the decision is determined as being all right, the intermarriage is accepted. Even if the reason for the marriage is only symbolic, it's accepted.

Negro lad dreaming what used to be the American dream for any boy who thought himself lucky to be born in the United States of America. And not just dreaming it but thinking it out rationally. You don't hear white boys talking like this very often in these times.

I asked him what worries or fears might be lurking in the back of his mind about the future?

"The only fears I have are those of happenstance," he said, using one of those chromium-plated words on me. "Things might not go exactly as I envision them. Nothing will go exactly as you envision it, that's certain. But I want to get into a comfortable, rising groove in life and to be able to meet the situations as they come, and then move on to the next situation.

"I think any young person has a certain amount of fear about the instability of the future. But any particular fears, such as being run over by a car or that I might get defeated in a great election, or might have financial problems—those things don't disturb me."

Caucasian and Negroid

I asked him if he bumps up against discriminatory situations in daily life which upset him or throw him off balance.

"There are occasions," he said. "It makes me think of what James Baldwin once said, that among the white population the suicide rate is high, and that once the Negro becomes free of discrimination and things caused by people around him—once he knows that he's not succeeding because of his own personal inadequacies rather than because of other people or discrimination—then the Negro suicide rate will go up, too.

"So when I find myself in one of these situations—and they don't happen often, particularly to me—my first reaction is to try to assay first if it was because of circumstances that the predicament occurred or whether my own inadequacy caused it or contributed to it.

"I think the Negro has a special problem in trying to assay how much of his own inabilities are involved in a situation. There is less of a problem of fault-finding with the Caucasian than with the Negro. Maybe we are cheating ourselves in this."

I asked him if he usually refers to whites as Caucasians.

"Sometimes, yes," he explained. "I think most people regardless of color use 'white' most of the time but personally I sometimes refer to the Caucasian race, and I refer to myself as Negroid. Often when I fill out a form I put down Negroid because that's the true racial designation. I wasn't saying Caucasian just because I'm talking with you. It's normal with me. It's the proper thing to do."

Now the other students were turning up to join us around our interviewing table in a small building on the Howard campus. None of them was exactly typical of the Howard student body. These were all on the exceptional side, intellectually and culturally, and they do not represent closely, and they had opinions on all subjects. Concerning President Kennedy, Mr. Reid gave the view that "over all, I don't see so much of a handling of the race problems by him as we were led to believe there would be during the campaign."

"I will have to agree with that," Mr. Draper said. "I think his recent actions have been nothing but political moves.

"It seems to me that what he said during the campaign, and many of the planks in the Democratic platform implied, that this race thing would be something that the Administration would get in and deal with. He has just backed away completely."

Mr. Gill disagreed. He said that while the President has backed away on occasion, he thought some of his stands were "more forthright than many Presidents." Miss Wheeler's opinion was that the President had come up against the hard realities and "he may yet demonstrate forcefulness."

After considerable argument on the matter, Mr. Reid summed it up with this observation:

"What we do agree on is this—considering that conditions are propitious and taking into account the efforts of the civil rights movement, he has not kept up with what could have been expected of him, knowing his dynamic personality."

The Black Muslims

It was Miss Wheeler, an extremely bright talker, who began the discussion on the Black Muslims. She said:

"A good friend of mine who is a philosophy major has taken me to the mosque with him and I found their Black Muslim arguments to be very forceful. They really hit me. They use information that you can't deny.

"One of the things they say is that the white man has systematically destroyed the Negro, and they give examples, and good examples, too. For me, it's a matter you have of reconciling the uncomfortable feeling you have about the Black Muslims. It's my belief that they're worthwhile because they have given a great number of Negroes something to do with their time, something that makes them feel substantial and important.

"There's a fellow selling newspapers on the corner near me, and he says at regular intervals it makes him feel good to go to the mosque and see the ladies with their white robes and all so clean and proud of themselves, and the men saluting one another.

"I imagine the most impressive thing about it is that it has given substantiality to a group of people who formerly were shiftless and unimpressive."

"She's hit on the key thing," Mr. Draper said. "They take a group of people who have no meaning in their lives, who have had very hard lives, who come from the depths of dejection, and the Black Muslims give them something to live for. The Muslims give new meaning to these people and their lives.

"And then the next thing they do is they project their image of the white man. He is the enemy. So this is how the

"They are strong people," Miss Wheeler said. "They don't play, they don't play. And they hate white people."

Intermarriage

I asked about the feeling on the campus about intermarriage with white persons. Mr. Draper took the ball on this.

"There's a feeling on the part of some people in the lower income group to want to succeed in life with a Cadillac and a white wife or white husband," he said. "But I think the great majority of the Negroes, especially the middle class ones and the highest class, feel in the back of their minds, first, on what grounds would you pick a person to marry—is it financial? Is it just because the person is white? What lies behind it?

"But I think once the cause that leads to the decision is determined as being all right, the intermarriage is accepted. Even if the reason for the marriage is only symbolic, it's accepted.

"I think that for the Negro college person, he or she is looking for a particular type of person to marry. And we've reached the point where we have strong convictions on that, and race doesn't matter. What matters is their general personality, and interests. The average American college student is looking for an individual, strong-willed and strong-minded, and when he finds that individual he makes the decision. If the person is a member of another race, he may think twice, and then go ahead."

Some time after my discussions with these students, and Mr. Gill's surprising confession of an ambition to try for the very summit in American politics, I was in Chicago. And I harked back to this occasion.

While interviewing John H. Johnson, publisher of Ebony, a leading magazine for Negroes, I told him about Mr. Gill's plan to enter politics and perhaps become President of the United States. The publisher listened attentively. After all, he had risen from relief status to millionaire before he was 45. He did a quick mental computation.

"That would be 25 years from now," he said. "I think he will not be President, but I think he could be Vice-President of the United States. Yet I would want him to think he could be President. By shooting for the goal of President he may become one day Vice-President. We always have to set our goals a little higher than we are likely to achieve.

"I would not want to discourage this young man. I think being specific, confining it to to a period of 20 to 25 years, we could quite confidently assume that a Negro could be Vice-President of the United States."

A Judge's Thoughts

In the same city I asked Judge James B. Parsons, of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, what he thought of Mr. Gill's views. He is a man who studied law and went into politics and rolled up a vote of 1,127,000 in Cook County when he ran for Judge of Superior Court and won a few years ago.

"His thinking reflects a projection which is a responsible one," Judge Parsons said thoughtfully, "in that it recognizes change as it is going on. This is exceedingly difficult for persons who are not part of the change or those who are resistant to it.

"It's difficult to realize today that infants who are being born now may have the opportunity to live for upward of 150 years, or that children born to our children 25 years from now may live to 200 years of age.

"Change is a factor which we resist, and yet it is the most potent, most volatile factor in the entire American scene. Everything must be seen in the light of change and in the speed with which change is taking place."

This sense of change, mounting in speed and power, is felt all through the Negro world today. Its volatile potency may be working for a fine Negro boy who wants to be President of the United States, as it is for all his people.

HERE'S PROOF of the RED PRO-NEGRO PLOT AGAINST SOUTH & USA

The Platform of the Class Struggle

---

National Platform
of the
Workers (Communist) Party
1928

Published for the NATIONAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE
By WORKERS LIBRARY PUBLISHERS
35 East 125th Street
New York, N. Y.

NEGRO PROGRAM of

XII OPPRESSION OF THE NEGROES

American white imperialism oppresses in the most terrific way the ten million Negroes who constitute not less than one-tenth of the total population. White capitalist prejudice considers the Negroes a "lower race," the born servants of the lofty white masters. The racial caste system is a fundamental feature of the social, industrial and political organization of this country. The Communist Party declares that it considers itself not only the party of the working class generally but also the champion of the Negroes as an oppressed race, and especially the organizer of the Negro working-class elements. The Communist Party is the party of the liberation of the Negro race from all white oppression.

There is a "new Negro" in process of development. The social composition of the Negro race is changing. Formerly the Negro was the cotton farmer in the South and domestic help in the North. The industrialization of the South, the concentration of a new Negro working-class population in the big cities of the East and North, and the entrance of the Negroes into the basic industries on a mass scale have changed the whole social composition of the Negro race. The appearance of a genuine Negro industrial proletariat creates an organizing force for the whole Negro race, furnishes a new working-class leadership to all Negro race movements, and strengthens immensely the fighting possibilities for the emancipation of the race.

DEMANDS

1. Abolition of the whole system of race discrimination. Full racial, political, and social equality for the Negro race.
2. Abolition of all laws which result in segregation of Negroes. Abolition of all Jim Crow laws. The law shall forbid all discrimination against Negroes in selling or renting houses.
3. Abolition of all laws which disfranchise the Negroes.
4. Abolition of laws forbidding intermarriage of persons of different races.
5. Abolition of all laws and public administration measures which prohibit, or in practice prevent, Negro children or youth from attending general public schools or universities.
6. Full and equal admittance of Negroes to all railway station waiting rooms, restaurants, hotels, and theatres.

(Actual photo-reproduction of original Co
cover and excerpts fro

AM of COMMUNIST PARTY

An exact copy of a map taken out of the secret files of the Communist Party. The blacked-in area represents what the Communists hope some day (if they can promote a bloody revolution) will be the Negro Communist Soviet. It represents approximately 120,000 square miles. About 10 million white people will have to be driven out of their homes. Among the leading cities that will be turned over completely to the Negroes will be Charleston, Atlanta, Shreveport, New Orleans, Savannah, as well as many others. The land which now belongs to the whites will be confiscated and turned over to the Red bureaucrats for control. Shortly before the war this plan was discussed in detail by Josef Stalin in an address before Lenin University where 2,000 American Communists are being trained now to run the United States. As late as February 10, 1947, a copy of a textbook, now being used in the Russian Army, was exhibited before the Congressional Committee for the Investigation of the Un-American Activities. The title of the military textbook is "How to Bomb and Sabotage the U.S.A." Under the Communist plan the dark line marks the territory to be integrated on the border of the Black Soviet. All this, along with the blacked-in area is to be governed by Paul Robeson or another loyal follower like him.

original Communist Party Platform including excerpts from text.)

AIMS OF # RED PRO-NEGRO PLOT

1. To stir up discord between races and in churches, schools and communities - to create inter-sectional strife.

2. To promote racial mixing to mongrelize the white race and weaken the U.S.

3. To overthrow the U.S. Republic by use of propaganda, infiltration, subversion, dissention - and violence, if necessary.

4. Reds to take over control of America.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF PARTY MEMBERS

To attend club meetings, read the Party press and literature, pay dues regularly and be active on behalf of the program and policies of the Party.

To at all times loyally defend the interests of the workingclass against the forces of fascism and reaction.

To fight against all forms of national oppression, discrimination and segregation, and all ideological influences and practices of "racial" theories.

To fight for the full social, political and economic equality of the Negro people, for Negro and white unity.

To participate in working out all policies and tasks of the club, and to regularly examine the execution of such policies.

To vote for all officers, committees and delegates, and be elected to any office or committee in accord with provisions of the Constitution.

To appeal any decision with which there is disagreement to the next higher body, carrying out the decision while appeal is pending.

To strive to master the program and policies of the Party, the principles of Marxism-Leninism.

No. 56988

1946 MEMBERSHIP CARD COMMUNIST PARTY of the U.S.A.

Name Hank Hallack Mar

City Indpa State

(Sec.) 12/4/45 Date Issued

Signature of State Chairman

United Klans of America, Inc.
Suite 401, Alston Building
Tuscaloosa, Alabama

Resist. Grp. KKK

(Photo taken at Candler Park, Atlanta, Ga.)

Are these your children?

FACTS: Known identified members of the Communist party are connected with Martin Luther King and his organization (the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.)

Hosea Williams, the Negro trouble-maker of Savannah, Ga., has been meeting with identified members of the Communist party.

Dr. W. G. Anderson, Negro leader of Albany, Ga., signed the petition to abolish the House Un-American Activities Committee. This petition according to officials was instigated for the Communists' benefit. King was also a signer.

These three Negro outlaws are operating within the state of Georgia. Yet our Governor and his official staff refuse to investigate their actions. WHY???

Due to the continued threat of violence by the Negro leaders, be advised, every white community, to organize for their own defense.

Fish Fry. Saturday, July 13th., for state Building Fund, Oakland City swimming pool, Campbellton Rd. & Oakland Dr., S. W., Atlanta. 11 a.m. until dark. Donation $1.00. Everyone Invited.

Cross Burning Public Speaking Saturday, July 13th. Go 3 miles east of Cleveland, Ga., on Hwy. 115 to Kart Race Track. 8 p.m.

Cross Burning Public Speaking, Saturday, July 13th., at 8 p. m. Hwy. 85 off of the Expressway (old Campbell No. 29). Welcome.

Property and buildings needed for public speaking.

Over 5,000 attended this organization's meeting at Savannah, Georgia, June 29, 1963.

UNITED KLANS OF AMERICA, INC.
KNIGHTS OF THE KU KLUX KLAN
P. O. Box 10753, Atlanta 10, Ga.

CIVIL RIGHTS PROPOSAL HELD CRIME AGAINST FREEDOM PHILOSOPHY
Florida Times Union, Friday, July 5, 1963

JASPER, GEORGIA, July 4, Senator Russell, (D-Ga.), said today that President Kennedy's proposed civil rights bill, "is a crime against the whole philosophy of liberty for which our Government stands."

In fact, the veteran senator said, the proposal is not a civil rights program at all. If enacted, he said, the bill "would destroy innumerable rights that we enjoy only because heroes of the past were willing toshed their blood to secure them."

Russell said in an Independence Day address in this North Georgia town: "All of us understand how even those in high position feel called upon to play politics at times. But I assert that the Administration in this case has gone beyond any reasonable bounds.

"When White citizens protest against the Supreme Court decision in the school cases, they are immediately told that those decisions are 'the law of the land' and that, if they protest too vigorously or violently, the armed might of the United States will be summoned to subdue them," he said.

"Our Negro citizens, who are conducting daily demonstrations against the 'law of the land' as established by the Supreme Court in the civil rights cases in 1883, are encouraged to increase the velocity of their demonstrations by the belief that the attorney general, the FBI, the hundreds of U.S. Marshalls and the armed forces of the United States will protect them in their demonstrations."

Russell said the President "cites these demonstrations as reasons for a legislative stampede to change this 'law of the land.'"

Russell, who is expected to lead a Senate fight against the President's civil rights proposals, said one section of the bill "levels an all but mortal blow at the right of a man who owns property to decide how that property shall be used."

He said that under Kennedy's definition, any business man would "LIVE IN CONSTANT FEAR OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, THE FBI, THE HUNDREDS OF U.S. MARSHALLS UNDER HIS COMMAND AND, INDEED, THE ARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES, IF NECESSARY, WHO MIGHT COMPEL THE BUSINESS MAN TO RECEIVE UNWANTED CUSTOMERS."

Russell added:

" The genocide clause of the bill which would permit the President or any of his appointees, if they decided that there was any discrimination in one case, to withhold the payment of veterans' benefits, Social Security payments, aid to dependant children, to the blind, to the old and the helpless is the most inhuman suggestion that has been made in legislation in the history of this Republic.

YOU THE PEOPLE . . . BE JUDGE ! ! !

UNITED KLANS OF AMERICA, INC.

KNIGHTS OF THE KU KLUX KLAN

P. O. BOX 10753
ATLANTA, GEORGIA

July 17th, 1963

Honorable Malcolm McLain, Mayor
City Hall,
Savannah, Ga.

Dear Sir:

I extend to you my personal invitation for you to attend the Klan Day Convention meeting at Forsyth Park, 7 P.M. this coming Saturday, July 20th, in your City of Savannah.

The great mass of people that will attend this Rally will enjoy hearing you speak.

I request that you use your influence in voiding all agreements, pacts, contracts—either oral or written, etc., between parties who have recently been meeting for the solution of the racial problem that is confronting your City. My reason for this request is that there are four parties that should be represented at the Conference Table in this vital issue:

1st—The Demanding Group—This Group represents the different Negro Organizations who represents the majority of the Negroes.

2nd—The Political Group.

3rd—The Surrendering Group.

4th—The Resistant Group—This Group represents the largest portion of the White People who have had no voice in the negotiations in your City.

The Negro demands equal rights, then he must also honor his own demand at the Conference Table with the opposition having equal representation at such meetings.

I recommend that all Contracts be voided because, I charge that the Negro has discriminated against the White People for not demanding that they have equal representation at these meetings.

UNITED KLANS OF AMERICA, INC.

KNIGHTS OF THE KU KLUX KLAN

P. O. BOX 10753
ATLANTA, GEORGIA

Page 2

Myself and other Representatives of this Organization will be on hand, open for invitation to sit at the Conference Table of any and all racial issues arising in your City or any other place.

Saturday night there will be thousands of people who will visit in your City, buying gasoline, food and lodging and many, many other types of commodities too numerous to mention in this letter. I will ask the thousands of people who would ordinarily spend at least a quarter of a million dollars in Savannah and Chatham County, not to send one cent if our request is not granted. This will launch a tremendous economic boycott against every business in Chatham County.

We represent people from all walks of life, regardless of their Religious affiliations, who believe in Constitutional Government. Upon your refusal to cooperate with this Group of White People in Savannah, you and your Council are committing political suicide and you may rest assured that we will leave no effort undone to accomplish this purpose.

We come into your City peacefully, to represent the White People all over America, who have lost their voice, both in local and National affairs.

Yours sincerely,

C F Craig

Calvin F. Craig,
Grand Dragon.

CFC/ig

City of Savannah, Georgia

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR

MALCOLM MACLEAN
MAYOR

P. O. BOX 1038
ADAMS 2-8147

C. HAROLD CARTER
MAYOR PRO TEM
JACK J. RAUERS
CHAIRMAN OF COUNCIL

July 18, 1963

Mr. Calvin F. Craig
Grand Dragon, Realm of Georgia
United Klans of America, Inc.
Knights of the Klu Klux Klan
P. O. Box 10753
Atlanta, Georgia

Dear Mr. Craig:

I will not be able to be with you Saturday.

Sincerely yours,

M Maclean

Malcolm Maclean,
Mayor

MM/o

The two letters above are self-explainitory — we made an appeal to the Mayor of Savannah for an equal voice in racial affairs. You can read his answer for yourself.

If you believe in equal civil rights for all races, then support our requests and work for that goal.

YOU— THE PEOPLE

BE THE JUDGE! ! !

Resistance Groups - KKK
(distributed at KKK rally, Savannah 7/63)

RULES FOR CONDUCT IN SIT-IN DEMONSTRATIONS – (As directed by the NAACP, on suggestions by Brother Shuttleworth and on the advice of Attorney-General Robert Kennedy, and sanctioned by the Communist Party.)

1. TAKE A BATH – Don't be afraid! Five New York doctors have proved that a bath will not hurt you and it will be an experience for you.

2. HAVE MONEY AND IDENTIFICATION – Cash your relief check or Social Security check and have your CORE, INC., membership card or your Eleanor Roosevelt Social Club.

3. EMPTY YOUR POCKETS – Leave zip guns, razors, congo beads, mau-mau literature, statues of Hugo Black, guns, knives, brass knucks, and parole card at home.

4. DRESS NEATLY, CONVENTIONALLY – Wear yellow or green sharp pointed shoes, pegged pants, purple or black hat with large white or black and white coat. Girls should use extra amounts of perfume and at least two pounds of Royal Crown Hair Dressing.

5. SING LOUDLY – Suggested songs are "Glory to the Kennedy Brothers," "My Country Tis of Thee, Soon You'll Belong to Me," "The Communists Love Me-This I Know, for Martin Luther King Tells Me So," "The Mau-Mau March," "Onward Christian Negroes," and our National Anthem.

6. AT THE COUNTER – Don't use napkins for blowing your nose. They are not for that purpose! Try not to act as if you were at home. Don't order hog snouts or chitterlings.

7. IF REFUSED SERVICE OR ASKED TO MOVE ON – Go into your act of social pity immediately. Show your Eleanor Roosevelt Social Club Card, flash your Earl Warren button, and squeeze out a tear or two. We must arouse the pity of the whites for mistreating (refrain from snickering) Negro citizens.

8. IN THE EVENT OF VIOLENCE – Here we is really king. Remind the White Folks that you is the sweet adopted chillen of the Supreme Court, the U. S. Army is your army, and you have a direct line to President Kennedy.

9. DON'T BE AFRAID – With the Government, the Northern press, the Army, and the Communist Party on our side, and the Welfare Department paying our way, we is running the country.

10. TAKE THE FOLLOWING SIT-DOWN OATH: "I will sit down because we has sat while the world has fed us. We has sat while the country was at war. We has sat down while the house and housing projects was built for us. We has sat while schools was built . . . . . We sits to get medical care. In fact, we is natural sitters. We get all we want sitting, and is going to keep on sitting until we gets the whole world. We will sit because the past has proved we gets all we want sitting down."

Newsweek
8/28/63

KU KLUX KLAN, Regist. Grp. KKK

Button-Down Bed Sheets

"Let's be nonviolent," urged the man in the pulpit, and there was a spatter of applause from the 350 faithful gathered in the clapboard chapel in an oak grove outside Athens, Ga. In this summer of the Negro revolt, the way to win was peaceful protest—marches, sit-ins, boycotts, voter-registration campaigns, and, above all, a good public image.

"Let's be nonviolent," said Calvin Craig, Grand Dragon of the United Klans of America, Inc., Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. "We've got to start fighting just like the niggers."

That was the twist the Klan was turning across the South this summer—and selling hard enough to stir a small ren-

Newsweek—Karl Fleming was heady but self-conscience

aissance. The KKK had fallen far from its glory days of the '20s, when its roster numbered 4 million and—so the legend went—there was hardly a bed sheet south of the Mason-Dixon line without eyeholes. Now, according to the B'nai B'rith Anti-Defamation League's Atlanta regional office, the Klan has 40,000 to 55,000 subjects in an increasingly visible empire. But this summer, ADL said, it has enlisted 5,000 new members.

Its reputation tarnished by the flogging and lynching bees of bygone years, its racist thunder stolen by the white-collar white supremacists of the Citizens Councils, the Klan has become acutely conscious of what people might think. It hungers for respectability. It courts the press. "The purpose of this meeting is open to the public," Imperial Wizard

Newsweek

Robert Shelton proclaimed at the Empire's biggest recent pageant, a rally of 3,000 at Savannah, Ga. Later, Shelton—a former rubber worker from Tuscaloosa, Ala., who now travels about "Kluxing full time"—explained to NEWSWEEK's Karl Fleming: "You have got to have public relations. Our program is going to be on more of an informational basis."

Tactician: The new Klan flatters the unlikely likes of Martin Luther King Jr. by imitation. Sit-ins? Singling out the Athens branch of a cafeteria chain that had desegregated in Atlanta, Craig exhorted: "... You good white folks ... just go in there and get you a glass of water and just sit." Mass marches? "If the mayor doesn't stop these niggers from marching and demonstrating in Athens, then we're going to march and demonstrate too." Biracial negotiating committees? "We want the Klan to represent the white folks ... You don't ever have anyone but those left-wing liberals and niggers. The white people have been left out."

Some members find the new look too tepid. At a recent rally at an Augusta, Ga., auto race track, one parboiled Klansman simmered through a long, droning Shelton philippic about the Kennedys and Communist "infilteration" of the civil-rights movement and egalitarian clergymen: "It behooves me to see such large masses of these ministerial associations as they sit back and draft their resolutions . . ." Halfway through, the Klansman boiled over, slipped under the wooden grandstand, and got into a fist fight with a Shelton fan. "I didn't come out here to hear him talk about all this Communist stuff," he bellyached as a Shelton aide intervened. "Why doesn't he talk about the niggers?"

Eulogy: Klan old-timers, indeed, prefer a headier oratorical brew. At the Savannah rally, red-robed Georgia Kleagle Fonnie Miles eulogized the slain NAACP leader, Medgar Evers: "A certain jig down in Mississippi got himself killed—"

"Yeah!" whooped the crowd.

"—for sticking his nose in other people's business ... Why that's just another dead nigger, and that's the only good ones there ever is—the dead ones."

Yet even Miles was a mite image-conscious. "I know some of these press people are gonna say about me being illiterate because I say nigger," he said. "I guess they think I'm self-conscience about it. But I ain't."

The top leaders are self-conscience. Shelton and Craig have been circuit-riding the South in mufti, enlisting new members for a $10 Klektoken (initiation fee) and $1-a-month dues. Most of all, they have tried to wash the Klan image as bright as a freshly laundered bed sheet. "The Klan," Shelton says, "is not as derogative as you might think."

NOV 24 1963

Attempt At Klan Rebirth Quickly Draws Opposition

The Ku Klux Klan, long a dead issue in Mississippi, is making an effort at revival in some sections of the state.

So far, indications are that the hooded order has met with little enthusiasm and scant success, but the Federal Bureau of Investigation and, in some cases, local law enforcement agencies, are keeping a close watch just the same.

In Yazoo County (Yazoo City), many residents found Klan-published material on their lawns on the morning of Nov. 5, day of the general election.

The self-proclaimed first edition of the "People's Voice" didn't mention the election, but put in plugs for the "rebirth" of the Knights of the KKK, which the author said had been "disbanned" in 1930 by "our forefathers."

Trying Comeback

While promising in one place that "all our undertakings and work shall be honorable and to the benefit of all the people," the four-page pamphlet leaves no doubt that despite any claimed rebirth it's the same old Klan. For example:

"For a short period of time, we shall refrain from calling names of people we know to be Communist sympathizers in order to give them time to get right or to move out. . . . If they refuse to do so, then you, the people, will be given their names, backgrounds, dealings and actions.

"Should you after this information has been presented refuse to stop associating and dealing with these people, then we shall, without fear or failure, ride them out of this county and state, tarred and feathered, on a rail."

And:

"Our number is large even though we are young. If you know one of us it is because we want you to know him. So that the ones of us that you can never know can work in secret."

The pamphlet urges the reader to check on schools and Sunday School, movies, and television, literature and his local merchant, just in case he "sympathizes" with the Negro or hires Negroes in preference to white men.

If you find "anything of communist inspiration" in your local library, tell the librarian and get word to the Klan, the reader is admonished. "You will be placed on the list as one to be protected," is the promise.

The Klan is looking to big things in the political field in 1967, according to the author, with a membership goal of 50,000 in the state by that time.

Organizing efforts by the KKK in Washington County (Greenville) are not quite so bold. Word has it that circulars were printed to be shown to carefully screened persons considered possibilities for Klan membership. After the circulars were read, they were taken up again.

Officials are taking a dim view of the Klan reactivation effort in the state. It is meeting with disapproval from the Citizens Councils, also, and main encouragement apparently is coming from Klansmen in Alabama and Louisiana.

Atty. Gen. Joe Patterson, the state's chief legal officer and a member of the Citizens Council, declared emphatically that there is no place in the state for a revival of the Klan. He said he recalled watching Klan activities as a youth in Calhoun County during the 1920s.

"I think the people of Mississippi are fully capable of taking care of themselves, their institutions and their government without resorting to the known tactics of the Ku Klux Klan," he said.

Resist. Grps. KKK

Secret Organizations Are Reported Formed

SEP 18 1963

YAZOO CITY, Miss. (Special) — Formation of secret organizations, particularly the Ku Klux Klan, in Yazoo County was reported this week by the steering committee of the Yazoo City Citizens' Council.

The steering committee sent a report to all of its members this week stating "the Citizens' Council is opposed to the Ku Klux Klan and to any other organization whose membership and activities are secret. Your Citizens' Council was formed to preserve separation of the races, and believes that it can best serve the county where it is the only organization operating in this field."

The report went on to say that the steering committee is alarmed that the organization of the Ku Klux Klan may provoke racial incidents and demontrations, bring in outside agitators, and attract unfavorable attention to this community.

Successful operation of the Citizens' Council here is evidenced by the lack of racial incidents and by the spirit of cooperation and harmony existing between the races, the report said.

The steering committee voted at its last meeting to publicly announce its opposition to the formation of the Ku Klux Klan in Yazoo County.

Barnett Angered By KKK Story

Says T-V Comment 'Wholly Untrue'

By United Press International

JACKSON, Miss.—Gov. Ross Barnett says he has not and will not endorse organization of a Ku Klux Klan in Mississippi.

SEP 20 1963

Barnett issued a statement in response to a t-v broadcast by Wilson Minor of the New Orleans Times-Picayune. Minor, appearing on a discussion program, said persons attempting to organize a Klan in Yazoo County claim to have a letter of support from Barnett.

"I have written no letter to any group or individual encouraging the organization of the Klan, either openly or undercover, and would not think of so doing," Barnett said. "Any statement to the contrary is positively, unmistakably and wholly untrue and was willfully and intentionally made to mislead people."

The Governor said he does not know whether there is a Klan in the state "and I know absolutely nothing of any plans to organize one."

He charged the broadcast was a "deliberate attempt" to create a false impression.

Council Opposes Yazoo KKK

SEP 20 1963

YAZOO CITY — Citizens here are being advised that secret organizations, and particularly the Ku Klux Klan, are now being organized in Yazoo County.

A report from the Yazoo City Citizens' Committee this week advised that group's members, "the Citizens' Council is opposed to the Ku Klux Klan and to any other organization whose membership and activities are secret. Your Citizens Council was formed to preserve separation of the races, and believes that it can best serve the county where it is the only organization operating in this field."

The report went on to say that the steering committee is alarmed that the organization of the Ku Klux Klan may provoke racial incidents and demonstrations, bring in outside agitators, and attract unfavorable attention to this community.

Successful operation of the Citizens' Council here is evidenced by the lack of racial incidents and by the spirit of cooperation and harmony existing between the races, the report said.

The steering committee voted at its last meeting to publicly announce its opposition to the formation of the Ku Klux Klan in Yazoo County.

Reint Boyer
rec'd 63

APPLICATION FOR CITIZENSHIP

IN THE

INVISIBLE EMPIRE

Knights of the Ku Klux Klan

FEDERATED KU KLUX KLANS, INC.

I, the undersigned, a native born, true and loyal citizen of the United States of America, being a white male Gentile person of temperate habits, sound in mind and a believer in the tenets of the Christian religion, the maintenance of White Supremacy and the principles of a "pure Americanism," do most respectfully apply for membership in the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan through Klan No. ....., Realm of .....

I guarantee on my honor to conform strictly to all rules and requirements regulating my "naturalization" and the continuance of my membership, and at all times a strict and loyal obedience to your constitutional authority and the constitution and laws of the fraternity, not in conflict with the constitution and constitutional laws of the United States of America and the states thereof. If I prove untrue as a Klansman I will willingly accept as my portion whatever penalty your authority may impose.

The required "klectokon" accompanies this application.

Signed..... Applicant

Endorsed by

Kl.....

Kl.....

Residence Address .....

Business Address .....

Date ....., 19

The person securing this application must sign on top line above. NOTICE—Check the address to which mail may be sent.

NOTICE

The sum of this donation MUST accompany application, if possible. Upon payment of same by applicant this certificate is made out and signed by person securing application, then detached and given to applicant, who will keep same and bring it with him when he is called, and then turn it in on demand in lieu of the cash.

DO NOT detach if donation is not paid in advance.

OFFICIAL CERTIFICATE OF DONATION

This certifies that..... has donated the sum of TEN DOLLARS to the propagating fund of the

Knights of the Ku Klux Klan

and same is accepted as such and as full sum of "KLECTOKON" entitling him to be received, on the acceptance of his application, under the laws, regulations and requirements of the Order, duly naturalized and to have and to hold all the rights, titles, honors and protection as a citizen of the Invisible Empire. He enters through the portal of Klan No. ....., Realm of .....

Date....., 19

Received in trust for the

KNIGHTS OF THE KU KLUX KLAN

By Kl.....

References:.....

Address.....

.....

Address.....

.....

Address.....

.....

Person securing application must get this information.

Applicant's occupation is

.....

Employed by.....

His age is.....years.

His weight is.....lbs.

His height is.....ft.,.....in.

---

This applicant was elected to membership in this Order by

Klan No....., Realm of.....

....., 19.....

This applicant was duly naturalized by same,

....., 19.....

I certify the above to be correct.

Signed—

.....Kligrapp.

Klan No....., Realm of.....

A VITAL MESSAGE REGARDING KENNEDY'S CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

Word has come from the Chairman of the Commerce Committee, Hon. Warren G. Magnuson, (D-Wash.) the Committee which is holding hearings on the PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS BILL that, if there were MORE LETTERS SENT TO OUR CONGRESSMEN AGAINST THE BILL THEN THE BILL WOULD BE VOTED DOWN IN THIS COMMITTEE. VOTES WILL GO ACCORDING TO THE EXPRESSIONS RECEIVED FROM THE HOME FRONT. COMMUNISTS AND NEGROES WILL GET IN THOUSANDS OF LETTERS FOR THE BILL TO PASS, SO LET'S GET IN MORE LETTERS THAN THE ENEMY CAN FOR IT NOT TO PASS.

Letters from other Congressmen are urging the HOME FRONT TO ACT with letters against this vicious, enemy legislation.

LIBERTY LOBBY HAS SAID, " Should the fraud known as the "Civil Rights" bill pass, it would mean the political suicide of White, Constitutional government. Republicans must JOIN WITH SOUTHERN DEMOCRATS. THEY MUST PREVENT THE LEFTISTS FROM CHOKING OFF DEBATE in the Senate, and fight for freedom by every possible parliamentary maneuver. The issue is beyond race, it means AMERICAN SURVIVAL FOR FREEDOM."

Senator Russell of Georgia has said, "President Kennedy's Civil Rights bill is " A CRIME AGAINST THE WHOLE PHILOSOPHY OF FREEDOM for which our Government stands, that if, enacted, the bill, "would destroy innumerable rights that we enjoy because heroes of the past were willing to shed their blood to secure them."

Any business man would"live in constant fear of the Attorney Gen., the FBI, the hundreds of U.S. Marshalls, the Armed forces of the United States." "The genocide clause of the bill would permit the President or any of his appointees, if they decided that there was any discrimination in a case, to withhold the payments of Veterans' benefits, Social Security payments, aid to dependent children, to the blind, to the old and the helpless, is the most inhuman suggestion that has been made in legislation in the history of this Republic."

PATRIOTS, IF YOU HAVE ALREADY WRITTEN, WRITE AGAIN AND GET OTHERS TO WRITE, PROTESTING THIS EVIL, ENEMY, CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION.

Write to:

Hon. Spessard Holland (D-Fla.)
Senate Office Building
Washington 25, D.C.

Hon. George A. Smathers (D-Fla)
Senate Office Building
Washington 25, D. C.

Hon. Charley E. Bennett (D-Fla.)
House Office Building
Washington 25, D. C.

Hon. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.)
Senate Office Building
Washington 25, D. C.

Hon. James O. Eastland (D-Miss.)
Senate Office Building
Washington 25, D.C.

THESE PEOPLE AND OTHERS OF THE OTHER 49 STATES HOLD THE FUTURE OF THIS NATION IN THEIR HANDS.

Martha L. McKinney, Secy.
FLORIDA VOTERS CLUB.

P. O. Box 4134
Jacksonville 1, Florida

This Must Be Preserved Inviolate

WAKE UP—

White People of America!

Depended on to fight for your God given rights which are being taken away from you. Are you willing to sit by the wayside and let others fight your battle for you? Did your forefathers stand idly by or were they willing to give their lives for the principles in which they believed? That is a Free White America. Are you willing to see your country, the greatest country on the face of the earth, become like other oppressed countries under Communist Rule? Are you willing to be buried alive by this Black Blight that is trying to engulf us? Wake Up White People — What can you do? The answer is simple. Join hands with each White Red-Blooded American that believes in White Supremacy. Our forefathers wanted to be free—so what did they do? They came to America. Sure they had to fight. Fight for security freedom, then fought to preserve that freedom. Can we do less? Are we going to sit idly by and give up without a fight and let them die in vain? It may seem like the majority rule has the lead now, but if we continue to sit back and do nothing then we can be sure that it will be too late to fight for what is ours. Did you know that the Baptist Convention commended Martin Luther King and Ralph Abernathy and others who are in the forefront of non-violent struggle for justice and peace and assures them of thier support.

Do you know that in the Negro race, Veneral Diseases range extremely high —do you want your sons and daughters exposed to this communicable disease by allowing them to swim together in our pools, use the same rest rooms in schools, stores and other public places? Do you know that all of this is a Communist plan to weaken America? So they can get us to surrender without a struggle. We all know that the Negro race is an inferior race, so why do we want to ruin our race as well as the Negro race by mixing the races.

Can You Be Depended On?

If God the Segregator and Creator of all things had wanted every one alike, He would have made us all one color. Instead he made four races—isn't that proof enough to show us that God did not intend for us to mix? This is the Communists at work—to lull us into a false security. To brainwash us with their filth. Moving pictures, books, etc. Let the Negroes have their schools, churches, homes, but let them keep them within their own boundaries and not encroach upon the rights of others. The white man has always been the true friend and safest counsellor of all races whenever they have come in contact. Doesn't the Negro know that he is being used and given wild promises and false prophets that can never be fulfilled?

So wake up white people of America and fight for that which is yours.

For further information concerning the Ladies Ku Klux Klan write, P. O. Box 455, Mableton, Georgia.

WHY

YOU SHOULD BECOME A KLANSWOMAN

If interested, write

LADIES OF THE KU KLUX KLAN
Box 455
Mableton, Georgia

Why

YOU SHOULD BECOME A KLANSWOMAN

BECAUSE

IF YOU ARE A WHITE WOMAN

—Your place is with an organized White Ladies movement dedicated to the task of preserving the integrity, the blood-purity, the traditions, the ideals, and the heritages of the White Races in America. This is the Racial Mission of the Klan.

If You Are a Native-Born American

—Your place is with an organized White, Native-born American movement dedicated to all the high and holy ideals and principles of real American patriotism. In its influences and its teachings, and its principles, the Ladies of the Ku Klux Klan seeks to generate and impart a spirit of loyalty to America, of consecration to her ideals, of fealty to her institutions, of support to her government, of obedience to her laws, and of unselfish devotion to her interests.

If You Are a Protestant

—Your place is with an organized White, Native-born American Protestant movement dedicated to the re-animation of genuine Protestantism in America. As it grows, the Ladies of the Ku Klux Klan is quietly but effectively aiding in the upbuilding of Protestant Christianity.

If You Believe in Practical Christianity

—Your place is with an organized movement that believes, not only in an open Bible, in the fullest religious liberty, in the personality and power of Jesus Christ, but also in the full Christ program of unselfish, sacrificing helpfulness carried on, not with blare of trumpet or the noise of clanging cymbals, but "in secret" as commanded by the one Master of men, Jesus Christ.

If You Believe in Law and Order

—Your place is with an organized movemen that is effectively creating respect for Law, emphasizing obedience to Law, and insisting upon the full and impartial enforcement of Law, in every place where it is fully operative. The Ladies of the Ku Klux Klan is dedicated to this principle.

If You Believe in Good Citizenship

—Your place is with an organized movemen dedicated to the task of developing a high order of citizenship. The Ladies of the Ku Klux Klan is seeking to create appreciation of the responsibilities, privileges and duties of American citizenship.

If You Believe in the American Public School System

—Your place is with an organized movement that is dedicated to the principle that the American Public School System must and shall be preserved, supported, and developed for the highest possible functioning in our American life.

If You Believe in the American Home

—as fundamental to all that is best in life, in society, in Church, and in the nation, your place is with an organized movement dedicated to the preservation of the American Home.

If You Believe in Real Fraternity

—You will find it in an organized movement that is seeking to engender a real, vital, and enduring fellowship among men who enoy a kindship of race, belief, spirit, character, and purpose.

If You Believe That White, Native-Born Protestant Americans

—should have the same rights in their own country that are granted to alien and other groups, then your place is with the movement that is organized to cherish, establish, and maintain these rights for Americans. Other groups are actively operative in furthering their own peculiar group interests. The Jews are organized to protect Jewish interests; the Roman Catholics are organized to further papal interests, the Negroes are organized to advance the interests of that race; and in various parts of America, various racial and alien-national groups are organized for the furtherance of their particular interests and the spread of their peculiar ideals among our own American people. These racial and religious groups exercise the rights of freedom of assembly, free speech, and free press. The Ladies of the Ku Klux Klan believes that White, Native-born, Protestant Americans should be protected in their own exercise of these fundamental American rights, and especially in their right to insist that America shall be made American through the promulgation of American principles, the dissemination of American ideals, the creation of wholesome American sentiment, the preservation of American institutions, and through all of those means that will make for a nobler, purer, and more prosperous America.

Organization Is Necessary for the Accomplishment of Great Tasks

—Individual efforts count for very little when family, human, and national rights and interests are at stake. The need is for organization, well-planned, well-organized, well-directed, and effectively operative. Such an organization is the Ladies of the Ku Klux Klan

If You Can Qualify for Membership

—The interests of your home, your fellows, your community, your state, your church, and your nation, should impel you at once to seek admission to the ranks of men of kindred race, thoughts, purposes and ideals, so that you may have your part in the great crusade for God, Home, and Country, in which they are engaged.

 July 1, '63 Resist. Grp. Negro

"BLACK AND WHITE REALITY" —A BRITISH OBSERVER'S VIEW

Integration goal in the U. S. now is complete Negro-white equality—one united, multiracial society in business, education, politics, culture, everything.

Can it be attained?

Never, says this prominent British editor and author. He cites the black-white record not only in America but in Africa to make his case. In both areas, he says, there are basic, fundamental inequalities between the races that cannot be made to yield through integration. His contention:

White and black races separate themselves, no matter which is in the majority.

The writer is an editor of the "Sunday Telegraph" in London. He has traveled extensively in the U. S. and Africa and has observed racial trends in both for many years.

by Peregrine Worsthorne

In the London "Sunday Telegraph"

The latest evidence in Alabama of how deep, cruel and passionate racial feelings remain, coupled with the recent tragic collapse of Britain's multiracial experiment in Central Africa, surely raises a grim question which must be burked no longer.

Is it reasonable or realistic for men of good will to go on assuming that blacks and whites, at least in the crucial continents of Africa and North America, are ever going to live amicably side by side in genuinely multiracial societies?

My answer is emphatically "No." White men in predominantly black societies are almost certainly going to become underprivileged and black men in white countries are going to remain so.

This is a hateful conclusion, but I cannot see how the evidence allows any other. Take the United States first:

Even assuming that the Federal Government imposes integration at the point of the bayonet—and nothing short of this will suffice in the Deep South—can anyone really believe that the result will be genuine multiracialism? In fact, such actions will vastly increase white hostility, particularly among the younger generation who will be given a sufficiently fresh and vivid source of new grievance to keep the flames of racial passion burning for decades to come.

But the greatest grounds for gloom do not come from the South at all, but from the great Northern cities where the Negro's future is even more hopeless precisely because his own noncommercial character—rather than his oppressor's sins—can be seen to be a major cause. The really disturbing fact about the Negro in the North is that, unlike other once-underprivileged minority groups—the Irish or even the Puerto Ricans—the Negro seems sadly ill-equipped by his past to forge ahead in the competitive, individualistic, commercial American world.

The new desperation among American Negro leaders, reflected in the ominous growth of the extremist Black Muslim movement, is born quite as much of a despairing suspicion

In the United States, a Black Muslim meeting. "The ominous growth of the extremist Black Muslim movement," says Mr. Worsthorne, "is born of a despairing suspicion that the black man has just not got what it takes to come to the top in America."

—Wide World Photo

. . . "Integration is ever more obviously impracticable"

that the black man just has not got what it takes to come to the top in America as from old resentments against white discrimination.

To be brutally frank, the most serious and ineradicable obstacle to a genuine multiracial society in the United States may be less the Southern white man's privileges than the Northern black man's inadequacies.

In Africa the multiracial prospects are just as bad, quite apart from South Africa. It is surely quite unrealistic to imagine that existing white minorities in Kenya or the Rhodesias, or any whites who in future may be tempted, either for reasons of gain or idealism, to go and live in the black states, will receive equal treatment.

First and foremost the oncoming generation of African politicians is far more antiwhite than those who experienced colonialism at first hand. At least the latter knew the good side as well as the bad about the white master. Many young Africans, however, who never experienced white rule personally, have swallowed the antiwhite myth whole, and feel much more vicariously resentful than ever their fathers did.

But even if they wanted to give the white man a square deal, it would be politically impossible for them to do so. For the truth is that, in the foreseeable future, if the whites were genuinely to be given equal opportunities with the blacks, they would inevitably monopolize most of the plum jobs and the best land simply on the basis of their qualifications.

The only way to prevent this in Kenya, for example, will quite simply be to discriminate against the white man on the basis of color. No black leader who failed to do this would stay in power for a month.

The white man in Africa, in short, will enjoy the same kind of status as the Jew did in nineteenth-century Europe —used, but at the same time hated; tolerated, but only for his money-making skills.

Such a baldly pessimistic outline of the multiracial prospects in America and Africa doubtless sounds disgustingly in line with the racist outpourings of such fanatics as Dr. Verwoerd [Prime Minister of South Africa] or Elijah Muhammad, the American Black Muslim leader who preaches that the Negro is God and the white man is the Devil. Most men of good will will probably have already stopped reading, precisely for this reason.

But this is what is so dangerously wrong with almost all current thinking about the race problem. Because men of good will refuse to face the facts squarely, realism has become the monopoly of fanatics who use their insight, not to improve matters, but to make them worse. The sad fact is that Dr. Verwoerd has a much truer insight into racial reality in Africa than virtually all his liberal critics, and Elijah Muhammad speaks more sense about the American racial reality than does President Kennedy. But because their motives are rightly suspect, and their language fanatical, nobody pays any attention to their arguments.

Yet in sober truth their arguments do deserve to be taken seriously. What is needed urgently is that some of the intelligence, imagination, energy and compassion which men of good will have hitherto wasted in seeking to demonstrate how the races can live together should be concentrated instead on studying how they can be helped to live apart. It is nothing less than tragic that this aspect of the problem, which increasingly looks as if it may be the only way out, should be left to the fanatics, while integration, which is ever more obviously impracticable, should monopolize all the available idealism.

Take apartheid [the South African policy of separation of races]: Theoretically it makes a lot of sense. If it were implemented generously and imaginatively, instead of hypocritically and avariciously, it could be made to work. If the West as a whole were to back the experiment economically, with half the enthusiasm that it backs an Indian five-year plan, the whites in South Africa might be encouraged into actually doing what they claim to be doing.

Or take the Black Muslim demand for two distinct Negro American States. It sounds crazy, and a terrible admission of defeat of the multiracial dream. But can it really be doubted that, until the American Negroes get a chance of building something on their own, until, that is, they have a firm base —an Israel, if you like—they will never earn either their own or anyone else's self-respect?

My point, however, is not to advocate gimmick solutions. But rather to suggest that a whole host of new ideas might emerge, enormously beneficial to both races, if men of good will henceforth took reality as their point of departure, and worked forward from there, rather than setting their eyes blindly but firmly on a multiracial goal that each year recedes ever faster into the realm of tragic illusion.

The foregoing article, entitled "Black and White Reality," is reprinted, by permission, from the London "Sunday Telegraph" of May 19, 1963.

In South Africa, apartheid. As the author sees the policy of racial separation: "Theoretically it makes a lot of sense. If it were implemented generously and imaginatively, instead of hypocritically and avariciously, it could be made to work."

—Charles W. Wiley Photo

In New York "temple," Muslims learn Arabic from Akbar, one of sect leader Elijah Muhammad's six sons.

Sat Eve Post 1/26/63

Racial Bgrs - Negro

LWD file

Black Merchants of Hate

Fanatic and well disciplined, Negro "Muslims" threaten to turn resentment against racial discrimination into open rebellion.

by ALFRED BALK and ALEX HALEY

One pleasant spring evening a few years ago in New York's swarming Negro ghetto, Harlem, a policeman broke up an argument in an old, time-honored way: He clubbed one of the participants over the head and hauled him to the station. There the man was cursed, insulted and beaten until his face and body were bloody.

Up to this point the incident was not unique; police brutality, especially to Negroes, is an old story. But what happened next had never happened before, and it not only shocked the police of New York City but left a deep and lasting impression on law-enforcement officers throughout the country.

The victim of the clubbing belonged to a tightly knit Negro extremist sect known as the Black Muslims. As he was being dragged to the station, a fellow member was racing to alert his "brothers." Within minutes, over 100 sect members were lined up outside the doors of the police station. They were young and muscular, dressed uniformly in dark clothing, only a star-and-crescent ring or lapel pin breaking the black pattern. Their hair was close-cropped. They were intense, silent.

When the injured man was taken to a hospital, they followed. Soon the crowd had grown into a mob of 800, some of them teen-agers with zip guns. There were low, angry mutterings. Police were hesitant to try to disperse the mob, fearing an outbreak. "We'd better talk to Malcolm X," a policeman said.

A meeting was hastily arranged in the office of Negro newspaper editor James Hicks; present were three police officials and a tall, light-skinned Negro, Malcolm X, the sect's local leader. "That crowd's ready to explode," one police official told him. "Will you use your influence against violence?"

"Guarantee that our brother will get medical treatment," Malcolm said tersely. "Pledge that the men who beat him will be punished."

The police gave him their promise. Then, assured by Hicks that their word could be trusted, Malcolm did something which witnesses still recall with disbelief. He strode to the head of the angry, impatient mob, stood silently, and then flicked his hands. Within seconds the street was empty.

"No man," a policeman said after seeing this, "should have that much power."

This is only one of many incidents that dramatize the awesome discipline and power of this militant, semisecret, anti-white, anti-Christian sect. Led by Georgia-born Elijah Poole, a 65-year-old self-styled "Messenger of Allah" who calls himself "Elijah Muhammad," The Muslims (pronounced Moose-lums) have become the most explosive force in the American civil-rights struggle.

Most Negro extremists can muster only handfuls of people who convene on street corners or in storefront halls. Elijah Muhammad has spoken to as many as 10,000 cheering Negroes at hate-inciting rallies in New York, Boston, Washington, Philadelphia, Detroit, Los Angeles and other cities. Their next rally, this one their lavish annual convention, will be held February 26 in Chicago's 6,300-seat Coliseum.

Who are the Black Muslims? Are they, as one columnist described them, "the Mau Mau of the American Negro world," and therefore a dangerous threat to our society? Or has the menace of this group been exaggerated?

We were assigned by The Saturday Evening Post as a biracial team to find out. For this report we interviewed dozens of civic, governmental and law-enforcement officials, both white and Negro. We talked to leaders of the Negro community. We questioned Black Muslims and their high officials. We gained admission to Muslin temple services and mass rallies. What we learned revealed several widely held misconceptions about the group—some heartening, some deeply disturbing.

To begin with, the Muslims sneer at the main objective of most Negroes: peaceful integration. "There will never be anything more than token integration," says Elijah Muhammad. "It's a white man's trick to keep the black man enslaved."

Muslims demand racial separation in exclusively Negro states—large areas of our country from which white men would be driven and Negroes would take control. They openly criticize the men who are leading the fight for Negro rights. Among their most hated targets are Nobel Prize-winning diplomat Ralph Bunche, the Rev. Martin Luther King and U.S. Court of Appeals Judge Thurgood Marshall. Muslims sneeringly call Marshall "The Ugly American."

Moreover the Muslims openly demonstrate their contempt for Negro groups like the N.A.A.C.P., the sit-in demonstrators and the Freedom Riders. They deride students like James Meredith, who attempt to integrate Southern schools. "Why should any black man lower himself to try and get into a second-rate university?" one Muslim asked us.

Another major Muslim goal is to turn Negroes away from Christianity, which they call "a white man's religion used to enslave the black man." In at least two cases, in Arizona and New Jersey, Muslims have recruited entire congregations of Christian sects by converting the minister. Says Elijah Muhammad: "I'm doing all I can to make the so-called Negroes see that the white race and its religion, Christianity, are their open enemies."

"One thing everyone should understand," a member of a Chicago police undercover unit told us, "is that Elijah 'Muhammad' Poole is not just a run-of-the-mill rabble rouser, nor is his organization just an innocuous regional sect. This man is creating a mass movement on a national scale."

This became immediately clear. Though the Muslims refuse to release membership figures, it is known that Muhammad has an organized following in 80 cities and avid supporters among Negro inmates of at least two dozen state and Federal prisons. The sect owns stores, restaurants and other property in such cities as Chicago, Detroit, New York and Washington, D.C.

In two cities it operates its own accredited schools—in Detroit, a nine-grade "University of Islam" for 140 students, and in Chicago a 12-grade "University" for 430. Muslims further

In Chicago mansion, Elijah Muhammad and eldest son Wallace strike pose before portrait of W. D. Fard, founder of the movement. Wallace holds copy of Koran.

Muslim women, in official uniforms, applaud Elijah Muhammad's dire prophecies at Philadelphia rally.

"educate" their following through a tabloid newspaper, Muhammad Speaks, and hate-filled magazines and pamphlets; 50 small radio stations across the country carry broadcasts by Muhammad.

As part of their goal of separating themselves entirely from "the white man's society," the Muslims call themselves "The Nation of Islam" and have their own flag, an Islamic star and crescent. They also have their own police force, powerful, judo-trained guards known as "The Fruit of Islam."

Muslims refuse to vote, and most refuse to report for military service. At this writing the oldest of Muhammad's six sons, Wallace, age 28, is in prison on a charge of draft evasion.

The Muslim law also requires that members abandon use of their legal last name. It is, Muhammad maintains, a repugnantly symbolic "slave name," inherited from "slavemasters" who exploited earlier generations of Negroes. Instead, Muslims use an "X", which stands for "true identity unknown." If there is more than one member in a temple with the same first name, the second to join is known as "2X." In Harlem, we talked to a member of the Muslim temple named Frank 7X.

The Muslims' mass rallies are perhaps the most spectacular and frightening

"We are the victorious people! We will rule!"

events they stage, reminiscent in some ways of the huge meetings at which Hitler screamed his doctrines of Aryan supremacy. We attended their latest rally in Philadelphia last October. Three hours before meeting time at the Philadelphia Arena a vanguard of 40 charter buses and caravans of cars began arriving from as far away as Boston and Atlanta. Most passengers wore the Muslim "uniform"—for men, dark suits and dark shoes; for women, Arabic-type white robes and kerchiefs.

Fruit of Islam guards patrolled the doors outside. Before being admitted, everyone—including a dozen reporters and photographers—was lined up against a wall and searched.

"What is the reason for this," we asked a guard. He looked at us warily. "We have many enemies," he said.

Inside the Arena approximately 5,000 men and women were seated—segregated by sex as Elijah had ordered. In front of them blared a banner: THERE IS NO GOD BUT ALLAH, MUHAMMAD IS HIS APOSTLE. Guards were everywhere.

The crowd was strangely silent. Suddenly applause erupted from one corner of the vast hall.

Elijah Muhammad had arrived. He was a short, rather unimpressive-looking man, slight and light-skinned. He wore a dark suit, bow tie and black-embroidered fez. His face showing no expression, he moved quickly to the speaker's platform.

As soon as he was seated the introduction began. "A man who has seen God," he was called, "a man who has heard God, the boldest black man in America, the smartest black man in America, the most powerful black man in America!"

During the introduction the tiny Muhammad sat impassively. Then, as he rose to speak, he seemed transformed. His movements became abrupt, jerky. He stared piercingly at his audience, spitting out his words in harsh, thin tones.

The Black race, he began, was "Original Man," created 66,000,000,000,000 years ago. Adam was grafted from a black man 6,000 years ago by a black scientist. Thus whites were weaker. They were, in fact, devils. They had kidnapped Negroes from a high civilization in Mecca, enslaved them, brainwashed them into a false sense of inferiority, and made them worship a white Jesus. But the Nation of Islam, he said, would rise again. Whites were corrupt; their civilization was doomed.

"Get away from them!" he shouted. "They wasn't taught to do good! They was taught to do evil! They was taught to hate you and me! Stand up and fight the white man!

"We are the victorious people! We will rule!"

"Prophet!" cried a voice. "Messenger!" screamed another. "Teach us!" The crowd began applauding wildly. Some shook their fists in the air. It was an unforgettable performance.

But it is not only in such mass rallies that Muslims demonstrate their remarkable dedication, discipline and solidarity. They also subscribe to a puritanical personal code—they eat only one meal a day, abstain from alcohol and tobacco, and the women use no cosmetics. Gambling, narcotics and sexual promiscuity are prohibited. Muslims are urged to marry, always within their race, preferably within their faith. They dress neatly, practice a ritualistic politeness, refrain from raucous laughter or loud talk.

Muslims stick together

Muslims pledge one tenth to one third of their income to the movement. They patronize its businesses or those owned by Muslims. They face east and pray to Mecca three times daily and refrain from eating pork or anything cooked with pork. They are required to attend services regularly at a Muslim "temple" or "mosque." In most temples, decorations include a painting of a Negro hung from a tree limb, a replica of an American flag captioned, SLAVERY SUFFERING AND DEATH, and an Islamic star and crescent proclaiming, FREEDOM, JUSTICE AND EQUALITY. Large letters demand, WHICH WILL SURVIVE THE WAR OF ARMAGEDDON?

"Shocking as this sounds to many people," says Negro scholar Dr. C. Eric Lincoln of Clark College in Atlanta, "to Negro masses who live in big-city ghettoes it has undeniable appeal.

"They are uneducated, unskilled, isolated by poverty and discrimination from the common values of society. They are strangers in their own country, shunned by successful whites and Negroes alike. They see no hope of improvement. Then they hear the voice of Elijah 'Muhammad,' challenging them to recover their self-respect, urging them to repudiate the white man's religion and culture, daring them to believe in race pride and black supremacy. And they not only listen, they act."

Perhaps typical of the Muslim leadership in terms of his background and bitterness is a lanky, energetic, good-looking man named Malcolm Little, once known in Harlem as "Big Red." One of 11 children of an uneducated Baptist preacher, Little was born in Omaha 37 years ago. He lived in crowded, crime-

Facing eastward, Muslim trainees are taught Arabic prayers from the Koran.

"Whenever a community has strong Negro leaders and good race relations, the sect has flopped."

Malcolm X, Muslim strong man, shows his power over an audience with a demand for money to finance transportation to rallies.

ridden racial ghettos in Omaha, Lansing, Michigan, Boston and New York. He has bitter memories of each.

When Malcolm was six his father, whom a group of whites considered "too aggressive in racial matters," was found under a Lansing streetcar, "his head bashed in and his body mangled. After that we almost starved."

Little left home and school after the eighth grade to become a waiter on a railroad dining car. Bored and frustrated, he soon gravitated to Harlem as a numbers runner, then a hustler of bootleg whiskey and dope. Prominent whites paid "Big Red" large fees to be squired to vice in Harlem. White police demanded bribes which he peeled from the $1,000 bankroll he always carried.

Then, in 1946, at the age of 19, he was convicted of grand larceny in Boston, and a white judge sentenced him to 10 years in prison. While in jail, he learned of Poole's doctrine. "When I heard the white man was a devil," he told us, "it clicked."

Articulate, single-minded, the fire of bitterness still burning his soul, Malcolm X travels the country—organizing, encouraging, trouble-shooting in local Muslim organizations. He appears on radio-TV interviews and speaks and debates on street corners, in Muslim temples and on college campuses. Malcolm X and his wife, a former nurse, are so dedicated to militant accomplishment of Muslim goals that they named one daughter Attila (for the leader of the Huns) and another Qubillah (after Kublai Khan). While Muhammad appears to be training his son Wallace to succeed him when he retires or dies, many Muslims feel that Malcolm is too powerful to be denied the leadership if he wants it.

But as remarkable and typical as Malcolm's transformation has been, law-enforcement officials feel that the dedicated Muslim may be a worse threat to society than the criminal. "There is no way to measure the long-term effect of the race hatred they preach," a New York police official told us.

Equally insidious, we were told repeatedly, are the results of Muslim teachings about violence. Although Muslims profess to abhor violence, pointing to their regulations against carrying weapons, they are often in the thick of it. When a riot in Los Angeles last April resulted in the gunshot death of one person and the wounding of 14 others, Muslims were involved. When twin riots partially wrecked a youth reformatory outside Washington, D.C., last summer, Muslims were prominent. Prison riots involving Muslims have broken out in California, Michigan, Maryland and elsewhere.

A look at Muslim statements shows what inspires this violence. "We must take things into our own hands," Muhammad said in one speech. "We must return to the Mosaic law of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. What does it matter if ten million of us die?"

Malcolm X is even more provocative on the subject. "If anyone attacks you," he told one audience, "lay down your life! If anyone so much as touches your finger, his place is in the graveyard!"

"I got a wire from God"

Malcolm shocked even sympathetic Negroes with a statement made last June after receiving a message that 121 white civic and cultural leaders from Atlanta had been killed in the crash of a chartered airliner outside Paris.

"I would like to announce a very beautiful thing that has just happened," he told his audience. "I got a wire from God today. . . . Somebody came and told me that He really had answered our prayers in France. He dropped an airplane out of the sky with over 120 white people on it. . . . we will continue to pray and we hope that every day another plane falls out of the sky."

How does this fanatical doctrine fit in with the tenets of the orthodox Muslim faith, which has 500,000,000 followers throughout the world?

"Elijah Poole's teachings, his dogma and doctrine of hatred, are utterly non-Muslim," says Ahmad Kamal, a recognized authority on the faith who has written a noted pilgrimage guidebook and heads the worldwide Islamic relief agency, Jami'at al Islam. "It is anti-Muslim. We feel a great compassion for all Negroes who have been duped by the Black Muslims."

Muhammad himself has no known tie with orthodox Islam. One of 13 children of a rural Baptist preacher, he worked as a Georgia field hand, on railroad gangs, at a sawmill, in a brickyard and in factories in Detroit. Apparently, he had his first experience with this twisted form of Muhammadanism when he met a silk peddler named W. D. Fard in Detroit about 1930. Fard claimed to have come from Mecca. If indeed he did, he made two recorded stopovers: one in California, where as "Wallie Ford" he was sentenced to San Quentin State Prison on a narcotics charge; and then in Chicago, where a cultist known as Noble Drew Ali suggested that Fard become a "Prophet of Islam." Ali gave Fard the concept of a "Nation of Islam," and terminology like "so-called American Negroes."

In 1931 in Detroit Poole helped Fard found Temple of Islam No. 1, the Fruit of Islam Guard, and the first University of Islam. Fard bestowed on Poole the name "Muhammad" and the title, "First Minister of Islam." When Fard disappeared in 1934, Poole took over the sect.

Today, despite the Spartan discipline which governs the lives of the mass of Muslims, Elijah Poole is reaping the benefits of his life of struggle. He and his Georgia-born wife Clara commute between an 18-room mansion in Chicago and a four-bedroom winter home, complete with a swimming pool, in Phoenix. All eight of their children have positions in the movement, and all are apparently dedicated to their father's extremism. In a visit to his Chicago home, the Negro member of our team noted that Muhammad's fanaticism extends even to the symbolic use of brown bread instead of white and of African coffee packaged by a Muslim in New Jersey.

Like most racists, Poole believes unshakably in the righteousness of his cause and the inevitablity of his eventual triumph. When asked about planned investigations into his movement by Congress, the FBI, and local, state and Federal tax officials, Poole replied stubbornly, "Let them come. I have all I need. I have the truth!"

What is the truth? Just how strong are the Black Muslims?

To begin with, most published reports number Muslim membership as between 100,000 and 250,000. This, authoritative sources told us, is vastly exaggerated. Actually, of approximately 20,000,000 American Negroes, only a hard core of 5,500 to 6,000 have actually become temple members. This figure, of course, does not include an estimated 50,000 others who are sympathetic.

The Muslims' financial power also is exaggerated. Their businesses, though clean and well-run, are low-profit neighborhood enterprises. Most are owned by the members, not by the movement. The total amount of aggregate property accumulated by the sect is only a fraction of that owned by the late Daddy Grace or Father Divine.

The Muslims have found that prisons and slums are their most fertile breeding ground. It is hopeful to note that whenever there is strong Negro leadership and good race relations in a community, the sect has flopped miserably.

"The average Negro," says noted Negro psychologist Dr. Kenneth Clark of New York City, "readily realizes that there is no point in talking about whether the Negro wants to integrate in America. He has no choice. He is involved with America—inextricably so—and America with him."

How important are they?

Like counterpart white supremacist groups the Black Muslims are not on the Attorney General's subversive list. Federal investigators report no evidence of foreign domination.

Of what significance, then, are the Muslims? "In this difficult period of social transition," says Burke Marshall, Assistant U.S. Attorney General for Civil Rights, "no group with this discipline and dogma can be ignored." In the event of real trouble, says Los Angeles police chief William Parker, "they could become the shock troops in a conflict between races."

On the other hand, some authorities believe that, unintentionally, the Muslims have had some good effects. Says Ralph McGill, famed publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, "Now that real Negro extremists have appeared, possibly there will be an end to irresponsible charges that moderate, responsible organizations like the N.A.A.C.P. and the Urban League are unreasonable—or, more absurdly, 'Communist-run.'"

Little Rock's Harry S. Ashmore, a Pulitzer Prize-winning editor and a practical expert in race relations, puts it this way: "The Black Muslims are a warning to which churches, community leaders and public officials had better pay heed. That is, that the masses of Negro people no longer are willing to stand still, that injustice has been done, and change is going to come. The only question is, will the change come through men and women working together regardless of race, or will the field be left to extremists?

"The Black Muslims and White Citizens councils offer one answer. Let us hope that responsible Americans will begin working for another." THE END

Grim guards of the organization's elite, Fruit of Islam, do military drill in strenuous training course.

A COMMUNICATION

Footnote for the Historians

By STEWART ALSOP

President Kennedy has said that the matter of Adlai Stevenson's role in the Cuban crisis should be left to the historians. During the furor caused by the article (The Post, Dec. 8) on the crisis by Charles Bartlett and myself, I was on a reporting tour in Latin America. Since reading the press clippings on my return, it seems to me that the historians might get a rather distorted idea of the whole matter. So perhaps the following footnote to history will interest them.

Charles Bartlett and I have been widely pictured as the victims of "managed news," and as the instruments of a Byzantine anti-Stevenson plot. In fact, we simply set out to do the traditional and rather laborious job of reportorial reconstruction which at least a dozen other reporters were doing at the same time.

We interviewed a great many people and took many pages of notes. We kept getting indications that Adlai Stevenson had taken a position during the crisis which differed sharply from that of the members of the Executive Committee of the National Security Council. We were told that Stevenson, unlike the members of the Executive Committee, was willing to negotiate with the Communists about yielding Guantanamo, the American base in Cuba, and about the elimination of other foreign bases as well. These proposals, we learned, had been bitterly opposed by other presidential advisers.

To get Mr. Stevenson's version of the matter, we therefore had three lengthy talks with Clayton Fritchey, Mr. Stevenson's official spokesman, who is an old and trusted friend to both of us. Since we have been widely accused of making no effort to understand Mr. Stevenson's position, we feel that we are justified in reporting these talks, and Mr. Fritchey agrees. So I hope the reader will bear with me through the following admittedly uninspired excerpts from our notes.

From C. Bartlett's notes after luncheon, Saturday, November 10: "Fritchey believes that AS did not take any position at his first session in Washington, Tues. Oct. 16, because they were just fluffing around with it . . . he does not know what position he took on the following Saturday when he met with the group but we'll find out."

Early the next week, after Mr. Fritchey had kept his promise to "find out," he read to Mr. Bartlett notes on Mr. Stevenson's position at the Saturday meeting, from which Bartlett took down the following excerpts: "Stevenson's general approach was to avoid military action until the peacekeeping machinery of the UN had a chance to function. He therefore opposed the air attack and favored the blockade. . . . As the consensus hardened on the quarantine approach, he turned his thoughts toward the possibility of a settlement, both short term and long term . . . he wanted all nuclear capability defused and the bases dismantled. He said that if it were necessary to sweeten up our negotiating position at this point, we might even consider yielding the Guantanamo base. . . . As a final point, he suggested a proposition to the USSR to discuss the elimination of foreign bases in connection with the disarmament negotiations. . . ."

On November 16, as I was preparing a final draft of the article, I was still not satisfied that we had Mr. Stevenson's position clear, so I telephoned Mr. Fritchey for a third talk. From my notes: "Read to Clayton sentence to the effect that 'Stevenson was only willing to discuss Guantanamo and the European bases with the Communists after a neutralization of the Cuban missiles.' Asked if this was fair summary and Fritchey agreed it was." The summary was duly included in the article.

Mr. Stevenson's willingness to consider yielding Guantanamo and the elimination of other foreign bases was, of course, at the heart of his difference with the Executive Committee majority. Stevenson had every right to take the position he did take. Others—including large portions of the British press—took much the same position, on the theory that a willingness to negotiate major concessions would lessen the danger of nuclear war, in case of a violent Soviet reaction to the Cuban blockade. But Mr. Stevenson's critics also have a right to their views.

One such view, which we quoted, was that Stevenson's position amounted to willingness to accept a "Munich." The elimination of foreign bases has been a Soviet refrain since the days of Stalin, simply because the loss of the forward American bases would upset the world power balance in favor of the Soviet Union. Moreover, Guantanamo has one characteristic in common with Berlin—it is locally indefensible. Stevenson's adversaries sincerely believed that such concessions as Stevenson proposed for consideration would encourage the Soviets, as Hitler was encouraged in the time of Munich, to further adventures in the expectation of further concessions.

Stevenson's proposals were therefore not accepted by the Executive Committee. The Executive Committee also rejected the proposals of the "hawks" for air strikes against the Cuban missile bases. As Dean Acheson, the leading ex-hawk, generously agreed in retrospect, "The final decision was the right one." Neither air strikes nor major concessions to the Communists proved necessary.

Unlike Mr. Acheson, Mr. Stevenson used every device to becloud the real issue that arose between him and other presidential advisers. He portrayed himself as a victim of a McCarthyite plot, while hotly "denying" that he had "opposed" the President's blockade policy—which, of course, we never wrote.

The real issue between Mr. Stevenson and his critics had nothing to do with the blockade. It concerned the concessions to the Communist side which Stevenson was willing to consider, as even the brief section we wrote on Mr. Stevenson's subsidiary role in the crisis certainly made clear. Surely this was a vitally important issue. But hardly anyone seemed interested in discussing it.

Instead, to support Mr. Stevenson's strictures, various lists of "errors" in our account were drawn up. With one meaningless exception, these "errors" either had no bearing on what we wrote or were not errors at all. It is worth noting that neither the President nor anyone else in a position really to know, other than Mr. Stevenson himself, denied the essential accuracy of our account of his role. But one issue that was widely raised does deserve comment—"the issue of security."

A great newspaper, for example, charged us with a "breach of security." Although the same newspaper was the first to report Attorney General Robert Kennedy's opposition to an air strike and other important positions of NSC members, the grounds for the charge were that "the various positions of the members of the NSC must remain secret. . . ."

Must they? Obviously there are times, as in the critical days before the President's blockade decision, when Government secrecy is essential. But the decisions confronting the NSC are precisely those decisions which determine the future of all Americans. Under the American system "we the people" have a right to know about and argue about such decisions and about the men who make them.

The members of the NSC are, after all, like Mr. Stevenson himself, politicians or political appointees. Their political futures depend, or should depend, not only on the President's judgment but on the judgment of the American people. That is why we have every right to know the bent of their minds, how they react in a crisis. To suppose otherwise, to suppose that no one has a right to inquire into the policies advocated in our highest-policy-making body, is to make of the NSC another Politburo, awesome and sacrosanct, its decisions to be accepted without question by a docile people.

We have no need for Politburos. The issue raised by Mr. Stevenson's proposals on Guantanamo and other foreign bases goes right to the heart of American policy in time of danger. It is precisely the sort of issue the American people, not only the historians, have a right to know about and make up their own minds about.

PRINTED IN U.S.A.

Resistance Orgs. Negro
2/18/63

LWD ✓ JS
BSB

How To Gain Greater Destiny!

By ELIJAH MUHAMMAD

THE FLAG OF THE USA and ISLAM:

"Which one will survive the War of Armageddon?"

The answer is essential to the mentally dead lost-found black people in North America. By just a slight glance at the two flags, even a fool could give the correct answer. But you would be surprised to know how little knowledge my people have of science.

Allah and His Messenger seek separation of our people from our once slave master and their children that we may enjoy freedom, justice and equality along with the other nations of our earth.

Twenty million people must have independence from their open enemies who hope to deceive our people with false promises; and if their promises are true it still would mean the doom of both races. There is hardly any hope for the American whites because of her evils done to us, the black nation, even if they do live up to their promises which they are now offering the poor, blind, deaf and dumb Lost-found members of the Asiatic Nation.

Allah is well able to take us away from our enemies and slay them, as they have and are still slaying us. So we have no fear. It is incumbent upon Allah says the Holy Qur-an to separate us from our enemies. Therefore, we must have knowledge of that which we are being separated from lest some, without understanding ask: Why were we separated? The average Lost-found (so-called Negro) does not know that it is a MUST that we be separated. This is my job: to teach them that it is a must.

The flag of Islam which represents the Sun, Moon, and Stars means to teach us that the religion of Islam (entire submission to the will of Allah) is as old and as true as the universe — without any knowledge of its birth nor its end.

But the American flag and its people are different. They have a beginning and end

(Continued on Page 13)

MR. MUHAMMAD

Dedicated to Freedom, Justice and Equality for the so-called Negro. The Earth Belongs to Allah

Muhammad Speaks

Justice Freedom Equality Islam

VOL. 2 — NO. 11 FEBRUARY 18, 1963 — CHICAGO, ILLINOIS 15c

Have Georgia Racists Doomed—

Mrs. Gladys Canty's Husband Got A 15-Year Prison Term Because He Dared To Defend His Own Life.

By JERMIAH SHABAZZ

ATLANTA, GA.—"Today they gave my husband 15 years in prison because he dared defend himself against white men who tried to kill him.

"I guess self-defense is a crime for a Negro, but my husband did what was right.

"Now me and my kids are alone, but I'd want him to do the same thing if he had it to do again.

(Continued on Page 3)

Line to Right For Black Taxes

See Page 5

Pickets Hit JFK On Travel Ban

Demonstrators Protest Kennedy 'Demo' Award

WASHINGTON — While President Kennedy was inside receiving his "democratic legacy" award from the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, police officers bolstered with K-9 dogs were arresting 16 of the more than 50 pickets who were outside protesting the award.

The pickets carried signs which read:

"Kennedy's 'Democratic Legacy:' Jim Crow, Cold War, Colonialism, Which Hunt, Travel Bans."

MARCHING IN FRONT of the Sheraton-Park hotel, they were protesting the "demorcatic legacy" award to Kennedy in view of the federal government's three-month sentence imposed on Negro newsman William Worthy because he visited Cuba without State Department sanction.

They charged also that Kennedy was receiving the award citing his civil rights efforts despite his "inadequate and temporizing record on civil rights for Negroes" and that Negro Americans in Mississippi "and other southern states live under a reign of terror similar to the Nazi terror against the Jews."

OF THE 10 MEN and six women arrested, 13 of them will stand trial for disorderly conduct Feb. 8, in General Sessions court here.

The demonstrators were port of a nationwide citizens' committee which included Nobel Prize-winning Dr. Linus Pauling and author James Baldwin and which had sought to have B'nai B'rith withdraw its award to Kennedy unless Worthy was cleared.

Worthy, internationally known newsman, was convicted, many say, for what he reported about the Cuban revolutionary movement and not for any technical violation of the law.

The newsman himself contends he was indicted because "I have reported many positive achievements of the Cuban revolution including the rapid elimination of all racial barriers."

NEW YORKERS picket the Anti-Defamation League in New York, charging that President Kennedy should not be given a "democratic legacy" award while Negro newsman James Worthy is under jail sentence for visiting Cuba without the OK of the State Department. Later, President Kennedy did receive the award in Washington's Sheraton-Park hotel while 50 demonstrators marched outside. At far right is William Jones of the Harlem Anti-Colonial Committee, which sponsored the demonstration. Similar picket lines appeared in Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Detroit, Seattle, Minneapolis, Cleveland, Newark and Boston.

World Traveler's

Expose On 'The Living Death'

(Special To Muhammad Speaks)

BOSTON, Mass — A shocking first-hand report of terror and oppression heaped upon people of Portugese held territories in Africa was giving last week by a Roxbury resident.

Carlos Texiera went to the Cape Verde Islands, a Portuguese colony off Africa's West Coast, to study conditions there and returned to expose the Portuguese government as a bloody oppressor of humanity.

This is what Texiera reported on his return from the island and from Portuguese Guinea on Africa's West Coast:

1. Peonage-type labor still exist in the islands, though it is supposedly illegal.
2. Strikers are shot and there is no medical care for the sick.
3. Workers get the equivalent of $2 a month in American money and one meal per day is the rule.

Texiera said that the people were afraid to talk to him and that they are not allowed to congregate or hold meetings without government supervision.

ONE MAN DID TALK, Texiera reported, but he was jailed following the conversation.

Africans do not have schools of their own and cannot attend Portuguese schools unless they speak the language, said Texiera, whose trip was financed by the Cape Verdian Society of Boston.

Meanwhile, an organization of 165,000 Cape Verdians living in the United States has been formed to solicit funds for food, medicine and clothing to be sent to the people of Portuguese held territories in Africa, it was announced.

CARLOS TEXIERA

Will U.S. Go All-Out For Rich Holdings In Africa?

NEW YORK—Americans may soon find themselves in Africa using force to support practices that all their traditions condemn.

These practices, says American economist Alvin W. Wolfe, are "colonialism, racism and a non-free-entreprise type of capitalism."

Assistant professor of anthropology and sociology at Washington university at St. Louis, Wolfe had earlier charged that a huge industrial combine was poised to sieze Africa and halt its independence movements.

THESE CHARGES, reported by Muhammad Speaks UN and foreign correspondent Charles Howard, were made public by Rev. Michael Scott, a recognized petitioner for Africans in South West Africa.

It is this financial combine, says Wolfe, that is "drawing the U.S. toward a commitment to defend European interest in Africa South, and those (European interests) are diametrically oppossed to African interests in an independent Africa."

Last Year, it was pointed out, saw the establishment in the U.S. of the Belgian-American Development Corp., whose chairman and president is Adm. Alan G. Kirk, U. S. Navy (retired) former ambassador to Belgium.

KIRK IS ALSO a director of the Belgian-American Banking Corp., and the Belgian-American Bank and Trust company, both of which are affiliated with the Societe Generale de Belgique.

This industrial complex exclusively controls an area in southern Africa rich in copper, coal diamonds, tin, zinc, cobalt, cadmium, palladium, gold and uranium.

"Though all this wealth is in Africa," Wolfe says, "It is not regarded as belonging to Africans."

These giant cooporations, it was said, joined by interlocking directorates on whose boards sit members of parliaments and retired military officails, financed Col. Mobutu in the Congo against the late Premier Patrice Lumumba. Today, they finance Tshome in Katanga.

REV. SCOTT, in another warning to the UN, urged strong measures to free the Africans and break up the "unholy alliance."

Together with African and Asian delegates he called for sanctions including a trade boycott against South Africa, which is accused of forming an alliance with the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland, Southern Rhodesia and the Portuguese rulers of Angola and Mozambique and taking in Tshombe as junior partner.

Scott called again for a UN inquiry in "the challenge presented by the powerful industrial complex existing in Central and Southern Africa (which) wielded more power that any state in Africa and worked in close alliance with the racist government of South Africa."

THE U. S. PROTESTS that American loans and investments in southern Africa were "intended to improve the social and economic conditions of all the citizens and residents." Britain joined the U.S. in declaring that sanctions and a boycott would not hurt South Africa.

But Africans point out that South Africa buys 43 per cent of its goods from Britain and 20 per cent from the U.S.

MUHAMMAD SPEAKS
Published Bi-Weekly
Vol. 2, No. 11 Feb. 18, 1963

Published by
Muhammad's Mosque No. 2
634 EAST 79th ST., CHICAGO 19, ILL.
ABerdeen 4-8622-23
Application to mail at second-class postage rates is pending at Chicago, Illinois
SUBSCRIPTION RATES:
In Chicago 12 Issues $1.20, 24 Issues $2.40; Outside Chicago, 12 Issues $1.80.

INDEX TO FEATURES:

Prayer In Islam ..... 12
Book Review ..... 15
Who Buys Jazz? ..... 20
Sonny Liston ..... 22
Canty Case ..... 3, 4
Taj Mahal ..... 11
Women's Page ..... 16, 17
Science, Medicine ..... 6
Lazz ..... 23
Classified Ads ..... 22

Punishment Without Crime

Sentenced For Self Defense!

A Wife Relives Husband's Desperate Battle To Live

BULLET HOLES in car owned by her husband are indicated by Mrs. Gladys Canty, who says her husband did the right thing by fighting back when white state revenue agents tried to kill him.

Her husband, Albert Canty, Jr., was sentenced to 15 to 20 years in the Georgia State prison for the fatal shooting of Agent Glenn Jenkins.

(Continued from Page 1)

I'd rather have a man like that than someone who'd give up his life for nothing without a fight.

"Any Negro wife and mother in any state would feel the same way. What was he supposed to do? Sit there and let those white men kill him?"

Sobbing softly, Mrs. Gladys Canty continued:

"THOSE WHITE AGENTS were out to get him for no reason and they shot at him and tried to kill him. My husband fought back and one of the agents was killed.

"My husband's trial was a joke. One witness saw the revenue agent shoot first but that didn't make any difference. The jury didn't believe in self-defense for Negroes and the judge took it from there.

Judge Alverson gave my husband 15 years without batting an eye and as far as they're concerned that's the end of it. But for me and my husband and children it's just the beginning of a awful lonliness and I don't know how we're going to do.

"WE'VE ALL suffered so much, my hope's almost gone and I don't know which way to turn.

"But I'll tell you how the whole thing started and you draw your own conclusions.

"Two white men in an unmarked car stopped my husband as he was driving back to Atlanta from my cousin's place in Zebulon (about 54 miles from Atlanta). He'd gone there to kill some hogs.

"THEY SAID 'godammit nigger!' where the hell you going? You better slow that g....d... thing down...We ought to lock you up right now....We're revenue agents!"

Fighting to control herself, the 26-year-old mother of four continued:

"My husband could smell the liquor on their breath and could see whiskey bottles on the seat of their car. He felt there was going to be some trouble. But before he could even answer, the men began to curse and swear at him and made all kinds of threats.

"HE WAS TOLD to follow the agents' car into town. Then, they switched and told him to go in front of them, which he did. The agents began jockeying with him on the highway by pulling up in front and alongside him.

"When they got to Atlanta the men ordered him to turn off the main highway and they drove to a colored section called the Pittsburg area."

Then, one pulled his gun and aimed it at Albert.

"HE SAID, 'This is it, nigger,' and started shooting into Al-

(Continued On Page 4)

Mr. Milquetoast?

No, It's Georgia's Negro Lawmaker

ATLANTA — To the surprise of many, the crucial issue of fair employment will not be one of the high priority programs of State Senator Leroy Johnson, first Negro to serve in the Georgia legislature since Reconstruction.

In fact Mr. Johnson, who is addressed here by his fellow white lawmakers as "Leroy," instead of the customary "Mr. Senator" admits he has no program at all.

Senator Johnson told Muhammad Speaks last week that he is not advocating fair employment at the present time and does not have it in his timetable for the future.

"My primary aim," says the Senator, "is to represent the Negro as an 'ethnic group' in such a manner as to 'influence a better flow of democracy.'"

He offered no concrete program on police brutality, stating merely he thought it should be "left up to local leaders."

Asserting that he hoped his election would serve as an incentive for Negroes throughout the South to enter politics and run for public office, he declared his chief interest is in voter registration and added he hopes to be re-elected.

Asked what he thought of Muslims in America, his reply was that he doesn't believe in extremism or in black or white supremacy but feels that the Muslims have the right to say whatever they want to say.

"IS THERE ANY JUSTICE for Negroes?" ask Mr. and Mrs. Albert Canty, Sr. Their son, father of four, has been sentenced to 15 to 20 years in prison for the self-defense shooting of a white Georgia State revenue agent.

Push Fund Drive To Aid Canty

ATLANTA—More than $1,000 has been contributed to the Albert Canty Legal Defense Fund as churches civic groups and citizens close ranks in their fight to right a cruel and inhuman wrong.

Rev. A. S. Dickerson, pastor of Central Methodist church and chairman of the fund raising drive has issued an urgent national appeal for contributions to be used for an appeal of Canty's 15 to 20 year sentence.

DEFENSE ATTORNEY Dan Duke has said he is willing to appeal Canty's case to the Supreme Court. Atty. Duke commented after the decision: "If he had been a white man he probably would have been acquitted."

Dad Of Four Gets 15 Years In Revenue Agent's Death

REV. A. S. DICKERSON, pastor of Central Methodist church of Atlanta which Albert Canty, Jr., is a member, heads the Canty Legal Defense Fund which has issued an urgent national appeal for funds. In this photo he holds a check contributed by a sympathizer. Funds will finance Canty's appeal and assist his destitute wife and four children.

(Continued from Page 3)

bert's car.

"My husband ducked down in his seat and reached for the gun he had taken to kill the hogs with. Without raising his head to see where the agents were he shot back through the car door. This is when they say he killed agent Glenn Jenkins.

"When Albert heard them clicking their guns like they were out of bullets he got up from the floor of the car and drove out of there fast to the home of a friend who lives in Pittsburg.

"THE COPS came got him and made him lie down on the ground while they put handcuffs on him. They threw him in the station wagon and they all began to beat him unmercifully.

"My husband was beaten all the way to the police station and was in such bad shape at that time they had to take him to Grady hospital. While he was waiting for treatment the policemen took him into a room at the hospital and gave him another terrible beating in there.

HERE, THE slender Mrs. Canty broke down and was unable to continue.

The horror of her husband's arrest, the vicious bloody beatings he suffered and the hate-filled trial which assured his conviction have proven almost more than she can bear.

CANTY'S TWO-DAY murder trial ended when an all-white Fulton Superior Court jury returned a voluntary manslaughter conviction. A silent crowded courtroom listened as the jury foreman read the verdict.

The quiet, soft-spoken father of four, had taken the witness stand in his own defense and charged that the deceased agent's partner, John A. McCall, fired at him before he returned the pistol shot that fatally wounded agent Jenkins.

CANTY INSISTED that he only fired after the agent shot at him and charged that the agents had been drinking and that he "spotted a bottle in their car when they stopped me."

Earl Gober, toxocologist, state crime laboratory, told the jury that blood tests he had performed on Agent Jenkins after his death revealed an 0.08 percent of alcohol content. He said it would require more than a ounce 'shot' of whiskey to raise the alcoholic content of the blood to 0.08.

Police chief Herbert Jenkins turned the names of the police officers said to be responsible for Canty's beating over to the grand jury for possible criminal action but no action has been taken.

MRS. CANTY, who sat by her husband's side throughout the trial, left the courtroom following the verdict and burst into tears as she reached the crowded corridors filled with Negro and white spectators.

White defense lawyer Dan Duke said, "If it had been a white man on trial it is very likely he would have been acquitted. I have never seen such a resort to prejudice."

DUKE, WHO urged Atlanta Negroes to form a Defense Committee to prevent such police brutality, charged there are many errors in the trial and said there are good grounds for a new trial.

SYLVANUS OLYMPIO, assasinated President of Togo, was regarded by Africans as one of the pioneer leaders in the march of Africa toward freedom. Olympio, who was educated in Britain, is credited with laying much of the groundwork upon which Africa is building its future.

Editor Tells Why

Muslims Are Victims Of Violence

BALTIMORE, Md. — A newspaper official here punctured the hate and violence labeling of Muslims by whites by pointing out that the anti-Muslim campaigns are motivated by guilt and fear—because "Muhammad doesn't preach the doctrine of love."

Chester M. Hampton, assistant managaing editor of the Afro-American newspaper, in a front-page feature article, wrote at one point:

"White men in America — all over the world in fact, — have sown a great deal of hatred and resentment. This has given them feelings of guilt and apprehension."

HE OBSERVED THAT while the Honorable Elijah Muhammad has been compared with Father Divine " and others of that ilk," the Muslim leader, "unlike the flamboyant leaders of the other unconventional religious sects," does not preach the doctrine of love."

"And for that reason," Hampton declared, "white people cannot laugh at him — and the colored man whom whites can't laugh at is one dangerous colored man in their eyes."

Hampton mocked the "Black Merchants of Hate" title on an article in the Jan. 26 issue of the Saturday Evening Post — Composed by "a colored and a white writer" — by asserting flatly:

"IF THEY HAD used the word 'victims' instead of 'merchants,' I might have been more confident that they were trying to do something more informative than to merely manufacture another "shocker."

Commenting further on the magazine story — relates an incident where Minister Malcolm X of New York's Mosque No. 7 dispersed a crowd gathered around policemen who had "clubbed a Muslim over the head and took him to jail" — Hampton remarked:

"HERE THE COPS blunder themselves into a bad situation; call on New York's top Muslim to help them out of it; then seemed surprised and dissatisfied when he is able to do so.

"Of course it must have been an awesome thing for the cops to realize there was more discipline in the Muslim movement than there is in the police department."

Editor Hampton concluded by stating that he is "glad there is an Elijah Muhammad." Among the reasons he enumerated was:

"I am glad there is someone to care about the uncared-about."

He referred to his statement that the Muslims "recruit followers in the lower socio-enconomic groups and in jails."

Congolese: Negroes My Brothers

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y.— "I am very interested in the condition of the American Negro. I consider the Negroes of America as my brothers."

The speaker was Alphonse Lema, second secretary of the Congolese UN Mission — a 30-year-old diplomat who has not allowed protocol to keep him from all segments of New York life and whose friends are common people and businessmen.

Lema, who was born in Leopoldville, is keenly interested in the problems of the Negro in America.

In his many visits to Harlem he has found, he said, the people warm and kind to him. He declared that he found no barriers between himself, an African, and American Negroes.

"They treat me like a brother," he asserted.

STINGY BEAVER
MADE TO ORDER

Announcing Our

GRAND OPENING

Your past patronage made it possible and necessary to move to larger quarters. Check our GRAND OPENING PRICES on

HATS MADE TO ORDER

Mail Orders Welcome

Write for information and prices. State style and size.

GENTS FURNISHINGS

Hats Cleaned & Blocked the Factory Way

Bacon's Custom Hatters

654-56 E. 47th Street Chicago 53, Ill.

KEnwood 6-9216

Truth, Mightier Than The Sword

MUHAMMAD

EVERY SUNDAY MORNING

ON CHICAGO RADIO

WEBH-fm

6:30 A

DI

93.

Racists' Pipe Dream

A Weak War Cry From A Wan And Weary Crew

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — "White Men Unite!"...create a "Wholesome White Folk Community ..." cries the fading white supremist National States' Rights Party, from its dilapadated headquarters here.

In an official platform, NSRP nails down its wishful lily-white plan for the nation, outlines it's racial, economic, social, states' rights and foreign policies at the same time soliciting new members.

Planks from the NSRP platform include:

RACIAL POLICY — We believe that only members of our White Folk Community be allowto take part in the affairs of government or serve in the courts.

— We believe that immigration should be restricted to select White individuals.

— We believe in the creation of a wholesome White Folk Community, with a deep spiritual consciousness of a common past and a determination to share a common future.

ECONOMIC POLICY — We approve of labor unions, run by honest White men and free of subversive influence.

— We believe that the government should refrain from competing with private enterprise, and from interfering in the hiring policies of private business.

SOCIAL POLICY — We demand the complete reorganization of our educational system, so that every individual White citizen is afforded full opportunity to realize his vocational ambitions.

— We demand the creation of a clean and honest White government, which will provide the basis for a sound economy, with full employment and improved living conditions for White citizens of every age.

STATES' RIGHTS POLICY — We demand that the federal government stop fostering thought-control, and refrain from violating the traditional social customs of the individual states.

— We demand that the federal government cease interfering with the sovereign rights of the states, as guaranteed by the Constitution.

FOREIGN POLICY — We approve the strengthening of cultural and moral ties among all White nations, in view of the world-wide suvival crisis which the White Man Faces.

— We demand that White Christian boys never again be sent to fight and die on foreign soil to appease the interests of an alien minority.

Complete Watch Repair

Any standard make repairable watch cleaned - repaired - broken and worn parts replaced. One year guarantee—Complicated watches slightly higher.

TR 4-3800 368 E. 71st St.

PARK MANOR SALES & APPLIANCE COMPANY
Chicago, Illinois

ATTENTION BUSINESS and PROFESSIONAL MEN

CALL 483-3025

For the lowest cost Answering Service in town. We make and save you money.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

CROOK
FUNERAL HOME
4638 SOUTH INDIANA AVENUE
DRexel 3-6632
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

SEE CALL WRITE RUDY HARLOW

ME

RUDY HARLOW

Sales Representative

FREE TICKETS TO 1963 AUTO SHOW

McFarland Buick

FREE TICKETS TO 1963 AUTO SHOW

McFARLAND BUICK CO.
1234 W. 63rd ST. WA 5-2200

Black Taxes, White Taxes

Segregating The $$$ Money

VALDOSTA, Ga. — There are black taxes and there are white taxes and never the twain shall meet.

This, apparently, is the underlying thought behind the most recent move of racist officials here.

UNDER NEGRO PRESSURE, "White" and "Colored" signs have been removed from the newly-built service windows. But tax record books still will be kept by race, as the tax commissioner stubbornly says separate tax books are required by law.

Dollar bills are all the same color though Americans who use them to pay taxes are of many different hues.

THE DOLLAR SPENT by a Negro on his taxes goes just as far as one spent by a white tax payer but the returns a Negro gets from his tax dollar are much smaller throughout the country.

Negro observers here point out that segregating the tax money as it is collected is a foolish and costly scheme because once the money is collected it is impossible to distinguish between "black tax dollars" and "white tax dollars."

THEY DO NOT FAIL to note, however, that though the tax rate imposed on black and white is the same, Negroes are barred from a way of life that their "black tax dollars" support.

SEE everything on your TELEVISION in thrilling COLOR!

NOW you can see everything on your own TV set in wonderful color. Sensational COLOR-V filter screen fits right over your TV glass... instantly changes dull dreary black & white pictures to brilliant, eye-filling colors. Attach it yourself in a few seconds. You, your family, your friends will really enjoy the color effects. Send no money, pay postman $2.98 plus C.O.D. and postage charges, or remit with order, and we will ship COLOR-V postpaid. Mention screen size when ordering.

only $2.98

SUPERIOR PRODUCTS, Dept.
34 East 12th St., New York 3, N. Y.

ST. 3-1113 ST 3-1114

MATERRE BROS.
Paint & Wallpaper Co.

FREE DELIVERY — CUT RATES
422 E. 71st STREET CHICAGO 19, ILL.

. . . GET HOSPITALITY AND SERVICE
WHEN IN CHICAGO
MAKE YOURSELF COMFORTABLE IN THE HOTEL FAMOUS FOR WARM, EFFICIENT SERVICE
Modern Facilities Ideally Located

THE SUTHERLAND HOTEL

Cor. 47th St. & Drexel Blvd.
Chicago, Illinois
For Reservation Phone
ATlantic 5-2100
EARLINE ROBERTSON, Manager

Sinatra Hits Hypocrisy And Needless Poverty

NEW YORK — Frank Sinatra, one of the great popular vocalists who has often been presented in an unfavorable light by the American press, probably gave newspaper publishers future ammunition to be used against him in the wake of brutally frank interview in the February edition of Playboy magazine.

Sinatra, whose cronies include Sammy Davis, Jr., Dean Martin and Peter Lawford, assailed Christian hypocrisy, hit poverty in a nation whose standard of living leads the world and called for admission of Red China to the United Nations.

RAPPING Christian hypocrisy, Sinatra recalled the leering, cursing lynch mob in Little Rock reviling a meek, innocent little 12-year-old Negro girl as she tired to enroll in public school. "Weren't they — or most of them — devout churchgoers?" he asked.

"I detest the two-faced who pretend liberality but are practiced bigots in their own mean little spheres,, Sinatra declared. "...When lip service to some mysterious deity permits bestiality on Wednesday and absolution on Sunday — cash me out."

ASKED HOW THE United States can combat Communist expansion into underdeveloped nations other than from massive material aid and guidance, Sinatra said: "Attending rallies sponsored by 110-percent anti-Communist cultists or donning white sheets and riding with the Klan ...isn't the answer. All I know is that a nation with our standard of living, with our Social Security system, TVA, farm parity, health plans and unemployment insurance can afford to address itself to the cancers of starvation, sub-standard housing, educational voids and second-class citizenship that still exist in many backsliding areas of own country. When we've cleaned up these blemishes, then we can go out with a clean conscience to see where else in the world we can help.

"Hunger is inexcusable in a world where grain rots in silos and butter turns rancid while being held for favorable commodity prices."

THE THIN MAN, who has made well over $25,000,000 from records, films, night-club appearances and investments, called for the admission of red China, observing that you can't kick "800,000,000 Chinese under the rug and simply pretend that they don't exist."

Queried regarding the prospects for an eventual American rapprochement with Russia, Sinatra replied that he is a singer, not prophet or diplomat. However, he expressed a desire to go to the USSR with Ella Fitgerald and Count Basie, not to sell the American way of life but to "wail up a storm with real American jazz" for the Russian kids.

Emancipation Calendar

Supreme Life Insurance Company, headquartered in Chicago, one of the leading Negro owned and operated insurance firms in the U. S., has issued a 1963 souvenir calendar in observance of the centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation of 1863, which freed Negroes from a life of slavery. The calendar is also a part of a national advertising and public relations program tying in the prolamation with the present progress made by Negroes in every phase of American life. — (ANP)

SCIENCE and MEDICINE

Dentists Chew Up 'Whites Have Better Teeth' Claim

By JOSEPH WALKER
(Muhammad Speaks Correspondent)

NEW YORK — A trio of prominent Negro dentists here angrily put the bite on oft quoted reports that the teeth of Negroes are inferior to those of whites.

"Emphatically no, this isn't so!" exclaimed one of them — Dr. Julian W. Ande son — who received his DDS from Howard University in 1949 and is currently an instructor in oral surgery at Columbia University, where he did post g aduate work.

President of the North Harlem Dental Society, Dr. Julian said:

THERE IS NO difference from any dental standard in the teeth of Negroes and whites other than the pigment. Teeth of black people are not chalk white but contain color. To say Negro teeth are inferior to whites' is a totally void. And cannot be proved statistically, clincially or any other way.

"Exploitation of Negroes in the United States contributes to bad teeth of many Negroes. The scourge of those who have degenerated teeth is not their racial background, but their economic condition. If these Negroes, especially in the south, were given more opportunities to afford three meals a day, clothing, shelter and decent dental service, their teeth would be better."

ALSO CHEWING UP the "whites have better teeth" claim were two other well known Negro dentists.

They told Muhammad Speaks that the e are many indications that Negro teeth are not "inferior" to white teeth, but in reality in many cases are "superior."

Both related that in New York city clinics in neighborhoods where they work had encountered countless cases of pove ty-ridden Negroes who possessed exceptionally healthy and strong teeth, even though they were never brushed or cared for - as well as good gums and jaws. Because of their positions with white-controlled agencies, they asked that they not be identified.

DR. ANDERSON observed that there are "regional differences in teeth."

"For instance," he said, "people from Louisiana and Texas generally have good teeth because the water there has natural fluorine. This is why dental authorities want fluoride added to the water supply of cities."

"Diet can affect teeth he pointed out." Eskimo teeth are short and black because they chew blubber (fat from whales) and East Indians have black teeth from chewing beetal nuts. These are not racial differences but usage differences.

NEGRO TEETH are not inferior to white teeth, says Dr. Julian W. Anderson, 36-year-old instructor in oral surgery at Columbia University. He was backed by two other Negro dentist who said that in many cases the teeth of Negroes are superior to those of whites.

Aleutian Mink Used In Study

Link Cancer, Virus Infection

LA JOLLA, Calif. — It may turn out that cancer and kidney disease - two of the great killers - are end products of simple virus infections that smolder for years before entering their final destructive stage.

Basis for these startling observations is a study involving the valuable Aleutian mink now underway here at the Scripps Clinic and Ressearch Foundation.

DR. FRANK J. DIXON, head of the division of experimental pathology at Scripps, told a March of Dimes and Atomic Energy Commission meeting that the Aleutian mink, a nobleman of the animal kingdom, is an ideal subject for studying progressive stages of infections.

He asserted also that hereditary factors apparently control the effectiveness of man's immunity defense system against both cancer and kidney disease.

Several years ago it was discovered that mink suffered a kidney disease which was traced to a virus. Dr. Dixon later learned that the virus infects cells called lymphoid plasma cells, which manufacture antibodies to fight infections.

Though the infection causes lymphoid cells to produce a tremendous amount of antibody, the antibody is not effective against the virus.

AS THE INFECTION smolders the antibodies combine with a protein in the animal's blood. Millions of these combinations slowly deposit in the kidney. The result is a kidney disease called glomerulonephritis.

Dr. Dixon brought several dozen sick animals to Scripps for observation. A strange thing is happening. One animal is developing leukemia.

Only the Aleutian mink gets the kidney disease. This indicates a hereditary factor is required.

Dr. Dixon and Dr. Robert A. Goode of the University of Minnesota believe a similar chain of events happen to man.

Hog, Horse Hair Used To Cure Brain Malady

Hog and horse hair can be used to cure a brain disease that cause as many as 100,000 new stroke cases each year in the United States.

The coarse hairs, each about a quarter-inch long, are shot into the diseased portion of cerebral arteries by a specially designed, pencil-shaped air gun, said Dr. John P. Gallagher, developer of the new procedure, in his description of the process in the American Medical Association Journal.

DR. GALLAGHER explained that the hairs are shot into aneurysms of the brain - blister like sacs that form in the wall of the arteries.

He estimated that aneurysms cause as many as 100,000 of the 500,000 to 600,000 new stroke cases each year in America. Dr. Gallagher is neurosurgeon at Washington's Georgetown University hospital and Providence hospital.

In developing his procedure, Dr. Gallagher theorized that short, stiff animal hairs, if injected directly into the bulging aneurysm on the artery, would cause clotting of the aneurysm.

THE HAIRS have scales that serve as a nucleus around which natural clotting agents in the blood could form.

If the aneurysm could become clotted, he reasoned, other cells in the blood, called fibroblasts, would turn the clots into scar-like tissue and eventually shrink the artery to normal size.

THE SURGEON put his theory into practice last June and the results were dramatic, he said. The surgery was used on 15 patients. One patient died from causes not related to the new procedure, and the other 14 are alive and well, he said.

In one case, the arterial swelling disappeared 20-minutes after injection of six shafts of horse hair, each about a quarter-inch long. The patient, a 34-year-old service station manager, left the hospital ten days later completely recovered.

Bright New Trend In Medicine

Skill Of Rejoining Limbs May Be Heart Surgery Boon

BOSTON — "Reimplantation," the important new medical trend of rejoining severed limbs, may pay many other medical dividends as well.

Other operations such as heart surgery, will benefit from skills developed in joining small arteries and veins, informed sources said last week.

The reimplants will lay the groundwork for future operations to transplant limbs from one person to another. Limbs conceivbly could be willed to human parts banks doctors say. However, such transplant sugery awaits answers too intense research, now under way, into why human body almost always rejects tissue from another person.

NO ONE knows precisely how many persons lose limbs in accidents, though a pioneer study at the National Academy of Sciences indicates that 7,500 Americans a year are fitted with artificial arms or legs. Most of these amputees have diseased limbs that are surgically removed but about one-third are accident victims who could be candidates for reimplant surgery.

When an ambulance rushed 37-year-old William Hunt to Peter Ben Brigham hospital here recently, his leg was nearly severed, the result of an automobile accident.

Until recently surgeons would have amputated the leg. But an operating team of 30, including seven surgeons, nailed the broken leg bone together, rejoined veins and arteries and restored vital blood flow in a six-hour operation. Hunt is now able to move his toes and his leg seems well on the way to functioning normally again.

ALREADY AT LEAST a dozen such cases have been reported, including eight in which arms, legs, hands or feet were totally cut off.

In three of these cases reimplantation apparently has been successful, but surgeons still are waiting to learn whether operations to rejoin nerve ends will bring back normal limb functioning. Although the five other cases were failures, doctors consider any success at all a major break through.

In September, a paper-cutting machine in Chicago amputated a 41-year-old Negro worker's hand just above the wrist. Surgeons at Presbyterian-St. Luke's hospital peering through an operating microscope at the tiny blood vessels, rejoined the hand.

A 17-YEAR-OLD California girl on a Canadian vacation in July fell from a parachute ride in a carnival. A guy wire broke her fall but broke off her arm. Surgeons rejoined the arm and when the girl returned home in November she was apparently doing well. But later doctors detected a bone infection and were forced to reamputate.

In the case of the Chicago amputee, physicians said, "we don't think the hand ever will be entirely normal but the patient should be able eventually, to feed and clothe himself, pick up objects and be employable."

In these cases, of course, patients can be fitted with artificial limbs. But despite considerable advances in these devices, doctors say they are never a good substitute for the original limbs.

MUCH OF THE researchs centered on new ways to join blood vessels. The usual technique of sewing them together with silk or other sutures is difficult and time consuming.

A new joining stapler, developed in Russia and refined in this country, is now going into commercial production.

New types of fast-setting plastic glues which do not irritate human tissue may also speed up blood vessel surgery. Researchers use such a glue to strengthen seals formed with staples.

MEDICAL FAMILY WILLIAMS — One of the most outstanding medical families in America gathered at the installation banquet of the Cook County (Illinois) Physicians' Association last week in Chicago as one brother succeeded another brother as president of CCPA. Dr. Jasper F. Williams was succeeded by his brother, Dr. James B. Williams. Another brother, Dr. Charles L. Williams, was installed as assistant secretary. In photo (from left to right) are: Dr. and Mrs. Jasper Williams, Dr. and Mrs. James Williams, Mrs. and Dr. Charles L. Williams and Mrs. Clara B. Williams, mother of the brother-physicians. In front are Brenda and James B. III, the daughter and son of the new CCPA president and his wife.

Negro MD's Protest

Doctors Rap 'Legal Kidnap' Of Welfare Children

Negro doctors strongly denounced the proposal by the minister-president of the Chicago Branch NAACP that the authorities should wrest illegitimate children from their unfortunate welfare-receiving mothers, and urged the Rev. Wilbur N. Daniel to publicly retract the brutal plan.

The stand of the medical men, members of the Cook County (Illinois) Physician's Association, was revealed at the CCPA's installation banquet last week in Chicago's Morrison Hotel by the outgoing president, Dr. Jasper F. Williams.

Rev. Daniel

In his progress report, he told the 52-year-old medical organization that "we have opposed (the) proposed legislation for (the) legal kidnap of illegitimate children, and we have asked Rev. Daniel to retract the proposal.

"We will do all we can," he added, "to help defeat it."

Reverend Daniel, pastor of Antioch Missionary Baptist Church here, could not be reached for comment.

The pastor made his statements and even stirred up a storm even before he was officially installed on January 1 as head of the local NAACP.

Dr. Jasper Williams, who was succeeded to the presidency by his brother, Dr. James B. Williams, also emphasized the disturbing report that the medical schools of the nation are continuing to lose out in attracting students — applications to medical schools were reported on the decline for the fifth straight year — and "this means that most of the doctors are not being replaced."

The CCPA moved from one progressive reign to another when Dr. James was installed as sucessor to his brother, Dr. Jasper. And, perhaps "waiting in the wings" is onother brother, Dr. Charles L. Williams, who was installed as assistant secretary.

Other physicians installed during the affair were Dr. Robert Schoop, vice president; Dr. James Jones, secretary, and Dr. T. C. Henderson, treasurer. Dr. T. Manuel Smith conducted the installation rites.

PRINCIPAL SPEAKER was Judge James D. Crosson of Chicago's Superior Court. Other program participants included Dr. James M. Allison, Jr., chairman, executive Committee, who made the presentation of awards to Dr. William P. Quinn and Mrs. Anne Schoop; Dr. E. K. McDonald, master of ceremonies; Rev. Morris H. Tynes, invocation, and Betty Jackson King Artists' Group, music.

Oust Chicago's NAACP Boss, Says Ohio Group

CINCINNATI, Ohio — Chicago Negroes should repudiate the "leadership" of a minister who, as newly elected president of the Chicago NAACP, declared that poor Negroes on relief should have their children taken away from them.

That is the swift decision of a group of Negroes here and in Dayton.

They had read in Muhammad Speaks that Rev. Wilbur N. Daniel, Sr., Negro pastor of Antioch Missionary Baptist church and NAACP president-elect, urged that poor Negroes should have their children taken from them and that the parents should be cast adrift without help.

IN JOINT SESSION, the Dayton and Cincinnati divisions of the Universal Negro Improvement Association and African Communities (U.N.I.A.) "condemned with all the vigor at their command the statement of Rev. Wilbur N. Daniel, Sr., of Chicago, who advocated the breakup of these families on relief."

The divisions, meeting at the Cincinnati Liberty Hall here, "called upon all free men and Christians to repudiate the leadership of such a character."

Speakers at the Emancipation Proclamation Centennial program included Raymond Kelly, president of the Dayton division, Mrs. Hattie Jennings, and Rev. W. E. Sanders, president of the Cincinnati division.

Cry Of Unborn Lost On Modern Society?

NEW YORK, N. Y. — The present controversy raging around so-called illegitimate children of mothers on public aid, recalls the famous words of the American Judge and reformer, Ben B. Lindsey, who said:

.."Motherhood is so honorable a thing that nothing — no convention — can possibly make it dishonorable; and from the standpoint of the right of the child, the unborn — the unmarried mother should be granted by society the same reverence and regard as the married mother.

"I am for children first, because I am for society first, and the children of today are the society of tomorrow. I insist, therefore, on the right of the child to be born, and that there be no "illegitimate" children.

"I DEMAND for the unmarried mother, as a sacred channel of life, the same reverence and respect as for the married mother; for Maternity is a cosmic thing, and once it come to pass our conventions must not be permitted to blaspheme it."

SOUTHWAY HOTEL
6012 South Park Avenue
CHICAGO 37, ILLINOIS
Call BUtterfield 8-5000
FOR RESERVATION

AUTO INSURANCE
Liability • Collision
8 MONTHS TO PAY
Come In or Call Today
FRANK L. WILLIAMS
4302 South Parkway
LI 8-5871
Chicago 53, Illinois

VISIT
Muhammad's
MOSQUE No. 2
5335 S. GREENWOOD Chgo., Ill.
Every Wednesday and Friday, at 8:00 P.M.
Sundays at 2:00 P.M.

Qualified Teachers Wanted
For a Growing institution of learning, the UNIVERSITY OF ISLAM
Opportunities unlimited, leadership, advancement, modern techniques, pleasant surroundings, favorable colleagues, long term placement.
Only those with foresight, ambition and capacity for intellectual growth need apply.
Send full resume, photo and phone number in first reply.
BOX UI-111
MUHAMMAD SPEAKS NEWSPAPER
5335 South Greenwood Avenue
Chicago 15, Illinois

Chinese Scholar Warns 1st African Congress Of Trick Used By Freedom's Enemies

Atlanta Dean Elected to ICA Permanent Body

ACCRA, Ghana — "The African gaint who has already stood on his own two feet is invincible and his future is bright and boundless," a Chinese scholar told the First International Congress of Africanists here.

But Professor Liu Si-mu of the Academy of Sciences of China warned that imperialism is playing the trick in some African countries of "granting independence with one hand and taking it back with the other."

PROFESSOR LIU told representatives from 42 countries that China, whose own history is studded with years of bloody existence under the oppressor's iron heel, is standing shoulder to shoulder with the African peoples on a common front.

He said, "The awakening of Africa and the national liberation movements of the African peoples are an important part of the struggle of the people of the whole world for an enduring peace and the progress of humanity."

Liu noted that in order to hold back the tide revolution in Africa, cling to the last front of colonial exploitation and pave the way for neo-colonialism, every colonial power - old or new—is using double-faced tactics of brutal supression and political swindle to check the national liberation movements in Africa.

"EVEN IN THE COUNTRIES which have already won independence," he said, "imperialism has not slackened its effort to carry out aggression. Under the impact of the surging tide of African national liberation movements, the citadels of old colonialism are collasping one after the other. But imperialism is making every effort to retain its colonial rule in a new form.

"It is still controlling the national economy of many African countries and exploiting their peoples in the same old manner. Not a few African countries have been compelled to sign binding political treaties and allow imperialism to station troops and establish military bases on their territories. They thus remain under the political domination of imperalism."

Pointing out that Africa has a long history and a splendid culture, the Chinese scholar said that it is not difficult to see that the economic and cultural disintegration of Africa was entirely due to the prolonged exploitation and enslavement by colonialism and imperialism.

HE TRACED THE INVASION of Africa by Western colonialists since the 15th Century, asserting that their "prolonged and ruthless plundering and enslavement" destroyed African culture and economy and caused great suffering among the Africans, "including a widespread hunger and poverty and death on a mass scale."

He cited Egypt, and the Kush Empire and the Axum Kingdom, south of Egypt, as centers of ancient civilization and culture and said that in subsequent times the kingdoms of Ghana and Mali and the Songhay Empire in West Africa were all prosperous and powerful countries.

"Central and South Africa also witnessed the rise of several kingdoms, including Monomotapa, Congo and Buganda. And to this day," he continued, " the rock paintings of Tassili Mountains, the terra cotta figures of Nok, the bronze sculpture of Benin, the magnificent royal palaces and mosques at Timbuktu and the lofty granite towers of Zimbabwe all bear eloquent testimony to the outstanding cultures of Africa south of the Sahara."

DR. HORACE MANN BOND, dean of education at Atlanta University in Georgia, who attended the meeting as an observer, was elected a member of the permanent council of the International Congress of Africanists.

Presiding officer was Kenneth Dike, principal of the University College, Ibadan, Nigeria. New President of ICA is M. Alioune Diop, editor of Presence Africaine. The next meeting will be held in Senegal. in 1965.

DR. HORACE MANN BOND, dean of education at Atlanta University in Georgia. Dr. Bond attended the recent eight-day first International Congress of Africanists in Accra, Ghana, and was elected to the Permanent Council of the ICA. The sessions were held at the University of Ghana, Commonwealth Hall. Forty-two countries were represented, including Russia and the Chinese People's Republic.

CRESCENT OFFICE MACHINE CO.
Rentals (LI. 3-0246)
Supplies
Mon.-Fri. 8:30 to 6:00
Sat. 8:30 to 1:00
WASHINGTON, D. C.

JAKE'S BARBER SHOP
LI. 4-8841
1350-H. St., NE. Washington, D. C.
MEN, WOMEN & CHILDREN
EXPERT BARBERS
It Pleases Us When You Are Happy

JAKE'S RESTAURANT
LI. 4-8801 LI. 7-9255
1338-H. Street, N.E.
KOSHER FOODS
Washington, D. C.

IN INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
VISIT
MUHAMMAD'S MOSQUE
at 510 N. WEST ST.
EVERY SUNDAY 2:00 P.M.

NATION
Bakery Shop
5700 Georgia Avenue
BREAD, ROLLS, CAKES, PIES
CAKES AND PASTRY TO ORDER FOR ALL OCCASION CATERING
Yusef and Benjamin 4X, Proprietors
WASHINGTON, D.C. CALL 829-9488

DISCOUNT ☆ Membership Card ☆ DISCOUNT
PHONE: 829-9488 - 5700 W. GEORGIA AVE., N.W. - WASHINGTON, D.C.
Open 8 A.M. to 11 P.M. Monday thru Saturday - Sunday: 9 A.M. to 10 P.M.
The Nation's Super Market
MEATS, GROCERIES, PRODUCE, ETC. FREE DELIVERY
NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
PHONE _____
3 Per Cent Discount On A Dollar With This Coupon
Free Transportation Home

CLOTHING MADE in Our Own Factory
C.O.D. — Cash or Budget
• TO YOUR MEASURE • YOUR CHOICE OF FABRICS
TEMPLE No. 2
Clothing Factory
453 EAST 79TH STREET
Phone TR 4-5224
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

EXTERMINATING EQUIPMENT & SUPPLIES
Complete Do-It-Yourself Kits
BUG KILLER
GUARANTEED TO KILL ANYTHING CRAWLIN' OR FLYIN'
• Powerful Residual Action. Keeps killing up to 12 weeks after its dry
KILLS FAST
Kills ROACHES, Waterbugs, Silverfish, Centipedes, Bedbugs, Ants, Spiders, Etc.
$4.50 PER GAL.
$18.00 5 GALS.
Mail Order SPECIAL
Insecticides packaged in concentrated form for lightweight postal shipments. Mail Orders promptly handled. 50% deposit required with all C.O.D. orders.
INSECTICIDE CONCENTRATE ADD WATER
No. 1—Makes 1 Gal. .....$ 4.75
No. 2—Makes 2 Gals. .....$ 9.25
No. 3—Makes 3 Gals. .....$13.25
No. 4—Makes 4 Gals. .....$16.50
No. 5—Makes 5 Gals. .....$18.50
JANITOR'S SPECIAL
INSECTICIDE CONCENTRATE MAKES 10 GALLONS
$29.95
PROFESSIONAL SPRAYER
Metal construction—will not rust or corrode—will last many years. This sprayer is designed to give you the same results that any professional exterminator could achieve. It has an adjustable nozzle for spraying to the left or right, up or down, fine, fan or course spray and up to a distance of 20 feet.
Holds 1½ Gallons
$9.95
ROWE CHEMICAL CO. - 6804 S. Halsted Street
Chicago, Illinois HUdson 7-2828
Gentlemen: I am enclosing $_____
☐ Full Payment ☐ Deposit
We Pay Postage On Full Payments With Orders
Please send me:
☐ Concentrate No.____Which Costs $_____
☐ Professional Sprayer at $9.95
☐ Janitor's Special $29.95
My Name _____
Address _____
City_____ Zone____ State_____
Rowe Chemical Co. 6804 S. Halsted St., Chicago 21, Ill. HU 7-2828

Still "Hidden" Persuasion

Can Motivational Research Wipe Out Race Hate?

Billions of dollars are spent each year by leading American business for scientific techniques which influence the public to buy their products. Contemplating the results of motivational research — called the science of persuasion — Muhammad Speaks posed the theory that such a science could be used by the government to alter American thinking and rid the country of race prejudice.

IF A WIDELY USED Scientific process can unmask man's inner motivations and help to alter the pattern of human desires, why can't such a process be used by the United States government to wipe out prejudice in America?

"It can," says Dr. Ernest Dichter, president and founder of the Institute of Motivational Research, which has uncovered the hidden wants of millions of consumers, thus guiding manufacturers and advertisers to tremendous monetary returns.

"The same principals that apply to selling or having any other ideas or concepts accepted could be applied by the government in getting people to accept the rights of Negro citizens," declared Dr. Dichter during an interview with Muhammad Speaks.

POINTING OUT THAT the government fails to take into consideration the emotional attitude of the people and thus fails to get its program across, Dr. Dichter said he believed that motivational research "could definitely be used as tool in creating a better America."

The Institute of Motivational Research, which has branches in 15 countries, is headquartered in a castle-like mansion overlooking the Hudson River Valley in New York. It has been used extensively in the United States and in many foreign countries.

Top business firms have engaged the organization to find — through its psychological techniques — the explanation of human behavior and motivation as a guide to better present their commodities in the highly competitive consumer market. Many have achieved happy results.

Dr. Ernest Dichter

DR. DICTHER IS "FATHER" of motivational research and a member of numerous professional societies, such as the American Psychological Association. He arrived in the United States in 1938 with a Ph.D from the University of Vienna and the idea that psychological techniques could be applied to social organization and to consumer buying.

Today, his institute of trained psychologists and 3,000 interviewers has conducted more than 1500 investigations throughout the world in such projects as voting habits, the donation of blood, the public "image" of young nations and consumer habits in many products.

SAYS DR. DICHTER:

"The science of Motivational research is used extensively in commercial selling and has been used for the past 25 years.

"We've also done some work with the Mayor's Committee on Rights, in New York, on patterns of prejudice, and I serve with the President's Information Service as a consultant."

The scientist would say only that there was a "possibility" that motivational research could have helped in the James Meredith case at the University of Mississippi.

"AT ANY RATE, this is a slow process," he explained, "one that involves finding out what motivates people and what emotional reactions they have to certain things.

"This information must then be analyzed by letting tolerant and intolerant people talk at great length to find areas where they might be persuaded, by means of using modern methods of propaganda and advertising techniques."

Negroes Step Up Struggle For More, Better Jobs In Atlanta

ATLANTA — As "Operation Breadbasket" got underway here a group of white racists threatened that there will be "fewer jobs for Negroes."

The "Operation," lead by Negro ministers, is a boycott (selective patronage, they call it) of white merchants who refuse to hire Negro help on a basis of equality.

Here in this deep South City the "Operation" is being directed against Highland Bakeries, traditionally a stronghold for "white supremancy" hiring policies, although its bread is sold throughout Negro neighborhoods.

MORE THAN 400 ministers have already urged their congregations not to buy Highland Bakeries products until the requests for upgrading Negroes were met. So far all demands have been rejected by the company.

THE STRUCTURE of "Operation Breadbasket," like that of the Philadelphia campaign, is completely informal. The selection of industries and companies within industries and how and when they should be approached is done by a priorities commitee. The priorities committee has no chairman, and the membership constantly shifts.

In recent weeks Negro clergymen throughout the country have begun similar selective buying programs. In addition to Atlanta and Philadelphia, selective buying campaigns have been reported in Chicago, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Wilmington, Del.

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, has indicated the possibility of a nation-wide conference of Negro propects of coordinating all future selective patronage campaigns.

A & L
UPHOLSTERY SHOP
CUSTOM MADE FURNITURE
REUPHOLSTERING & REPAIRING
527 E. 63rd STREET CHICAGO 37, ILL.
NOrmal 7-4365 Free Estimates

ZELLOUS CLEANERS
ALTERATIONS
Pick-Up and Delivery Service
361 EAST 69th STREET
STewart 3-9572
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

UNITY
BODY SHOP
7724 Lexington Avenue
Cleveland, Ohio
BODY AND FENDER REPAIRS
Automatic Transmission Guaranteed
SCHOOL GRADUATE
Bus. 361-8898 Res. SW. 5-6785
Ask for AL

EAST 123rd STREET
FISH AND POULTRY
Grocery Market
FRESH FRUIT AND VEGETABLES
DELIVERED TO YOU . . .
930 East 123rd St. Cleveland, Ohio
Phone: 451-2090
Tommie X., Mgr. Moses X., Asst. Mgr.

GHANA
RESTAURANT & BAKERY
Cleveland's Newest and Semi-Ultra-Modern Asiatic Restaurant. We serve Asiatic style and American Cooked Foods.
12434 Superior Ave. Cleveland, Ohio
MU. 1-9841 OPEN 24 HOURS
— Prompt Delivery Service —

AFRICAN GREETING CARDS IN FULL COLOR
12 CARDS IN PACKAGE
EACH CARD DIFFERENT
PKG. OF 12
only $1.25
HURRY! LEARN THE TRUTH of ancient History from Colorful Picture Post Cards. Suitable for maling as a Gift. (No C.O.D.'s) Send Money Order or Check to:
CHRISTINE JOHNSON
5335 S. Greenwood Ave. Chicago 15, Ill.

AGENTS WANTED

"IT PAYS TO BE NEAT"
TEMPLE No. 2
CLEANERS
SAME DAY or 4 HR. SERIVCE
Pick Up & Delivery
TEMPLE NO. 2
BARBER SHOP
Experts On Any Style
ST 3-8997 — 718 E. 79th Street — Chicago 19

STOP IN, HAVE YOUR BRAKES & FLUID CHECKED
FREE
RHODES GARAGE
& SERVICE STATION
24 HOUR SERVICE
514-526 East 63rd Street
Chicago 37, Illinois
Telephones: NOrmal 7-0094
MUseum 4-2655

Come and Visit
Muhammad's Mosque No. 18
12416 SUPERIOR AVENUE
CLEVELAND 6, OHIO
Phone PO. 1-8373
WEDNESDAY - FRIDAY 8:00 P.M. SUNDAY 2.00 P.M.

Taj Mahal - A Labor Of Love

Timeless Gem Symbol Of Hope To India's Masses

By HERBERT MUHAMMAD
(Muhammad Speaks Correspondent)

AGRA, India — Though the ominous threat of war was hanging heavily over the whole of India, it was difficult to remember this chilling fact after I arrived in Agra and stood before the vast, breath-taking beauty of the wo·ld's most remarkable monument to connubial love — the Taj Mahal.

The majestic Taj Mahal, often called — and justifiably so — "a dream in marble," was built on orders from the Shah Jahan as a shrine for the earthly remains of his beloved and lovely wife, Mumtaz Mahal.

Built in 22 years by an estimated 20,000 workmen, the mausoleum was named for one of the Empress' titles Taj Mahal, meaning "Crown of the Palace."

THIS DOOMED, square is constructed of pure white marble. It rises from a terraced garden overlooking the Jamuna River.

Then central dome, 210 feet high with an internal diameter of 58 feet, is surrounded by four smaller domes. Standing like majestic sentinels at the four corners of the terrace, are four minarets.

The Emperor and his wife lie side by side in centographas six inches apart beneath the central dome, with light filterring through a double screen of marble. The inside walls bear exquisite designs inlaid with semi-precious stones. The Cenotaphs are works of magnificent carved art, profusely inlaid with gems in flowered patterns.

THE MANY - SPLENDORED beauty of the 186-foot square Taj Mahal is attributed inpart to its varying colors and the serene surroundings. Encompassing the terrace is a red sandstone wall.

An anonymous writer once said of the Taj Mahal:

"Masked by a lovely garden and consecrated by the clam of the surrounding scene, the Taj on a moonlit night creates the illusion of a dream in stone."

No diamond could have a more contradictory setting than this magnificant building, for India, while moving mightily to raise the living standards of its people, still bear the unmitigated marks of colonialism.

Yet, I found the confidence and hopefulness of the Indian people inspiring. There is hardly a single one of its millions who do not staunchly believe that India will someday construct a society which will be as rich and as beautiful as their poetic Taj Mahal.

CORRESPONDENT MUHAMMAD and his turbaned Indian guide rest after completing a tour of Taj Mahal. Indians believe that India, the second largest nation in the world will someday build a society just as rich and as beautiful as their Taj Mahal.

A MINARET in the majestic Taj Mahal captures the attention of Muhammad Speaks Correspondent Herbert Muhammad. He is wearing special socks as visitors are not permitted to wear shoes at the world's most beautiful shrine. Four of these minarets stand like sentinels at the four corners of the terrace.

AFRICAN STUDENT Chimere Ikoku, President of the Pan-African Students' Association says African nations, in gaining independence, are just regaining what they formerly had and that the feeling that Africans and Afro-Americans don't get along is just a myth. Here Ikoku and his wife scan through one of West Africa's newspapers.

Africans View America No. 1

Says Africans Must Teach A Thing Or Two To Whites

They're Tops At Science But Need Improvement Morally, Spiritually

Africans have white Americans and Europeans outstripped in three areas:

"Morally, culturally and spiritually, the white man has nothing to teach us," asserts Chimere Ikoku of Nigeria, National President of the Pan African Students Association of the Americas, the largest grouping of foreign students in the western Hemisphere.

"IN INDUSTRY and science we have much to learn and are learning fast," Ikoku believes, "but morally.. " he shakes his head emphatically.

Ikoku, a chemistry major at the University of Chicago does not regard the nations of Africa as "new nations." He points out that they are actually not "new," but simply "regaining what they formely had."

THIS HAS NOT prevented him, however, from tearing apart studies made by his own University and statements in national magazines promugating the peculiar proposition that there is a fundamental incompability between American Negroes and Africans who share mutual distrusts and ill will.

"This allegation about Africans and Afro-Americans 'not getting along' just isn't so," says the young African leader who has lived among Negroes in America for four years. "It is only used by people who do not know history. There are many Afro-Americans on the continent now, making useful contributions to the rebuilding of Africa."

"THESE STUDIES are not scientific and I certainly wish our rebuttals to these articles had received as much publicity as the so-called studies," he said.

"I wish it known that we who are supposed to have been the object of the study reject and deny that they are scientific in any way."

"The obvious ties between the African and their descendents in America are being drawn tighter as the African nations increase their strength and more firmly established their independence," Ikoku says.

IKOKU LITTERLY noted that the theme of one of the articles was "marriages between Africans and Negroes seldom work!" "Can you imagine anyone using as a basis for a scientific study the longevity of marriages?" he asked.

"The divorce rate in this country is 64 percent, which means that 2 of every 3 marriages either end in divorce or separation. Why, it is highly immoral to use such a thing as a basis for such serious statements."

He explained the African view on marriage as "not just a union between two individuals but rather the uniting of two families. Africans, he said, honor their elderly people and a person would be considered insane for trying to put parents away in a home of some kind."

Ikoku, who received his primary and secondary education at Aggrey Memorial School in Arochuku and Lagos Grammar School, Lagos, said that Moise Tshombe of Katanga is guilty of three crimes.

THE FIRST CRIME, he said was "illegal secession," such as happened in the United States' when the South pulled out and went to war with the north.

"The Constitution of the Congo expressly forbade any such action," Ikoku pointed out.

"Secondly, treason — for allowing foreign mercenaries to establish headquarters in the Congo to fight the legally constituted government. I might also add that Patrice Lumumba died in Katanga and I believe in all fairness that Tshombe should not be absolved of blame in his death until it has been properly investigated.

"THIRDLY, TSHOMBE, in collusion with foreign cartels, sought to paralyze the economy of the Congo by printing his own currency and establishing bank illegally and with the aid of foreign cartels from France, Belgium and England."

The young student said there are about 5,000 African students in America now and more will be coming but that this will soon taper off.

"With the ambitious plans now formulating in Africa," he said, "our students will soon come to America only for undergraduate work."

"AFRICANS ALWAYS RETURN HOME," Ikoku says.

Africa's True History To Be Written For First Time

Ground Work Laid For Encyclopedia Africana

ACCRA, Ghana — "Encyclopedia Africana" must be unashamedly Afrocentric but not indifferent to the impact of the outside world upon Africa, or to the impact of Africa upon the outside world."

THE FAMOUS historian and educator, Dr. W. E. B. DuBois with his wife, the former Shirley Graham, shown here in Ghana where he heads up work on the forthcoming African Encyclopedia.

It should not confine itself to "Black Africa" — that portion of the continent South of the Sahara Desert — but should concern itself with the whole of the African continent.

And it should not include African "diaspora," the dispersion of Africans in other countries, for example, the Afro-American peoples, except in certain historical aspects.

SO CONCLUDED the Secretariat for the Encyclopedia Africana after week-long conferences had reviewed and discussed prelimary draft plans for the scope, size, method of organization of material and other matters relating to the preparation of the projected volumns, which will give a comprehensive report of African history.

The Secretariat, which met after the close of the First International Congress of Africanists, thus rejected two previous suggestions concerning the scope of the encyclopedia:

1. That the scope of Encyclopedia Africana would be limited to Africa South of the Sahara, to "Black Africa," thus excluding the whole of the Arab-speaking Africa.
2. That the scope should be broadened to include not only the whole of the African continent, but also the diaspora, so covering, for example, the Afro-American peoples.

THE SECRETARIAT rejected the first position — that the Encyclopedia be confined in scope to Africa South of the Sahara — with little hesitation.

"Historical, ethnological, lingustic and economic ties firmly link together North Africa and 'Africa South.' There were well used trade routes across the desert in the first millennium B. C., and rock paintings of the horse-drawn chariots survive" they pointed out.

"Such highly developed kingdoms as that of ancient Ghana spanned the world of the desert and that of the grasslands: in its northern regions the people were fair-skinned Sanhaja, in its southern, dark-skinned Soninke.

"We think, in other words, that the concept of Africa South of the Sahara is one that tends to mislead, and that the scope of the Encyclopedia Africana should not be defined by reference to it.

"THE SECOND ALTERNATIVE, of including the whole African continent together with the African disapora in the Americas and elsewhere apears a much more attractive possibility.

"In rejecting it, we are governed more by practical considerations — of keeping the Encyclopedia Africana within manageable proportions — than by theoretical factors.

"Nevertheless, there is a sense in which much of the history of, for example, the Negroes in the U. S. A. belongs to the American and not to the African past: their contribution was primarily to the development and growth of America.

"ON THE OTHER HAND many aspects of their history and culture could scarcely be ignored in an Encyclopedia Africana — for example, Yoruba religious survivals in Brazil; Twi lingustic survivals in Jamaica; or, in the sphere of politics, Garveyism. Such topics clearly qualify for inclusion," they concluded.

Prayer Service In Islam

From the book "Religion of Islam." A comprehensive discussion of the sources, principles and practices of Islam.

— By Maulana Muhammad Ali

"O ALLAH! WE BESEECH THEE for help, and seek Thy protection and believe in Thee and rely on Thee and extol Thee and are thankful to Thee and are not ungrateful to Thee and we declare ourselves clear of, and forsake, him who disobeys Thee.

"O Allah! Thee do we serve and for Thee do we pray and prostrate ourselves and to Thee do we betake ourselves and to obey. Thee we are quick, and Thy mercy do we hope for, and Thy punishment do we fear, for Thy punishment overtakes the unbelievers."

"I seek the protection of Allah, my Lord, from every fault and turn to Him.

"O Allah! Thou art the Author of peace, and from Thee comes peace. Blessed art Thou, O Lord of Glory and Honor.

"Nothing deserves to be worshipped except Allah. He is One and has no associate; His is the kingdom and for Him is praise, and He has power over all things. O Allah! There is none who can withhold what Thou grantest, and there is none who can give what Thou withholdest, and greatness does not benefit any possessor of greatness as against Thee."

Thant Hides Killer Hunt, Under UN Rug

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. (HNS) — The murder in 1961 of Patrice Lumumba, the first Prime Minister of the Congo, was swept abruptly under the rug by United Nations Secretary General U. Thant.

In a press conference here last week, Thant killed the investigation by declaring he has "no authority...to take any action regarding the case."

He had been instructed under the Security Council resolution of Feb. 20, 1961, to find and bring to justice the murderers of Lumumba.

IN RESPONSE to a question concerning the correspondence between himself and Ghana President Kwame Nkrumah — after covering the matter of the Security Council resolution, the appointment of a commission to "ascertain the circumstances" of the death of Mr. Lumumba, the failure of the commission to get authority from President Kasavubu and President Tshombe of the Katanga Province to enter the Congo and Katanga, respectively, to make their investigation, and the failure of the Security Council and the General Assembly to act on the commission report — Thant concluded by saying, "so I have authority, either under the Security Council of the General Assembly, to take any action regarding the case."

IN THIS WAY the UN is supposed to wipe its hands of the Lumumba murder.

Strong resentment is expressed here among African representatives here and informed observers to the Secretary-General's effort, as they call it, "to sweep under the rug" the murder of Prime Minister Lumumba.

Lumumba

Further, they point out that the Security Council resolution directing his acting still stands, and they say "he cannot nonchalantly ignore it."

They say he has taken no steps to have the resolution rescinded — and, until he does, it remains binding on him.

Rush Bibles To Close Widening Africa Gap

NEW YORK — Christianity is running a poor third in Africa, but an American organization is increasing its flow to the religious frontier on the Continent in a last-ditch campaign to close the "spiritual gap."

The American Bible Society recently elected Paul A. Hopkins secretary for Africa. Apparently his instructions were to leave no Scripture unturned in keeping Christianity from falling out altogether in the race for Africa's soul.

It was recently revealed that Christianity was puffing along as a winded third, led by two non-Christian religions, Animism, first, and, in second and still moving up fast, Islam.

THE ELECTION of Hopkins, executive secretary of the Evangelical Foundation, Inc., of Philadelphia for 14 years, was preceded by the announcement that the society had expanded its work in the distribution of Scriptures into 25 additional African countries, for a total of 36.

During 1961, the last full year for which figures are available, the ABS distributed 384,312 Bibles in Africa.

The society noted that at least one book of the Bible has been translated into 401 African languages.

At last count, Christianity in Africa had 35,000,000 followers. Animism, a traditional African religion that is not a white import, has 116,000,000 adherents, with Islam, another religion free of the stigma of white importation, racked up 89,000,000 believers.

"Sure, We're Brothers, kid . . . don't let anybody tell you different!"

Letters To The Editor

A Drum Student's View Of Max Roach Article

I am a subscriber to the Muhammad Speaks Newspaper, and would like to take this opportunity to commend the writer's on the wonderful job they are doing.

I find the articles in this paper most educational and stimulating. I would like also to comment on the article written by Max Roach. I am a drum student and very familiar with controversial theme. (White Rape Of Jazz) It has long been the favorite subject among jazzmen.

It seems as though is was only yesterday that whites condemed this music called it the music of the Negro trash, the music of colored folk's.

Today the white musician claims to be the creator's and the best exponent of the music they once condemmed. He teaches at all the schools of music books we are taught from, he is an alleged authority on Jazz.

I am not so bigoted or naive to realize that white musicians have made worthwhile contributions to music, but to state that he is the creator and best exponent of jazz is absured.

I personally believe that jazz in its true form is efficacious only when played by black jazzmen.

Jazz in its true form is a musical expression of and by blacks that has had the most inhuman injustice done them than any people in the world.

Billy Kendal
Brooklyn, N.Y.

"KENNEDY SAID we'd be ready for the Presidency in 40 years, but I can't wait." —From Correspondence

MUHAMMAD SPEAKS

A Greater Destiny

(Continued from Page 1)

that is too near for comfort.

The poor, Lost-found black people here in North America must be told the truth of their slave masters and their evil, hateful and murderous children in the south as well as in any part of the United States of America. No justice for us under the American flag — 400 years is proof enough. Any so-called Negro who thinks so is indeed a fool.

You must know that you are dealing with a race of devils—created to be the enemies of God and all black, brown, yellow and red people. They are determined to deceive you to not believe the truth of them as Allah has revealed it to me; namely, tempting you, and especially our women to practice and do evil and indecency.

As the Bible and Holy Qur-an warns you and me, they will do these things in their last days. They have no shame; they present to you on their television every act of indecency; they show the world they are a people of filth and evil. Their filthy songs of love making is done only to catch the so-called Negroes and other members of the black nation to take you with them to their doom.

You must know the truth of them. They are not the people of Allah (the God of righteousness) as it is written in the Bible: John 8:44; and Holy Qur-an 7:12; 18. At this present time, most of the people think that their creation is the same as ours (the black Nation) . . But this is not so, they were created, by nature, evil and with a determined idea to destroy the darker people by deceit.

MR. MUHAMMAD

But now that Allah (God) has made them manifest, they are angry. Their desire is the same today as it was when Allah separated them 6,000 years ago after upsetting the peace of the righteous — as they have and are doing today. But this time will be for good, in a lake of fire!

The Catholic churches, with the help of its Father in Rome, intend to deceive the so-called Negroes. I will ever be with you with the Truth to warn you of their plans as Allah reveals them to me. Come down off the cross and lay hold to the crescent of Islam.

The battle over the so-called Negroes is now on between Allah and the devils.

HURRY AND JOIN ONTO YOUR OWN KIND! THE TIME OF THIS WORLD IS AT HAND! WRITE TO:

Muhammad's Mosque No. 2
5335 South Greenwood Ave.
Chicago 15, Illinois
Elijah Muhammad,
Messenger of Allah

Poetry Corner

BRAVE FATHERS

Brave fathers before us, who toiled in the earth,
Unkown to our history and our noble birth.
Brave fathers before us your deeds were not in vain
We seek our freedom in dignity we have no need of shame.
Brave fathers before us, who toiled in the sun
We allow not time for dispair there is a battle that must be won.
Brave fathers before us, you left your native shore
To build a hostile wilderness — and return home no more.

DETERMINATION

The sun is covered by a cloud of gray, and my every venture seems less than defeat.
But am I to say success has passed me by? Am I to relinquish my aims and like a baby cry? No!
I heed them not who say that I am through.
I nurish the dream that says go on I know what you can do.

—By Victoria James

Open House For Harlem Youth Unit

NEW YORK — The inaugural Open House of Harlem Youth Unlimited will be held February 21, 5 p.m., at Small's Paradise.

Harlem Youth Unlimited, an organization of civic - minded young people who are interested in helping themselves and the youth of the community, is the "youth associate" of Harlem Youth Opportunities Unlimited, Inc., 180 W. 135th St., New York.

In addition to a discussion of the role of Harlem Youth Unlimited, there will be a talent show composed of young artists from the Harlem community. A number of distinguished community adults also have been invited.

HYU has a two-fold purpose: (1) To assist the staff of Harlem Youth Opportunities Unlimited in planning a "realistic program" of opportunities for improving the life of Harlem's young people, and (2) helping the youth to achieve the frame of mind which will enable them to grasp new opportunities for advancement and growth.

Harlem Youth Unlimited has to have room for both the Flowers of Islam and the fraternity boys; for the middle class, the lower class and the low class.

"Maybe other communities can afford the luxury of class divisions," a spokeman for HYOU said, "and an 'every man for himself' attitude. We can't."

Biography Of Ghana Official

ACCRA—(ANP) — A London publishing firm has selected Prof. K. A. B. Jones Quartey, associate professor in the Institute of African Studies, University of Ghana, to do a full-length biography on Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, governor-general of Niggera.

Prof. Jones-Quartey is deemed admirably suited for the task, since he is one of the few remaining members of Dr. Azikiwe's first editorial team on the African Morning Post, which was launched in Accra in December, 1934, as one of the City Press Ltd. Newspapers.

FREEDOM, JUSTICE and EQUALITY

WE MUST HAVE OR ELSE

Would you like remaining a permanent slave or being a permanent member of a soup line? Are you with us to get Freedom, Justice and Equality for the So-Called Negroes?

PLEASE SEND US YOUR

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

City..... Zone.... State.....

to
Muhammad's Mosque No. 2
5335 S. Greenwood Avenue
Chicago 15, Illinois
or 4847 S. Woodlawn Avenue

muhammad speaks Book Reviews

JOHN BROWN (Centennial Edition) — By W. E. B. Du Bois International Publishers, New Yo k, 1962 — $2.25 Paperback, $5.50 Cloth

CHICAGO — JOHN BROWN, which stands today as a classic work, was first printed in 1909, and has been out of print since its first publication.

This edition is published expressly for the One Hundreth Anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation. In it, Dr. Du Bois supplies a new preface, some additions to the text; and a few pages of new conclusions. Lithographed from the original edition, the old text has been altered; new material appears in italics.

Three years and 29 days prior to Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, a man branded "zealot, fanatic, and traitor" was hanged. This man was called "John B own."

John Brown and his band of 21 followers seized the armory at Harper's Ferry to obtain weapons, arm the slaves, and through mass revolt end slavery.

So, in this book, with a rare combination of scholarship and passion, Dr. Du Bois defends John Brown against all detractors who saw him as fanatic, fiend or traitor.

The eminent scholar and authority on Neg o history develops the view that at Harpers' Ferry John Brown fought the first battle of the Civil War. Fully documented, he gives a profound picture of John Brown the man, father, religionist, and i repressible crusader against the sacrilege of slavery.

GOD, ALLAH AND JU JU — By JACK MENDELSHON Thomas Welson and Sons, N. Y. — 245 Pages, $3.75

In spite of the poorly chosen title, this is a significant book that needs to be read seriously, and soon. The problem of religion in Africa will be one of the determining factors in the future of Africa.

The author, a Untiarian minister, has made a concise survey of the spi itual ferment now sweeping across Africa and the three main religions competing for the African's mind. More than any other competing religions, Christianity is in trouble in Africa. It is a trouble of ist own making. To most Africans, Christianity is the conquero 's religion and it has played the conqueror's game. In Africa Islam is on the march, and so are African indigenous religions.

African Viewpoints

President MODIBA KEITA, Mali:

"African unity is an absolute necessity and it will neither be built around the Monrovia group nor the Casablanca group, but on a common basis between the different African state. which will open up the way to union and social action. In order to become unified, the African states must observe tolerance towards one another, and non-alignment toward the two great blocs..."

President WILLIAM V. S. TUBMAN, Liberia:

At any given moment, the ends pursued by the Monrovia and Casablanca groups do not seem to be definitely clear. But with time, it becomes apparent that the two groups are working for the same aims. Thus, there should no longer be a Monrovia group and a Casablanca group...".

DR. J. GIKONYO KIANO, Parliamentary Secretary for Constitutional Affairs and Economic Planning, Kenya:

"An independent Kenya cannot afford the "parasitic leisure class! In Kenya, hard work must be the habit; sweat and toil, the yearning; and constant creativity, the national characteristic..."

MR. NDABANINGI SITHOLE, Chairman, ZAPU, (Southern Rhodesia):

"The situation in Southern Rhodesia is deteriorating and there will be bloodshed in my country if we are not given a fair chance to achieve constitutional changes peacefully..."

MR. JEAN MARIE KONE, Minister of State i/c Economic and Financial Coordination, Mali:

"Africa has been a forgotten continent because our colonial masters prevented us from moving freely among ourselves. Now that we have come into our own, it is the duty of the Heads of State to see that these barriers are removed..."

Dr. W. E. B. DUBOIS; Director, Secretariat, Encyclopedia Africana, Ghana:

"This compendium (Enclyclopedia Africana) on knowledge about Africa will be of great value to Africans and people of the western world long schooled in the thought that Africa is a continent without a history until the coming of the European..."

President WILLIAM V. S. TUBMAN, Republic of Liberia:

"Though peace may never come to the world in our own lifetime, I am confident that future generations will carry on the task of pursuing it until the objective of human brotherhood is attained..."

Premier SIR MILTON MAGAI, Sierra Leone;

"My government refuses to encourage the division of Africa into blocs or groups of states and believes that very soon, an organization of independent African states will emerge..."

Pathetic Plight Of Poor Told In New Book

Reviewed By Earl Shadracke

THE OTHER AMERICA, By Michael Harrington The MacMillan Company, New York, 1962 191 pgs. $4.00

America in the sixties contains an affluent society within its borders that enjoys the highest mass standard of living the world has ever known.

At the same time, there exists in the United States, another America. In it dwell somewhere between 40 and 50 million citizens — roughly 25 per cent of the people of this land.

THESE PEOPLE are beyond progress, maimed in body and spirit and existing at levels beneath those necessary for human decency.

They are the American poor, human beings, who live in the dungeon of the economic underworld. They are practically invisible to the complacent Americans of whom so many are enjoying a decent standard of life that they are indifferent and blind to the plight of the poor.

Using this stark framework, Michael Harrington, in his book, "The Other America," describes the world in which these people live. It is about the Other America, the unskilled workers, - the industrial rejects - the aged - and the minorities who live their dismal, hopless lives in a festering culture of poverty.

HARRINGTON'S BITING analysis of American poverty, its causes and far reaching effects, is a shocking expose of a culture within America that is populated by those driven from the land and bewildered by the city, by old people suddenly confronted with the torments of lonliness and poverty and by minorities facing a wall of prejudice.

It is the story of the tens of millions of Americans who lack the barest necessities of life and who greet every day without hope...

THE UNSKILLED and the

(Continued On Page 15)

CROOK
FUNERAL HOME
4638 SOUTH INDIANA AVENUE
DRexel 3-6632
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

LUXURIOUS CLOTHING
FOR MEN, WOMEN and CHILDREN
Temple No. 2
CLOTHING STORE
553 East 79th St. Chicago 19
RA. 3-5561

SUBSCRIBE NOW!
MUHAMMAD SPEAKS
NEWSPAPER
(FILL IN COUPON)

IN CHICAGO—
____12 Issues —$1.20
____24 Issues —$2.40

OUTSIDE CHICAGO—
____12 Issues —$1.80
____24 Issues —$3.60

Muhammad Speaks Newspaper
634 EAST 79th ST.
CHICAGO 19, ILL.
Date_____

Enter my subscription to MUHAMMAD SPEAKS. Enclosed is my money order for $_____. (Please Print)

Name_____
Address_____
City_____ Zone____State____

Non-Whites Suffer Worst Forms Of Poverty: Author

(Continued From Page 14)

uneducated who lead bleak and bitter lives and then have to pay for that fact in old age because their social security payments do not provide a subsistence level of life...

THE FARM WORKERS who are forced from the land through automation and who make their way to the cities where they become slum-dwelling misfits in a society that demands industrial skills...

NON - WHITE MINORITY groups who are penalized first because they are minority groups and then exploited again through sweatshop, drudge-type, penny-paying labor from which there is no escape.

THE PATHETIC PARADOX which sees American science eagerly fighting to lengthen human life (and succeeding) in a society which increasingly glorifies youth and has no place for its elder citizens — often cruelly casting them aside in lonliness, isolation, ill health and despair . . .

THE MIGRANT FARM workers, the Southern Negroes, Texas-Mexicans and the California Anglos who are packed like cattle into trucks to make their annual pilgrimage of misery . . .

AND OF THE POOR everywhere who regard progress as their enemy because progress means more skills and skills are not listed among their meager possessions.

Let the author give an example of the vicious circle choking the poor:

". . . The poor get sick more than anyone else in society. That is because they live in slums, jammed together under unhygienic conditions; they have inadequate diets, and cannot get decent medical care. When they become sick they are sicker longer than any other group in the society. Because they are sick more often and longer than anyone else, they lose wages and work, and find it difficult to hold a steady job. And because of this they cannot pay for good housing, for a nutritious diet, for doctors. At any given point in the circle, particularly when there is a major illness, their prospect is to move to an even lower level and to begin the cycle, round and round, toward even more suffering."

The group cannot usually break out of this vicious circle because it lacks the social energy and political strength to turn its misery into a cause.

ONLY THE LARGER society, with its help and resources, can really make it possible for these people to help themselves.

"Yet," says Harrington, "those who could make the difference too often refuse to act because of their ignorant, smug, moralisms. They view the effects of poverty — above all, the warping of the will and spirit that is a consequence of being poor — as choices . . ."

In their social blindness they say, "The poor are that way because they are afraid of work . . . If they were like me . . . (or my father or my grandfather) they could pay their own way. But they prefer to live on the dole and cheat the tapayers."

"THERE IS A BITTER picket-line chant," writes Harrington, "that one sometimes hears when a store is being boycotted in the North:"

'If you're white, you're right,
If you're black, stay back.'

Describing this as an accurate sociological statement of the plight of the Negro in American society, the author states:

"Negro poverty is unique in every way. It grows out of a long American history, and it expresses itself in a subculture that is built up on an interlocking base of economic and racial injustice. It is, in fact, imposed from without, from white America."

But perhaps the final degredation the Negro must face is the image the white man has of him, the author says.

"WHITE AMERICA keeps the Negro down. It forces him into a slum; it keeps him in the dirtiest and lowest-paying jobs. Having imposed this indignity, the white man theorizes about it. He does not see it as the tragic work of his own hands, as a social product. Rather, the racial 'ghetto' reflects the 'natural' character of the Negro: lazy, shiftless, irresponsible, and so on. So prejudice becomes self-justifying. It creates miserable conditions and then cites them as a rationale for inaction and complacency . . ."

"Nonwhite minorities," said Harrington, "suffer from the most intense and concentrated impoverishment of any single group."

THIS THEN, IS the brutal, factual picture of the gnawing cancer of poverty in the United States as documented by one who knows his subject, and who writes of it with feeling and anger but not without hope.

It should be used as a springboard by sincere and far-sighted men to erase the sickening decay of the other America before it grasps with an even heavier hand at the vitals of an America that did not care.

THE WELL FED, happy child is typified by this youthful "strong man," who is showing off his good right arm for his proud father, Adolph Bratcher. Darren Shawn Bratcher, a robust young Chicagoan, is two years, 11 months old and weighs a hefty 35 pounds.

MRS. VERA COATES holds one of her six children. Three others turn frightened, bewildered faces toward camera. All wear coats as "home" has no heat. In rear are Sister Lt. Margaret 3X and Lt. Jerome 2,X who are trying to assist the impoverished family. 6

BY POPULAR DEMAND!

THE MUSLIMS PRESENTS ANOTHER

AFRICAN ASIAN BAZAAR

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 12th

FROM 12 NOON TO 12 MIDNIGHT

AT THE ROCKLAND PALACE 155th STREET & 8th AVE. NEW YORK CITY

FEATURING AUTHENTIC AFRICAN MUSIC & DANCES

STARRING: MICHAEL OLATUNJI CHIEF BEY GUS DINIZULU

ALSO EXHIBITS: ☆ ARTS ☆ CRAFTS ☆ DISPLAYS

SUBSCRIPTION $2.00

For Tickets and Booth Information

MANHATTAN
TEMPLE NO. 7 RESTAURANT
113 Lenox Avenue
MO. 3-9772

MANHATTAN
MUHAMMAD SPEAKS
NEWS OFFICE
153 Lenox Avenue AC. 2-6522

MANHATTAN
AKBAR COFFEE DIST.
73 W. 116th STREET
TE. 1-4231

BROOKLYN
SHABAZZ FOODS
1892 Fulton St., Bet. Buffalo & Ralph Ave. PR. 1-9110

BRONX
OASIS DINER
1384 Boston Rd., Nr. 170th St.
DA. 3-8443

PERSONALITY PORTRAIT — Attractive personable Ella M. Stroud is a native of Atlanta, Ga. Miss Stroud was maitre d' at the famed and elegant Paschall Brothers Restaurant in Atlanta. She studied two years at Spelman College, majoring in elementary education. Twenty-one years-old, her hobbies include swimming and traveling, and she hopes to continue her scholastic studies preparatory to entering the teaching profession.

Women In Islam

By TYNETTA DEANAR

In the last article, we discussed briefly the effects of the Muslim Woman in American Society dealing specifically with the white population. I would like for us to consider the effects of the Muslim Woman upon the so-called Negro population. The difference in effects depends upon the roles we have played in American Society.

Today, we are apart of a modern version of a Master-Slave System. There exists still the subjected as well as those who subject and unfortunately, regardless to those who exhaust the approaches to an intellectual rationalization, the fact remains that the white man has mastered and the black man has said "Amen."

The Black man and woman cannot be expected to understand immediately and without great difficulty the rapid change of so-called Negroes from Christianity to Islam. Or perhaps at best, we can say that we cannot expect many of the more well-to do to give up their material possessions acquired in the white man's name nor to lease the improverished prestige they have gained by following and catering to the wishes and demands of the White Race.

MANY, NOT realizing that they, too, are apart of this envolving pattern are wrought - with great internal strife resulting in exterior hostilities which are really signs of their downfall.

Running the length of the so-called Negro social scale, we find that Islam is rejected by the poor as well as the rich, however, it is particulary rejected by the so-called elite or intellectual class of our people who are unable to recognize the beauty of the great change that is coming about or at least, they are unwilling to accept the validity and stature of an Independent Muslim Government operating in unity with the rapidly growing Muslim Nations of the World.

THE BLACK WOMAN who puts away the short western style of dress and social habits and adopts the Muslims style of dress and social ettiquette becomes an object of mockery and cruel discussion. Likewise, the Black woman who passes by the cosmetic counters and prefers the clean, natural look to the facial makeup worn by her dark skinned sisters, who love to imitate their white idols, she again becomes an object of scorn and ridicule.

For all of these various elements of change begin to shape and form and to finally introduce to the public a new figure upon the American Scene.

TO A GREAT MANY of the American so-called Negro Women, this change becomes an obstacle in the pathway of their desired destiny which envisions the hoped for state of integration with the White Race. As they are hampering for what appears to them as the epitome of achievement, the Muslim women are fighting with their people for separation as is beautifully purported by the Honorable Elijah Muhammad.

Women's NEWS and NOTES

Mississippi Leads In Baby Deaths

Negro Infants Die Fastest

WASHINGTON — Mississippi has the worst record of any state on infant deaths, it was disclosed last week, with more Negro than white babies dying.

In a report issued by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Delta state topped all others with a grim high of 41.6 deaths in every 1,000 births.

Utah had the best statistics in the nation, with a low infant mortality rate of 19.6.

For the entire country, between the period of 1950 and 1960, infant death rates for whites decreased 14.6 per cent, while for non-whites the decrease was only 2.9 per cent.

THE REPORT, issued by Mrs. Katherine B. Oettinger, chief of the Children's Bureau of HEW, noted that in spite of great medical advances, the country "is still tenth among countries in the world with populations over 300,000 in reducing its infant mortality rate. In 1950 the U. S. ranked fourth among these nations."

The report also showed that babies are dying faster in the nation's large metropolitan centers than elsewhere, adding that the rate of deaths for non-white children in 1960 was higher than that for whites in 10 major cities canvassed.

Said Mrs. Oettinger: "It should be pointed out that we have a smaller percentage of decrease since 1950 than any of the nine nations which rank above us in the United Nations listing."

BOB'S AUTO BODY
COMPLETE BODY WORK
MASTER PAINTING & COLOR MATCHING
— All Work Guaranteed —
12916 Woodland
Cleveland 20, Ohio
PHONE GA. 1-9580 ROBERT X., MGR.

VALLEY EGGS
FARM FRESH
WHOLESALE OR RETAIL
Free Delivery
TR 4-8595
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

YOUR TABLE DESERVES GOOD FOOD . . .
TEMPLE
NO. 2 GROCERY & MARKET
614 E. 71st ST. ST 3-9846
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

SOUTH PARK
BAKERY treats!

WEDDINGS & ALL OCCASIONS

We bake them all!
South Park BAKERY
370 E. 71st ST. ST 3-9091
Chicago, Illinois

TEMPLE
NO. 2
CLEANERS
MAIN OFFICE:
608 East 63rd Street
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
For The Finest In Dry Cleaning
FORMAL GOWNS
AND DRAPERIES
DONE BY SPECIALISTS
RETAIL OR WHOLESALE

Prompt & Courteous PICK UP and DELIVERY SERVICE
FA 4-9840

"...to your Health ...and Strength!"

Ask for it at your grocer!

NATIONAL INSTRUCTOR of the M. G. T. and daughter of Messenger Elijah Muhammad, Sister Ethel Sharrieff, at close of Unity Feast sponsored by the M. G. T. of Mosque No. 2, in honor of the Most Honorable Elijah Muhammad. Held at Chicago's El Cid Ballroom, more than 1,000 guests were entertained by some of the nations top performers. The M. G. T. Class at Mosque No. 2, headed by Sister Ethel Sharrieff, planned and arranged the Feast and spared no effort in making this the most successful event of its kind ever presented by the Muslims.

Negro History Contest

The Museum of Negro History and Art, 3806 S. Michigan Avenue, an independent archive of cultural materials relating to the American of African descent, will present "A Negro History Scrapbook Exhibit and Contest" as its Negro History Week feature.

Anyone, young or old that has a scrapbook of events concerning Negro history and achievement, is eligible to enter. Prizes of books on Negro history will be made on the basis of the contestant's age, grade, significance of materials, neatness and artistic arrangement.

Subject matter may be of a general or specific nature.

Examples are: School Integration, James Meredith, Negro in the Theatre, Negro Inventor, etc.

All entries should be sent or delivered to the Museum of Negro History no later than February 14, which is the birthday of Frederick Douglass.

Prizes will be awarded on March 10 at the Museum's annual Crispus Attucks Day Tea.

Caveat Emptor
Pocketbook Protection

This column is dedicated to the housewife — who is constantly victimized by unscrupulous manufacturers and dealers in their relentless search for the easy dollar.

It is designed to help her protect her pocketbook and the health of her family in an era of high-pressure advertising that too often does not tell the whole truth about many products. Through it, Muhammad Speaks hopes to render an important service to its homemaker readers.

The findings are those of the United States Food and Drug Administration, detailed in its December 1962 report.

HOUSEWIVES TAKE HEED:

That PULSE - A - RYTHM vibrating mattress you were thinking of buying for your husband, who suffers with arthritis and rheumatism, does NOT have the therapeutic values it claims to have. The claims are "false and misleading," says the FDA.

And forget about RICHELIEU MUSHROOM SAUCE with SLICED MUSHROOMS. Sliced mushrooms the sauce does NOT have, says the FDA. The label falsely suggests the article contains sliced mushrooms but small mushrooms pieces were substituted instead.

For the peach deseit you were contemplating, try a brand other than CORBETT'S POLLY CANNED PEACHES. The FDA found that it does not conform to the standards for canned peaches in that it is labeled as being packaged in heavy syrup but is actually packed in light syrup. And hear this: It also contains peaches of excessive hardness and units varying too much in weight.

If you're trying to gain weight, don't waste your money on WATE-ON (liquid and tablets) and SUPER WATE-ON (liquid). The container labels and accompanyingg folders titled "Why Be Skinny?" claim the products should cause weight gains up to 33 pounds and were good for the treatment of lack and appetite, fatigue, etc. But the FDA brought action against the firm charging false and misleading drug labeling.

You don't get your money's worth in MANOR HILL POTATO SALAD and MANOR HILL COLE SLAW. They were charged with short weight.

Watch out for BEAUTYLIFT and SCALP STIMULATOR devices. False therapeutic claims for the devices, says FDA, include statements that they were an adequate and effective treatment for the prevention of baldness improvement of muscle tone, firming of skin tissue, prevention of stretching and sagging of the skin. They must relabel their products correctly, or else.

Avoid FROZEN SHRIMP shipped by Gulf Stream Quick Frozen Foods, Inc., of Miami, Fla. The FDA charge: — decomposed and short weight.

TAST-D-LITE CANNED PINK APPLESAUCE isn't exactly what its cracked up to be. The FDA charged misbranding in that it contains an undeclared artifical color.

When the children ask for cookies, save money by skipping DUTCH TWINS CREME WAFER STICKS. The FDA has charged Dutch Twins creme wafer sticks with short weight.

HAVE NO FEAR—SIS IS HERE
Sis Quality
GROCERY STORE
AND DELICATESSEN
2100 - 5th AVE. Phone: SA 2-9943
NEW YORK CITY

The Feminine Woman
BEAUTY SALON
Where "CARE OF THE HAIR" is a by-word
Hair Shaped, Brushed and Conditioned
Specializing in Relaxers
Call or Come in AD 4-1100
738 ST. NICHOLAS AVE.
New York 31, New York

FIRE AUTOMOBILE
GLASS HOMEOWNERS LIABILITY BONDS - LIFE
COMPENSATION SICK & ACCIDENT
PERCY W. JONES INSURANCE
ACademy 2-7300
Off. Hrs. 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., Mon. thru Fri.
209 WEST 125th STREET
SUITE 221, NEW YORK 27, N.Y.

SISTER MEDA'S
Sesame Seed Candy
(Home-Made)
113 Lenox Ave., N.Y.C.
MO 3-9772 MO 3-9766

Mac-Ram
VILLAGE SHOP
LADIES SPORTSWEAR
"MODERN ORIGINALS" IN Silver, Leather, Suede
318 Nostrand Ave. Brooklyn 16, N.Y.
MA. 2-1417

MARIDAN
QUALITY HOMES
FHA INSURED
LOANS
CHICAGO TITLE
& TRUST INSURED TITLES
SEE OUR MODEL HOME AT 16013 GAUGER AVE.
HARVEY, ILL.
MARIDAN
CONSTRUCTION
PU. 5-0200
GI. 8-2036

BEATS ALL OTHERS! . . .
PETTY'S
PINE OIL
DISINFECTANT
• CLEANS • DEODORIZES
• DISINFECTS
ASK FOR IT AT YOUR GROCER!

PETERS Hardware Inc.
HOUSEHOLD & ELECTRICAL SUPPLIES — PAINTS
LOCKSMITH & GENERAL REPAIRS
111 LENOX AVE. N.Y. 26, N.Y. MO 6-6108
Bet. 116th & 115th Streets — New York 26, N.Y.

1 HOUR SERVICE
PICK UP & DELIVERY
Erie's FRENCH CLEANERS, INC.
Plant
826 FULTON STREET
(Bet. Claremont and Vanderbilt)
Branch
777 FULTON STREET
(Bet. Oxford St. and Portland St.)
(Brooklyn 38, N.Y.)
TEL. ST 3-9082 TEL. JA 2-3717
PRESIDENT ERNEST T. WOMACK, JR.

MAKE MONEY & SAVE MONEY
The Business Man Makes Money—The Customer Saves Money
WE DELIVER
MAZOLA CORN OIL (One Gallon) $2.67
AMERICAN CHEESE (5 Pound) 2.45
LARGE GRADE A EGGS (1 dozen) .50
MILK (Container) .24
TROPICANA ORANGE JUICE (Container) .27
BUMBLE BEE RED SALMON (1 Pound Can) .93
GRAPE JELLY (4 Pound Jar) .93
MARGARINE (1 Pound) .25
WHOLE WHEAT FLOUR (5 Pound) .89
AKBAR COFFEE (Can) .89
INSTANT (Small) .49 (Large) $1.39
AKBAR FOOD and COFFEE STORE
— DISCOUNT WITH THIS AD ONLY —
73 WEST 116th STREET NEW YORK, N. Y. CALL: TE. 1-4231

"SHABAZZ FOODS"
1892 FULTON STREET
—GROCERY STORE
Between Buffalo & Ralph Avenue
Phone PR 1-9110
BROOKLYN, NEW YORK
Store Hours - 7 A.M. to 10 P.M.
OPEN SUNDAYS
COMPLETE LINE OF FOODS
Fruits - Vegetables - Dairy - Meats

DR. GEORGE W. GORE, Jr. (right), president of Florida A & M University, Tallahassee, was principal speaker at a recent public meeting of the (Negro) National Newspaper Publishers' Association in Miami's plush Hampton House Motel and Villas. Discussing points in his speech urging Negroes to prepare for the future are Garth Reeves (left), editor, Miami Times and Eugene Rhodes, editor, Philadelphia Tribune, and a member of the Philadelphia Board of Education. Dr. Gore, who taught many outstanding Negro newspapermen, was one of the first Negroes in the U. S. to receive a degree in journalism.

Warns Negro Competition To Be - -

'Raceless But Ruthless'

MIAMI, Fla. — One of the biggest and knottiest problems of the Negro in the sixties is to prepare to cross from the jungle of second-class citizenship into the coldly-precise, swiftly-moving world of a desegregated and integrated American society.

Dr. George W. Gore, Jr., president of Florida A & M University, Tallahassee, told a public meeting of the National Newspaper Publishers' Association here that the prerequisites for lucrative jobs in the world of the near future will be applied to all with ruthless impartiality.

Dr. Gore, one of the first Negroes in the United States to receive a degree in journalism, warned the gathering of Negro newspaper publishers and editors that the "impact of desegregation and integration is creating problems."

HE SAID THE Negro must be prepared to "bridge the cultural and educational gap caused by segregation and the underprivileged status in American society."

He noted that while "the doors of lucrative job opportunities" are beginning to open in the future, "the competition is raceless and ruthless"...the "examinations are scored without prejudice but without mercy."

"It is becoming difficult to get into the better colleges and universities," he observed. "Even traditional jobs, formerly held by Negroes, are now difficult to obtain. With the iron curtain being lifted, Negro businessmen are rapidly facing problems, and, in some cases, are being faced with annihilation.

"Even when Negroes are operating at a higher level than ever before, the results are disappointing, he said, "because the standards are being raised faster than they can qualify."

ACKNOWLEDGING THE "need for sympathetic but remedial understanding of the problems faced by Negroes in general, he stressed the plight of the Negro youth.

"While we are all mindful of the handicaps of a segregated social environment," Dr. Gore said, "we cannot coddle our boys and girls to the extent that we do not urge them to do their very best to qualify for living in a competitive world.

Reflecting the impact of the Negroes accelerated fight for equal rights, the noted educator, who has taught many outstanding Negro newspapermen, said the initial move "may be to 'sit-in' and 'measure up' in a crucial struggle for full recognition."

He declared that Negro youth can and must measure up second to none in the nation, but they must be "pushed to it."

HE WARNED THAT "the need for illiterate and unskilled labor in the American market is being reduced so rapidly that, in the next decade, it will be practically non-existent."

Dr. Gore said the Negro press must play an important role urging Negro "youth and their parents to prepare to compete in all fields at top level."

While the increasing opportunities will be "more widespread, the competition for admittance will be keen — but the rewards for those who can survive will be limitless.

"No other force," the Flordia A & M University president concluded, "can carry the message to our people as effectively as the Negro press."

Fattest Baby Not Always Healthy

LOS ANGELES — A fat baby is not automatically a healthy baby, according to a pediatrician at the University of Rochester.

Discussing overnutrition, Dr. Gilbert Forbes said that one of the chief reasons for this situation is the common belief that plump babies are healthy babies, plus the tendency of mothers to link the gain in weight with their own success as mothers.

Dr. Forbes said that nutrition experts traditionally have been concerned with nutritional deficiency.

WHEN YOU SEE IT YOU KNOW — IT'S A . . .
cobb - lorenzo
CUSTOM SHIRTS — ROBES — PAJAMAS
Hours: 12 Noon to 8 p.m. — Closed Sundays & Mondays
The First Custom Shirt Shop In Harlem
2149 SEVENTH AVENUE Bet. 127th & 128th STS.
NEW YORK 27, N.Y. Riverside 9-4584

3 HOUR SERVICE THOMAS JONES
BONNEY BROTHERS
CLEANERS AND DRYERS
12 WESTLAND AVENUE BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS
Phone KE. 6-4254

IN RAIN, SNOW, SLEET, JAMES VX WILL BRING YOU HEAT RANGE & FUEL OIL
James V X Oil Co.
414 BLUE HILL AVE. ROXBURY, MASS. HI. 2-3164

1 DAY PLATE SERVICE
$10.00 DOWN — MONTHS TO PAY
ERNEST SCOTT'S INSURANCE AGENCY
381 Blue Hill Ave. HI. 5-0101-2
ROXBURY, MASSACHUSETTS OPEN DAILY 9:00-9:00

COME and VISIT . . .
Muhammad's
MOSQUE NO. 11
35 INTERVALE STREET BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS
Wednesday & Friday 8:00 P.M.
Sunday at 2:00 P.M.
Phone GA. 7-8818

KENNER'S Auto Service, Inc.
311 W. 120th ST. N.Y.C.
All Types Expert Mechanical Repairs
Used Cars Sold at Wholesale Prices
Easy Payment Plan Open 7 A.M. to 9 P.M.
CALL MO. 3-0228

DON'T TAKE CHANCES!
TELL US YOUR T.V. & RADIO TROUBLES
7 BROTHERS TELEVISION
Can and Will Do the Best Job for You
9 of every 10 defects are caused by a small tube or a broken wire
SO CALL AU. 6-0151 TODAY
Progressive - Depenable - Helpful - Courteous Service to Everyone!
1987 AMSTERDAM AVE. NEW YORK 32, N. Y.
(Between 158th and 159th Streets)

SHABAZZ
WOOD CRAFT
WOOD - CARVING and WOOD-LETTERS
Cabinet - Furniture Making and Repairing Designing William 39X, Prop.
402 W. 145th STREET
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Earth Painters
IMPROVEMENT COMPANY
Exterior - Interior Painting
Carpentry - Cement Masonry
Wallpapering
QUALITY - QUANTITY
Down to Earth
PR 4-8060
DI 2-6278
1087 UNION STREET
Brooklyn 25, New York

VISIT
Muhammad's Mosque No. 7
WEDS. & FRI. 8 P.M.
SUN. 2 P.M.
102 W. 116 ST.
N.Y. 27, N.Y.
RI. 9-7569
ELEVATOR SERVICE TO 4 FL.

Hazzards Of The Negro Ghettos

Slums, Plus Fires Equals Destitution, Death

A private agency grimly predicted last fall that 15,000 Negro homes across the country would be reduced to rubble when fire stalked their ghettos during the winter.

So far, this tragic estimate has been surpassed and the fire monster continue to plague the big city slums, taking Negroes' lives and destroying the hovels they call home.

To make matters worse, poverty-ridden Negroes are further penalized by the bitter fact that they cannot get fire insurance on their ghetto living quarters.

THERE IS ALWAYS a sharp increase in the number of fires during the winter months, when slum dwellers attempt to make their own heat in flats where winter is a constant roommate.

The mournful dirge of fire engines in the streets is a common part of the sight and sound of the big city's backstreets.

Common too, are the strether bearers for those who did not escape the flames or smoke, and the shivering clusters of dazed "fortunates" who managed to escape with their lives and nothing else.

MOST OF THE fire departments in the cities have printed copies of the "home fire safety check list" to help you learn good fire-prevention habits. If these are not available in your town, try all the other municipal agencies. If this fails, inquire at the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Washington, D. C.

A few safety reminders include:

DO NOT USE gasoline, benzine or other similar flammable fluids for cleaning clothing or floors in your home.

IF YOU HAVE wood floors, make certain the floor under stoves and heaters is protected by insulation or ventilated air space.

CURTAINS NEAR stoves should be arranged to prevent their blowing over the burners or flames.

IF YOU HAVE a portable oil heater, turn it out when you retire at night. Keep it well away from curtains, funiture, drapes, etc.

CHECK TO SEE that all rooms have an adequate number of outlets to take care of electrical appliances. Multiple attachment plugs are dangerous.

MATCHES SHOULD be kept in metal containers and out of the reach of children.

MANY FIRES ARE started by people who smoke in bed. This is a foolish and dangerous habit.

KEEP THE TELEPHONE number of your fire department in a handy place near your telephone.

LEARN THE LOCATION of the fire alarm box nearest your home, and how to turn in an alarm.

Bitter Winter Harvest . .

FIRE VICTIMS — Claude Carroll, holding daughter Anita, 4 years old, is still in shock after he and his wife, Alma, with Michael, 14 months, escaped from their first-floor apartment as fire destroyed everything they owned on Chicago's South side. Carrol was awakened by knocking on his door, his flat already filling with smoke. A 14-year year employee of a baking company, Carroll and his family are the tragic symbols of fire victims across the nation.

THESE WOMEN had to flee their apartments, forced out by a roaring fire, reportedly started when a boiler blew in the furnace room. Muhammad Speaks representative, Ted Evans, interviews Mrs. Anna Mae Covey, 816 E. 80th st., third floor, and Mrs. Gertrude Yancey, Insurance companies hesitate, and often refuse to issue proper fire insurance to Negroes.

STANDARD CLEANERS
Famous for Quality Cleaning & Courteous Service
141 LENOX AVE.
Corner 117th Street — N.Y.C.

HAND MADE LEATHER CRAFTS · BAGS · BELTS
SHABAZZ ENTERPRISES
ISLAMIC COSTUME JEWELRY
1894 FULTON STREET, BKLYN., 33, N.Y.

KOOLTRON
Refrigeration Service
"We're at your beck and call"
135 W. 138th St. New York City
CALL: AU. 1-5968
Emergency Repairs of All Kind
All Makes and Models
24 HOUR SERVICE

STOP FINANCING YOUR OWN ENSLAVEMENT BY OVERPAYING FOR REAL ESTATE
For Safe Bargains - City & Suburban House
SEE . . .
HENRY WINSLOW
Licensed Real Estate Broker
899 Gates Ave. Brooklyn 21, N.Y.
GL 5-0010

Try Our Original Bean Pie
AND WHOLE WHEAT MUFFINS
New York's Finest
TEMPLE SEVEN RESTAURANT
113 LENOX AVENUE - NEW YORK CITY
PHONE MO 3-9772
In The Heart Of Harlem
We Serve Exclusively Pleasant Surroundings

Muhammad Speaks Finds Answer To Question:

Who Buys The Most JAZZ RECORDS?

The impact of jazz on America and the world is one of the most important phenomena of our times. The folk music that has evolved into a bulti-billion dollar art form. touches and influences the lives of millions of people on an international scale. America, as the home of jazz, produces most of the jazz recordings in an industry that uses jazz records as its staircase to staggering amounts of profits. Muhammad Speaks, asking the question, "Who Buys The Most Jazz Records?" came up with some eye-opening answers. Though the story deals for the most part with the Mid-West, follow-up surveys indicate that the facts it contains are true throughout the United States.

EDITOR'S NOTE — "Jazz" as referred to in this story is music played by such as Gene Ammons, Errol Garner, Stan Getz, Dizzy Gillespie, Miles Davis, Jimmie Smith, Paul Desmond, Count Basie, Duke Ellington, Oscar Peterson, Ray Charles, Hank Crawford, Cannonball Adderly, etc.

Two men walked into a side-street record shop on Chicago's near Northside. One said:

"Say, have you got Gene Ammons' 'Jug'?"

The clerk got the album from a shelf and collected $2.99 in small change. The men looked at a few other jazz albums, then left the store.

THEY HAD COMPLETELY ignored a prominently displayed long playing album about the First Family that distributors and retailers claim is the fastest LP in history.

Interested in jazz and jazz alone, they are part of an 11 percent minority segment of America that year after year buys more than half of the millions of jazz records issued annually in the United States.

The men, were, in short, Negroes. And Negroes make this staggering investment in jazz records despite the tragic fact that due to tremendous economic and social pressures their average yearly earnings are only 58 percent of those of white America.

THUS NO JAZZ record can hope to be a best seller unless it is accepted by the Negro market.

An official of Atlantic Records in New York says there are nine cities which jazz recording companies depend upon for their livelihood.

They are Chicago, New York, Detroit, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Washington, D.C. Baltimore, San Francisco, and Atlanta. Each of these cities has a large Negro population. In Chicago, for example, Negroes form roughly 25% of the population and the bulk of jazz records sold in Chicago are in areas where Negroes are heavily congregated.

"IN CHICAGO, jazz records sell much faster in areas where Negroes are centered," says Kent Beauchamp of the Big Town and Garmisa distributing companies, which service Chicago, the suburbs and other Midwest points.

"But while Negroes are heavy buyers of jazz and rhythm and blues, their juke boxes will also have a number of Frank Sinatra records at the same time."

This is because "Negroes know more of what's happening musically than whites," Beauchamp said.

"Whites listen, but they don't hear," he pointed out. This could account for the fact that juke boxes in white areas for the most part feature teenage pop tunes or the "top 40" in current popularity polls.

THE MUHAMMAD

(Continued On Page 21)

Garner Wins Top British Honors

NEW YORK (ANP) — The English publication, Melody Maker, has voted Erroll Garner first-place honors in both its "World Section" and "Critics Section" in its annual popularity poll.

Garner scored a big hit during his concert tour of the British Isles in 1962.

His projected 1963 British tour will be expanded to include Ireland and Scotland.

COLEMAN
BARBER SHOP
105 Watson Avenue
Newark, N. J.
FOR THE BEST IN FINE HAIR CUTTING
MEN and WOMEN
Bro. Herbert X.

NO. 25 BAKERY
DROP SHOP
177 Charlton Street
Newark, N.J.
Specializing in FRIED CHICKEN & FISH SANDWICHES
Bro. Euther X.

WILLIAM LORENZO
BARBER SHOP
208 Court Street
Newark, New Jersey
SPECIALIZING IN CEASERS

R. G. FLOOR
WAXING
EXPERT
Free Estimate
BI. 3-2361
Newark, N. J. Bro. Robert J. X.

Fo those who are FUSSY
About their Food . . .
VISIT:
NILE RESTAURANT
149 5th Street
Elizabeth, N. J.
EL. 4-9751

Visit: STANLEY'S
BARBER SHOP
45 ESSEX STREET
CATERET, NEW JERSEY
SPECIALIZING IN CHILDREN'S HAIRCUTS

HARRIS
Refinishing
& Reupholstering
246 South Orange Avenue
NEWARK, NEW JERSEY
PHONE:
MA 2-6329 or BI. 8-8783

VISIT: MUHAMMAD MOSQUE NO. 25
257 So. Orange Ave. Newark, N. J.
WEDNESDAY & FRIDAY 8 P.M. SUNDAY 2 P.M.
Phone 622-9021

VISIT: MUHAMMAD MOSQUE NO. 21
678 Ocean Avenue Jersey City, N.J.
WEDNESDAY & FRIDAY 8:00 P.M. SUNDAY 7:00 P.M.

In Camden, New Jersey
VISIT
MUHAMMAD'S MOSQUE
No. 20
Wed., Fri. & Sun. — 8:00 P.M.
1138 S. BROADWAY
Camden, New Jersey
Phone: 963-9459

Chicago Dealer Says Negroes Are Searching For Something

They Look To Jazz

(Continued From Page 20)

SPEAKS survey showed conclusively that Negroes set the standards for whites in buying jazz. And, it was learned, when jazz is recorded, the vast and eager Negro market is held specifically in mind.

Negroes are a more religious purchaser of records, said the Atlanta Records executive in New York. That is, if an artist such as Fats Dominoe, Miles Davis, Cannonball Adderly or Max Roach makes a recording a certain quantity of records or sold to their Negro fans whether recording is a "hit" or not.

"But" says Max Tannenbaum, owner of "Mr. T's" one of the leading record shops on Chicago's Southside:

"NEGRO FANS will drop artists in a hurry if they find they are coasting or their music is suddenly insincere.

"If 100 jazz albums were issued, Negroes would buy 80 of them, said 'Mr. T.' Tannenbaum who recalled that when the neighborhood in which his shop is located was white, he sold mostly classical and popular music (he defined popular as Bing Crosby, Perry Como, etc.).

"But when the neighborhood changed and Negroes moved in, the sale of Crosby, Como, etc., stopped almost completely.

"NEGROES WANTED jazz, blues and spirituals, with the heavy emphasis on jazz," he said.

(Continued on page 23)

HARRY'S OUTLET SHOE STORE
5.95 and UP
Famous and Popular Brands
Men's Boys' and Ladies' Shoes
954 PROSPECT AVE.
BRONX, N.Y.

Universal
WINDOW CLEANING Service
BROOKLYN, NEW YORK
PHONE - GL. 5-8307

LIST YOUR PROPERTY WITH Shabazz Realty Co.
FOR QUICK ACTION!
400 W. 145th St. New York 31, N.Y.
AU. 1-2628

EDDIE SIMS
SANITARY
BARBER SHOP
1372 Bergen Street Brooklyn, N.Y.
PR 3-8690
"QUALITY & SERVICE — OUR MOTTO"
Proprietors: Bros. Larue X and Louis 6X

SHABAZZ
General Trucking
& DELIVERY SERVICE
409 W. 127th St. N.Y.C.
MO. 2-0656
DAY OR NIGHT SERVICE

AKBAR
Floor Service
Floor Scraping, Waxing, Tile Laying
Stair Covering
Call Day or Nite:
FL 1-4750 — AU 3-7924
1095 - 2nd AVE. NEW YORK CITY

For Those Who Want The Best!
LEDEL'S LAUNDRY SERVICE
FREE DELIVERY
COMPLETE LAUNDRY SERVICE
Open Daily: Mon. thru Fri. 8:15 to 6:30
Saturdays 8:45 to 3:45 P.M.
429 Evergreen Avenue
GL. 3-2699
Cor. Gates Ave. Brooklyn, N.Y.

hear! think, then judge for yourself!
Mr. Muhammad Speaks ON YOUR RADIO
DIAL in New York
WWRL 1600 EVERY FRIDAY 11:30 PM
WBNX 1380 EVERY SUNDAY 6:30 PM

GRAND OPENING
WE PICK UP AND DELIVER YOUR GARMENTS FOR ALTERATIONS, DRY CLEANING AND PRESSING
ALL BOROS
PROMPT COURTESY SATISFACTION GUARANTEED
CALL SHABAZZ CLEANERS
255 ALBANY AVE. (Corner Sterling Place) BROOKLYN, N.Y.
PR. 3-8649

BLACK MAN'S HELL
113 LENOX AVENUE NEW YORK 26, N. Y.
MUHAMMAD'S TEMPLE OF ISLAM
113 Lenox Avenue New York 26, N.Y.
Sir: Enclosed is a one dollar ($1.00) money order (or check). Please rush me the sensational record, "WHITE MAN'S HEAVEN IS A BLACK MAN'S HELL" Send to:
America's No. 1 RECORD HIT 45 R.P.M.
NAME .....
ADDRESS .....

In This Corner SONNY LISTON

MEMO TO CASSIUS CLAY:

Charles "Sonny" Liston, the heavyweight boxing champion with the bulging biceps and the pulverizing punch, has tossed a verbal haymaker your way.

Said Liston in an interview with Muhammad Speaks:

"I don't see anyone fighting now that could beat me. Cassius Clay is about the youngest, fastest thing coming up — with his mouth — but I don't think he'll last as long as Patterson did."

Having made this grim prediction, Liston dropped his guard for a few moments, broke into a smile and gave Chicago, his new home, a pat on the back.

RELAXING in the living room of his elegant Southside home, the Champion asserted "They treat me fine here in Chicago and I really like the town. If I don't find suitable quarters for training here the year around I'll train here in the summer and find someplace else to train in the winter."

Affable, and quick to answer questions. he declared he'd defend his title April 11, in Miami, Fla., against Floyd Patterson.

"I'm going to train here for two or three weeks," he said, "if I can find a place to train. Then I plan to set up camp in Florida with the same people I had with me for the other (Patterson) fight."

The Champ wants to start staging amateur fights here and is raising money to buy trophies for the winners.

"I know when I was boxing amateur the trophies made it seem more like something," he said.

"I'm looking for a spot to buy or rent for this project. I also plan to sponsor a team of boxers and give the sweaters and robes with my name on it.

"I'd really like to help these youngsters and give them a start, and I have some other plans, too, such as ball teams and other sports. In my book, these kids deserve the best."

Thus Sonny Liston is determined to be a champion both in the ring and out. It's possible some say that he will be the best thing that happened to boxing since Joe Louis blazed across the fistic horizon.

EVEN A SNARLING leopard (rug) serves to highlight Liston's powerful punch. Here he shows how his big fist could score a knockout over one of the animal kingdom's great fighters.

SPORTS

HEAVYWEIGHT CHAMPION Sonny Liston, who predicts that Cassius Clay, wouldn't last as long against hm as Floyd Patterson did, reads a book while relaxing in his Chicago home. His wife, Gerry, takes a look from over his head.

CLASSIFIED

FOR SALE MISCELLANEOUS

SAVE MONEY BY BUYING FROM MAIL ORDER AND YOUR MAILBOX FULL FOR A YEAR. SEND $1.00 FOR HANDLING TO ALI JAMI, 94A CABOT ST., ROXBURY 20, MASS.

PHOTOS OF THE FABULOUS LITTLE JOE, organist, vocalist and recording artist. Send $1.00, for six photos. To Lanes Studio, 1035 West Ramsey, Banning, California.

ORIGINAL HISTORY BOOKS DIRECT from Africa. Paper back $1.00. Facts you should know. Not published elsewhere. Eastside Books, 419 N.E. Blvd., Vineland, New Jersey.

HIGH QUALITY AMERICA'S FINEST MONEL RINGS, Attractive white gold appearance. Masonic Wedding Band Initial Rings. For details write today: Agent, H. A. Dunbar, P. O. Box 226 College Station New York 30, N.Y.

HOUSES FOR SALE

9 FAMILY APT. HOUSE WITH STORE. Price $22,000, Cash $7,000, net $2,000. Oil heat, brass plumbing. Shabazz Realty Co., 400 West 145th St. New York 31, AU. 1-2628.

OWNER SELLING DUE TO ILLNESS Licensed lodging house 12 rooms, 3 baths, 5 garages and 4 parking spaces, shade trees. Near churches, schools, busses and shopping. Income $6,000. Call ORange 5-6665. East Orange, New Jersey.

HAMILTON'S AUTO REPAIR
BODY, FENDER, REPAIR & PAINTING
AUTOMATIC TRANSMISSIONS REBUILT
Motors Overhauled and Rebuilt
No Money Down - 18 Months to Pay
547 E. 71st ST. CHICAGO 19, ILL.
STewart 3-0365 HUdson 7-9344

"You've Tried the Rest, Now Try the BEST"
Farriz & Bros. CLEANERS
6322 Dorchester Ave. CHICAGO ILLINOIS PHONE 324-0555

ATTENTION ! !
EL-SID'S
TRIANON Ballroom
6201 SO. COTTAGE GROVE
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS
IS NOW AVAILABLE FOR RENTAL FOR CLUBS, CONVENTIONS, BANQUETS, CONCERTS, SPECTACULARS & FUND RAISING AFFAIRS.
NEWLY DECORATED — AIR-CONDITIONED
For Information-Come In or Call MI 3-7333
FRED MAYS, Manager JHEAN LEWIS, Secretary

MAIL YOUR CLASSIFIED AD TODAY
ONLY 50c PER LINE
WHEN YOU WANT TO RENT, SELL, TRADE, MOVE, HIRE, WORK, OWN, TEACH, LEARN, EARN, SEARCH, FIND, ANNOUNCE
MS CLASSIFIED WILL DO THE JOB

CLASSIFICATION DESIRED _____
(For Example: FEMALE HELP WANTED HOUSE FOR SALE, FURNISHED ROOM,) MUHAMMAD SPEAKS NEWSPAPER IS PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY
PRINT your ad on lines provided below (included all information to be published)
FIGURE NOT MORE THAN 5 WORDS FOR EACH LINE

NAME _____ TELEPHONE NO. _____
ADDRESS _____ CITY _____

CLASSIFIED RATES 50c per line (3 line mimimum $1.50)
Please Send Check or Money Order to
MUHAMMAD SPEAKS NEWSPAPER
Kindly Address Replies To — ATTN! Classified Ad Dept.

Dealers Tell Why Negroes Buy Most Jazz Records

(Continued from page 21)

"They depend more on records for entertainment, principally of a lack of money to indulge in other forms of entertainment, such as musical shows, or opera. After all, a record can be purchased for a dollar and played 100 times.

"And the record business in Negro section doesn't drop as much as it does in white sections during the summer time. In white neighborhoods people tend to go away on vacations. Because of the Negro's limited facilities for vacationing, he stays in the city.

"Another thing is whites listen, but they don't dig the music," he added, "though they are beginning to more than they used to, as witness a musician like Jimmy Smith, jazz organist, who is now being bought and played in white neighborhoods. For years Smith would sell only in Negro neighborhoods."

BUT THOUGH NEGROES are the heaviest supporters of jazz in the neighborhood stores and shops, their impact is felt also by the big stores in the Downtown areas of various cities.

For example, a new check of Downtown stores in Chicago showed they brought far more jazz albums than whites at such stores as Wieboldt, Carson's, Goldblatt, Sears and Roebuck and Lyon and Healy.

By admitting that whites and Negroes bought jazz records in an equal amount, the Fair Store, located in Chicago's Loop, proved that in proportion to the population, Negroes purchased many more jazz records than whites.

Maurice Alpert, owner of the popular Met Music Shops in Chicago, says:

"AS AN ETHNIC GROUP Negroes are constantly searching for something new. Jazz is always new and growing newer all the time. This is what Negroes want.

"Their minds are a little more progressive than whites'. Whites are satisfied with things as they are but Negroes are not Therefore, they are always searching for something new.

"About 75 percent of the whites don't even think of records, while about 90 percent of the Negroes buy records and many have collections that are absolutely fantastic," said Morrie," as Alpert is known by hundreds.

In his famous thesis, "The White Negro," Norman Mailer, noted author of "The Naked and the Dead," described the Negro psychology of "coolness" as a defense reaction against a hostile world.

MAILER IS AUTHOR of the definitive definition of the world and meaning of "hep," the Negro argot meaning in essence "wise," or "an understanding deeper than the apparent."

Threatened by the Man, denied access to the society, the Negro, in Mailer's image, stays aloof, anticipates disillution, and turns cynicism into a style.

Says Mailer:

"...Any Negro who wishes to live must live with danger from his first day, and no experience can never be casual to him, no Negro can saunter down a street with any real certainty that violence will not visit him on his walk..."

Negroes therefore "know more than whites" because they live closer to life and reality, in Mailer's opinion.....

JAZZ IS MUSIC that came from life itself — a life outside "the cameos of security for the average white."

Perhaps that is why the Negro and jazz are forever together.

Finally

First Class So. Tour For Marian

NEW YORK — Marian Anderson, who won her first critical acclaim in Europe and later was accepted as a star in her own country, will travel first class this month when she makes her first tour of the South in 13 years.

Ghana Textbooks

ACCRA — (ANP) — School pupils throughout Ghana will be supplied with free textbooks beginning with the next school year. The Ghana government proposes to spend something like 3.5 million pounds for a selected and basic number of textbooks to be given children in the primary and middle schools. Essential textbooks will be provided for use by students in secondary schools.

Experts At Work

GARMENTS OF EXCELLENT quality and up-to-date design are made in the Temple No. 2 Clothing Factory, Chicago, where each employee is a dedicated worker, thoroughly skilled in his craft. In the left foreground is one of the measuring and cutting tables. Because of the high standards of this modern tailoring operation, it has won the praise of the garment industry and many of the country's most-fashionable VIPs. Manager and chief designer is Mrs. Ethel Sharrieff.

IV 2-5033
PAINTING
Expertly Done by FRED X. BOOTS
INTERIOR - EXTERIOR
— Free Estimates —
Philadelphia, Pa.

NEIGHBORHOOD
T.V. - RADIO & RECORD SHOP
WE SERVICE T.V. - RADIOS - HI-FI
CAR RADIOS - TRANSISTORS
— All Work Guaranteed —
Hours 10:00 A.M. until 10:00 P.M.
6333 So. Dorchester Chicago 37, Ill.
Phone: 288-9773

La Sante
A LANOLIN RICH
HAIR CONDITIONER
NOW ON SALE AT Temple No. 2
GROCERY STORE
614 EAST 71st STREET

Maxie & Son
BARBER SHOP
601 N. 12th ST. PHILA., PA.
Prop. - Bro. Clinton X, Bro. Clinton IX
PHONE - PO 3-4452

Telephones: Bus. MU 4-1011 - Res. VI 6-2196
ELECTRICIAN
All Work Done Efficiently to Precision and Guaranteed
NO JOB TOO LARGE OR TOO SMALL
A. STUART
8207 VERNON AVE. CHICAGO, ILL.

SAVE TIME AND MONEY
SHOVELING SNOW IS OLD-FASHIONED Use SPRINKE KLEEN SWEEP
2135 Master Street Philadelphia 21, Pa.
PHONE: PO. 3-4452
SAVING ON FUEL —:— FUEL OIL ACTIVATOR —:— 100% GUARANTEED SAVING

VISIT
MUHAMMAD'S MOSQUE
No. 12
4218-20 Lancaster Ave.
2nd Floor - Phila. 4, Pa.
BA 2-9691
WED. - FRI. 8:00 P.M. SUNDAY 2 P.M.

ON NATIONWIDE RADIO!
THE HONORABLE ELIJAH
MUHAMMAD SPEAKS
A Message of Truth . . . Mightier Than The Sword!

LISTEN to Mr. MUHAMMAD Every Week On the Radio Station In Your Area Listed Here . . .

| AREA | STATION | DIAL, KC | DAY | TIME |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| ATLANTA — GRIFFIN, GA. | WERD | 860 | SUN. | 5:30 P.M. |
| ATLANTIC CITY — VINELAND, N.J. | WDVL | 1270 | SUN. | 8:00 P.M. |
| AUGUSTA, GA. — COLUMBIA, S.C. | WAUG | 1080 | SUN. | 11:00 A.M. |
| BALTIMORE, MD. | WSID | 1010 | SUN. | 12:30 P.M. |
| BIRMINGHAM, ALA. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| CAMDEN, N.J. | WEEZ | 1590 | SUN. | 10:00 P.M. |
| CHATTANOOGA, TENN. | WNOO | 1260 | SUN. | 6:30 A.M. |
| CHICAGO — EVANSTON, ILL. | WEBH-FM | 93.9 | SUN. | 6:30 A.M. |
| COLUMBUS, GA. — PHENIX CITY, ALA. | WCLS | 1580 | SUN. | 8:30 P.M. |
| DALLAS, TEXAS | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| HOUSTON, TEXAS | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| JACKSON, MISS. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| KANSAS CITY, MO. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| LITTLE ROCK, ARK. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| LOS ANGELES, CALIF. | KAPP-FM | 93.5 | SUN. | 7:30 P.M. |
| MIAMI — FT. LAUDERDALE, FLA. | WFAB | 990 | SUN. | 1:00 P.M. |
| MIAMI — FT. LAUDERDALE, FLA. | WMIE | 1140 | SUN. | 6:30 A.M. |
| MONROE, LA. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| NASHVILLE, TENN. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| NEW ORLEANS, LA. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| NEW YORK, N.Y. — NEWARK, N.J. | WBNX | 1280 | SUN. | 6:30 P.M. |
| NEW YORK, N.Y — NEWARK, N.J. | WWRL | 1600 | FRI. | 11:30 P.M. |
| OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| PHILADELPHIA, PA. — CHESTER, PA. | WEEZ | 1590 | SUN. | 10:00 P.M. |
| PHOENIX, ARIZ. | KWBX | 1440 | SUN. | 10:30 A.M. |
| RICHMOND — PETERSBURG, VA. | WANT | 990 | SUN. | 5:00 P.M. |
| SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| SAN DIEGO, CALIF. | XEAU | 1470 | SUN. | 6:00 P.M. |
| SAN FRANCISCO — OAKLAND, CALIF. | KSAN | 1450 | SUN. | 8:00 P.M. |
| ST. LOUIS, MO. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| TUSCALOOSA, ALA. | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 10:30 P.M. |
| TYLER, TEXAS | XERF | 1570 | SUN. | 9:30 P.M. |
| WASHINGTON, D.C. | WOOK | 1340 | SUN. | 5:30 P.M. |
| WILMINGTON, DEL. | WEEZ | 1590 | SUN. | 10:00 P.M. |

Remember this date:

Plan NOW . . . check your calender . . . set this day aside . . . arrange your schedule, so that on TUESDAY, FEB. 26, 1963, you will be free to attend the MOST IMPORTANT EVENT OF THE YEAR and hear the MOST IMPORTANT MESSAGE OF THE YEAR! It concerns YOU, YOUR LIFE, YOUR FAMILY, YOUR FUTURE! YOU MUST ATTEND! You MUST HEAR IT!

TUESDAY, FEB. 26, 1963

MR. ELIJAH MUHAMMAD, MESSENGER OF ALLAH

The Honorable ELIJAH MUHAMMAD SPEAKS

Tuesday— FEB. 26

2 p.m. and 8 p.m.

AT THE COLISEUM 1513 SO. WABASH CHICAGO, ILL.

FREE -- ADMISSION -- FREE

Liberation
4/63
Resist Jim Crow

Racism in reverse?

THE BLACK MUSLIMS

AUGUST MEIER

PERHAPS the most impressive development in the years since the Second World War has been the movement toward independence and freedom on the part of colored peoples throughout the world. In Africa and in Asia, darker-skinned peoples have successfully thrown off the rule of white men, obtained recognition of their dignity as human beings, and achieved influence in the councils of the world. Part of this larger movement for freedom and dignity have been the stirrings among American Negroes. Most notable have been the nonviolent direct-action demonstrations, such as sit-ins and Freedom Rides on the one hand, and the various nationalistic movements, of which the Black Muslims are the most important, on the other.

There are, in fact, notable similarities between the Black Muslims and the nonviolent direct-action movement. Essentially, the aim of both movements was summed up by the student demonstrators in Baltimore, during the early months of 1960, who, as they picketed, would chant, "We walk for human dignity." Both movements are manifestations of a rejection of white doctrines of Negro inferiority, and white policies of discrimination. Both reflect the new self-image of American Negroes, arising out of the emergence of the independent states of Africa. Both exhibit dissatisfaction with the traditional Christianty of the Negro masses. The Black Muslims claim that they reject Christianity entirely (though actually their brand of Islam is significantly influenced by Christian organization and doctrine), while the nonviolent demonstrators reject the old-fashioned, "pie-in-the-sky" kind of Christianity which accepted the racial status quo and promised rewards for the meek in heaven. Both thus insist upon changes in the pattern of American race relations, and insist that they be made at once; both preach what appears to most white people to be a revolutionary resistance to the old order of race relations; both indicate that Negroes will no longer tolerate a subordinate position in the American social order, that gradualism in race relations must go.

Though most American Negroes would not agree with the program of Elijah Muhammad, the leader of the Black Muslims, it is important to point out that most of them would agree with his indictment of the American race system:

> My people, the so-called American Negroes, have long been the victims of attacks by their slavemasters. . . . America tells the Negro he is an equal citizen, but America denies him justice. The so-called Negro has been declared an equal citizen. Where is this equal citizenship? It is only in words! It has not been in deeds! . . . The United States Constitution declares equal justice for all. This equal justice is never practiced on the so-called Negro.

Thus the difference between the Black Muslims and other Negroes lies not in the Muslim criticism of the prejudice and discrimination practiced by American whites, and of American hypocrisy in regard to the treatment of Negroes. Rather, the difference lies in their proposed solutions to the problem. Most Negroes hope that integration and constitutional rights can be achieved, that Negroes will be accepted as fellow-citizens without discrimination. The Black Muslims do not believe that this is possible. In a nutshell, most Negroes still have faith in the American white man; the Black Muslims do not.

And the Black Muslims can cite impressive evidence to back up their belief on this score. Pointing to cases of discrimination, violence and police brutality, they claim that the white American will never live up to his democratic ideology in regard to the Negro. Those whites who appear to favor integration are worse than open segregationists, for the white liberals are hypocrites; they are like foxes who are trying to deceive the Negro by holding out the promise of integration. Says Elijah Muhammad:

> There is no security for even one black life in America. What chance have we against well-armed devils who are free to use their arms on the poor unarmed black people? This country's police force, using the tactics of brute savages, have behind them the government to kill us.

And again:

> The evil slavemasters know that they can never sincerely accept their slaves as their equals. In fact this is against the very nature of the white race; they were not created to accept the black man as their equal. . . . There are none who are actually seeking justice for the so-called Negroes but Allah and myself, His Servant. It makes me ashamed to read and hear over the radio, and to see my people on the TV in Washington praying and begging the same murderer for justice. . . . If they would only accept their own god and religion [Islam] and follow me, they would enjoy Freedom, Justice and Equality at once. . . . Though the government of America claims you are free, she is still the greatest hindrance to your exercising the freedom that she claims you have.

So profound is this distrust of the white man that observers have concluded that the Black Muslims actually preach hatred of the whites, though the movement's leaders deny this. One authority (C. Eric Lincoln*) has written of their "consuming and potentially violent racial and religious hatred. . . . They find no mandate except that of temporary expediency, for peace and submission between whites and blacks." In their literature the white race is described as "the human beast—the serpent, the dragon, the devil, and Satan." A play written by one of the Black Muslim ministers charges the white man with being the greatest liar on earth, the greatest drunkard on earth, the greatest gambler on earth, the greatest robber on earth, the greatest deceiver on earth, the greatest trouble-maker on earth. And since it was white men who robbed Negroes of their freedom and made them slaves, since it was white men who spawned a numerous mixed-blood progeny out of adultery with Negro slaves, since white people have talked of democracy and equal rights while denying these things to ten per cent of our population, and since whites to this day keep Negroes in second-class citizenship, these charges contain a core of truth that gives the Black Muslims a potent appeal.

As we have noted, according to the Black Muslims even white liberals cannot be trusted. As they say, "The Caucasians are great deceivers. Their nature is against friendship with black people, although they often fool the black people . . . claiming they are sincere friends."

*C. Eric Lincoln, The Black Muslim in America, Beacon Press, 1961.

Northern whites, say the Black Muslims, are concerned about race relations in the South only because maltreatment of Negroes is bad for international relations. After all, says Malcolm X, one of the movement's chief spokesmen, American society is like a ship, on which whites kept Negroes on the lowest decks until their ship was sinking; now why should Negroes want to integrate with whites when whites are going to drown anyway?

Fundamentally, the Black Muslims claim that the two races can never get along together, and they insist therefore upon the separation of the races as the only solution to the problem. Associated with this idea of separation is the belief that black men need race unity and race cooperation more than anything else, and that along with this they need a vigorous racial pride. In instilling this racial pride, and in giving the American Negroes a sense of identity and self-respect, they glorify the African background of American Negroes, and identify this African background with a rather unorthodox type of Islam. The founder of the Black Muslims, W. D. Fard, is regarded as the incarnation of Allah, sent to lead the persecuted American Negroes out of their bondage, and the present leader, Elijah Muhammad, has the title of "The Messenger of Allah." Actually Islam did not penetrate to the areas from which most of the New World Negroes came. But the achievements of the racially mixed ancient Egyptians, and the great Negro Muslim kingdoms of West Africa in the Middle Ages—most notably Ghana, Mali and Songhai—form the basis for a historical tradition, which is supplemented by the belief that all the colored peoples of the world can be classed as black men.

Utopia for Blacks

What are the precise goals of the Black Muslims? For purposes of analysis we may divide their ideology into two parts—the extreme views and Utopian ideals on the one hand, and their more immediate program on the other. Now the most extreme views of the Muslims are not always stated, and are at times denied. It can be said, however, that they assert the physical and moral inferiority of the white men, and the divinity and superiority of the black men. The Black Muslims hold that the six thousand years of white domination of the world is about to come to an end, and that Allah is about to usher in a struggle between the forces of good and evil which will eventuate in the destruction of the white race and the ascendancy of the black race. This Armageddon will result in a this-worldly Utopia for black men—for the Black Muslims do not believe in a future life but assert that heaven and hell are right here on earth. As a song by Minister Louis X of Boston puts it, "A white man's heaven is a black man's hell." Allah, it is anticipated, will soon reverse this situation.

The Black Muslims' more immediate program stresses four chief elements: a plea for greater race unity and race pride; an advocacy of Islam as opposed to Christianity; an economic and moral program composed of a puritanical sexual code, thrift, industry and economic accumulation designed to build up Negro businesses, so that Negroes can obtain employment and services in their own establishments rather than seek these things from whites; and political separatism, or the creation of an independent all-Negro state out of land obtained from the United States government. Says Elijah Muhammad:

> We must have some of this earth that we can call our own. We have lost 400 years making our slavemasters rich, powerful and independent. . . . Would you not like to live in peace and be recognized and treated as brother-citizens by your own people, in your own country, rather than to be unrecognized and treated like a "dog" by others than your own kind and country? Allah wants to give you, the so-called Negroes, the best and most permanent home the earth has to offer. . . . We must have some of this earth that we can call our own for a permanent home.

Exactly where this territory is to be the Black Muslims fail to state, and needless to say, it is unlikely that they will obtain it.

Thus though the eschatological prediction of the doom of the white race, and the Utopian vision of a separate territory of their own form an important part of the emotional appeal made by the Black Muslims, their actual practical program is centered upon the economic and moral uplift of their members. This they do by giving their members a sense of identity and self-respect through an appeal to the race's glorious past and a prediction of an equally glorious future, by stressing a high degree of morality, and by supplying some sort of half-way practical answer to the economic problems of the Negro masses. (I say it is a half-way practical answer because the major credit and industrial facilities are in the hands of white corporations, so the quickest and only realistic way of advancing the Negro masses economically is through breaking down the walls of discrimination in employment.) In fact, the movement is known for the number of former criminals who have joined it, have been reformed and now lead respectable lives.

Violence and Hatred

Though it is feared that the Black Muslims preach racial violence and revolution, there is no direct evidence to support this. Those who have studied the movement must closely are not in entire agreement on this matter. It is agreed that the Muslims direct their members not to start fights, but that they are urged to resist when attacked. One observer reports that when leaving religious services they are told, "Never be the aggressor; but if the wolf should bite you on the jaw, do not turn the other jaw. Show the wolf that you also have teeth and that you can do battle." One careful student of the movement (E. U. Ession-Udom*) in fact concludes that the eschatological aspects of the Black Muslim ideology, with its assertion that Allah will miraculously destroy the white race, actually mitigates the movement's violent and revolutionary potential; that the Black Muslims actually accommodate to the realities of the white-Negro power relations in the United States by preaching that Allah will bring about the solution to the Negro's problems in his own way. However, I feel that implicit in the movement's ideology is a strain of violence and hatred that, given the right conditions, could easily flower into a significant revolutionary force, though at present this eventuality seems quite unlikely.

Now why is it that this movement has risen to prominence at this time? It is of course not the first important nationalistic movement to have arisen among American Negroes. The Garvey Movement of the 1920's is simply the most famous of these Negro nationalistic movements, which go back as far as the 18th century. In fact most of the ideas of the Black Muslims have in one form or another been held by substantial numbers of American Negroes in the past, though the particular synthesis they have made is quite unique. But still the thoughtful observer might well ask why it is that, in a period when so much progress has been made toward improving race relations as in the last fifteen years, when conditions for Negroes appear to be better than ever before, such a movement should thrive. As a matter of fact, the movement, which was founded in 1930, remained small until well after the Second World War; indeed its chief growth has been from the period since 1954—since, in fact, the very year of the famous Supreme Court decision on desegregation in the public schools.

For one thing, the advances that have been made in race relations since the Second World War have caused a revolution in aspirations among American Negroes. They no longer feel that they have to accept the humiliations of second-class citizenship, and consequently these humiliations—somewhat fewer though they now are—appear to be more intolerable than ever. And in spite of Supreme Court decisions, Fair Employment Practices Laws and all the rest, the pace of change has been disappointingly slow. Thus there is considerable disillusionment among American Negroes. The sit-in movement and the Freedom Rides have been an expression of this impatience among the great rank and file of Negroes. Secondly, as mentioned earlier, the rise of colored nations—especially African nations—to independence has had a profound effect upon the self-image of American Negroes. If Africans can obtain their freedom, why should not Afro-Americans have theirs?

Thirdly, an important clue to the phenomenal rise of the Black Muslims is to be found in the fact that their appeal has been almost entirely to the very poorest Negroes, in the lowest paid occupations, many of whom are in fact unemployed, to Negroes living in the overcrowded urban slums and unable to escape to better neighborhoods as the middle-class Negroes do. For these peoples the conditions of life have been growing not better, but worse, in the last eight or ten years. At the very time that the Negro's aspirations have risen, their situation has deteriorated.

---

*E. U. Ession-Udom, Black Nationalism; The Search for an Identity in America, University of Chicago Press, 1962.

Let us cite some concrete figures to illustrate this. In 1952 the average Negro family's income was 57% of the average white family's income; ten years later, despite improvements in race relations, and despite the highly publicized occupational breakthroughs of a minority of Negroes, the average income of Negro families has fallen to 54% of the average income of white families. Meanwhile the unemployment rate has increased; and in fact the first real spurt in the membership rolls of the Black Muslims seems to have dated from the first post-war recession, that of 1954. Negro unemployment has been growing constantly since 1958, for unlike whites, Negroes do not recover any of the losses made during recessions. Negro unemployment is now two and a half times that of whites. In some major cities the figures are even more striking. In Chicago, with a total unemployment rate of 5.7%, 17.3% of the Negroes are jobless; and one quarter of that city's Negroes are on relief. In Detroit 60% of the unemployed workers are Negroes, though only 20% of the city's inhabitants are Negroes. In Philadelphia the general unemployment rate is 7%, while Negro unemployment is 28%; in Gary, Indiana, the community as a whole has an unemployment rate of 6.3%, while the city's Negroes have one of 44%. According to official A.F.L.-C.I.O. statistics, the over-all rate of unemployment of Negroes is 20%, which is higher than the rate of general unemployment during the depression.

Negroes, last to be hired and first to be fired, and for the most part confined to semi-skilled and unskilled jobs, are bearing the brunt of the technological unemployment caused by automation. Elijah Muhammad indicated his awareness of this fact when he said:

> It is beyond a shadow of doubt that America has no future for the so-called Negroes other than being subjected people. Though she has no labor for the so-called Negroes today that she cannot do for herself with modern machinery, she refuses to allow them to go for self.

Feeling of Hope

The great mass of lower-class Negroes thus find the American dream further from reality than ever. Rejected by the dominant whites, and pretty much ignored by middle- and upper-class Negro leadership (and the Black Muslim leaders express nothing but scorn for Negro leaders like those in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, whom they regard as toadying to white people), the frustrated Negro masses are ripe for the message of the Black Muslims. For those who are willing to submit to the severe discipline of the Black Muslim movement, this organization serves as a way out. It does this because it gives an identity and a sense of purpose and destiny, a self-respect and a feeling of hope, for its members. In short, then, Black Muslims appeal to those whom integration and the advances of recent years have passed by. To them the Black Muslims have a program that makes sense, for it offers them four things: an explanation of their plight (white devils); a sense of pride and self-esteem (black superiority); a vision of a glorious future (black ascendancy); and a practical immediate program of uplift (working hard and joining together to create Negro enterprise and prosperity).

It is important to note, however, that the ideology and program of the Black Muslims are shot through with paradoxes. In the first place, they exhibit the same sort of prejudices for which they so justly criticize whites. They assume that all whites are bad; and the stereotyped image which the prejudiced have of Negroes is the very image of whites which the Muslims are projecting—i.e., that whites are inferior beings, lazy, sexually immoral, dirty and criminal. Secondly, in their emphasis on thrift, hard work, economic accumulation, and Puritan morality, they seem to be trying to make Negroes over into the old-fashioned middle-class American image. In this, of course, they are imitating not only white middle-class virtues, but also the Negro middle class which they attack so much. They are indeed attacking the lower-class way of life of the very group to which they appeal—and their appeal lies in the very fact that they offer a route of upward mobility, a road to respectability, for people who would otherwise have no hope of improving themselves. Thus, as Essien-Udom suggests, the Black Muslims are as much anti-Negro-lower-class values, and anti-Negro-middle-class complacency and opportunism as they are anti-white injustice. In the third place, the faith of the Black Muslims is racially exclusive, though orthodox Islam preaches brotherhood and equality of all races. There are a number of similarities between the Black Muslim doctrines and Christianity. Like the Black Muslims, the early Christians appealed to the poor and the downtrodden, and they did this by giving them a sense of dignity and self-respect. Both the Christian and Black Muslim eschatologies paint a future of bliss for their righteous followers, and punishment for the wicked who are their oppressors. Both stress righteousness and justice, and both protest against oppression. Both believe that God was incarnate in a man, the founder of the faith—and in this and other ways W. D. Fard is comparable to Jesus. Both the Christians and the Black Muslims appear to be intolerant of other faiths. And both white Christians and Black Muslims have perverted their religious doctrines to justify racial hatreds.

There are paradoxes involved also in the Muslims' espousal of race pride. First, by stressing the Arabic language and Islam, the Black Muslims unintentionally seem to agree with whites who have incorrectly held that the culture of the Negro societies of Ashanti, Dahomey, Yoruba and related peoples—who were the chief sources of New World Negroes—were negligible and inferior. Second, the Black Muslims have attacked Martin Luther King, CORE and the student demonstrators as lacking in self-respect because they want integration—because, as the Black Muslims put it, they are begging to eat and sit in the white man's places rather than building their own. Psychologists have found that people who hate others—as do the white supremacists and the Black Muslims—are the ones who, subconsciously, really feel inferior and actually hate themselves, and therefore need a scapegoat on which to vent their frustrations. Only people with pride and confidence in themselves could display the courage of the nonviolent demonstrators, who have risked jail and even death, instead of being like the Black Muslims, who retreat into their own separate world.

In view of the situation in which lower-class Negroes find themselves, the wonder is not that the Black Muslim movement has grown so much, but that it has not grown far more. The severe discipline and ascetic code of the movement undoubtedly discourage many sympathizers from becoming members. But more important is the fact that fundamentally what most American Negroes want are their full rights as American citizens; that is, though they are forced to think of themselves as a disadvantaged minority group, in part the failure of the Black Muslims to attract larger numbers of people is due to the quest of the masses of Negroes for identification with the larger American society. Even among the Negro lower classes, the dream of full participation in the promise of American life remains a pervasive influence.

The Challenge

I do not mean to suggest that the Black Muslim movement does not have a great potential for further growth. Current estimates of its membership range from fifty thousand to half a million; probably the lower figure is more nearly correct, though the true numbers are a closely guarded secret. But the actual influence—and potential influence—of the Black Muslims is several times greater than this, both because the Muslims have many sympathizers in the Negro community, and because they are extremely well organized. While the movement's leaders thus far have discouraged their members from voting, it is not at all unlikely that they could wield an important—and in some cases a decisive—political influence in the major urban areas in the near future. In large part the future influence of the movement depends upon the actions of white Americans. If the slow pace of change in race relations continues and more Negroes become disillusioned, and particularly if something drastic is not done—and soon—to reverse the unemployment rate and improve the economic opportunities for Negroes, it is quite possible that it could become a mass movement that could create serious problems for American whites. Moreover, it is not too difficult to conceive of a combination of international circumstances that could give the movement a very real revolutionary potential. The crux of the situation, it seems to me, lies in the challenge Elijah Muhammad and Malcolm X have hurled at the white people of America, when they charge them with being hypocrites mouthing the language of freedom and equal rights, while according Negroes an inferior place in the American social order. The relatively slow pace of change in race relations, the continued economic deprivation and oppression of the great masses of Negroes, the slowdown on school desegregation, the resistance to Negro voter registration in the South, the frequency of police brutality, the reluctance to employ Negroes in skilled labor, white collar and managerial positions (even on the part of some individuals well-known for their interest in integrating Negroes into American society), the flight of whites from neighborhoods when a Negro family moves in, all support the contention of the Black Muslims that basically Americans do not want to accord equal rights to Negroes, that white Americans do not want to recognize the Negro's essential manhood and citizenship, but are being forced into making grudging changes only because of the pressure of international public opinion and the exigencies of United States foreign policy. And unfortunately it cannot be denied that much of the improvement in race relations over the past fifteen years has been for just this reason. The only way to meet the challenge posed by the Black Muslims and the possible danger they may pose to American society in the future is to show that white Americans really mean what they say when they talk about freedom and the democratic way of life by taking prompt and effective action to end segregation and discrimination at once. Even more than the student demonstrators and the Freedom Riders the Black Muslims have a message for white America—and that message is that not only discrimination but also gradualism in race relations must vanish.

Harold Feinstein

RELIGION OF REBELLION—With their doctrine of black supremacy, the Muslims have been called "the other side of the White Citizens Councils of the South." Seated before white-robed Muslim women, Malcolm X prepares to address a meeting in Washington, D. C. In the foreground are two members of the rigorously trained elite group that enforces the cult's rules.

The nation's 20,000,000 Negroes are united in their determination to win equality but they are divided over the means of achieving it.

eted waiters serve well-dressed diners. A mural of the Sphinx fills one wall. Even the juke box seems toned down. It is like a stage set.

For three and a half hours, Malcolm X virtually mesmerizes the listener with his ingratiating manners, an endless flow of ideas, Biblical quotations, boyish smiles and bland insults. He is tall (6 feet 3 inches), a light-brown, 37-year-old, ruggedly handsome man with coldly appraising eyes behind horn-rimmed glasses. With pauses for phone calls or to sip water (he was on a monthly three-day fast), he roams widely over religious, economic, cultural and racial subjects on which he has educated himself.

He never got beyond a formal eighth-grade education. He attributes "all that I am and all that I know" to his teacher, Mr. Muhammad. When he pronounces the name, it is with the same awe that Catholics refer to St. Peter, or Jews to Moses.

He was born Malcolm Little in Omaha, Neb., one of 11 children and the son of a Baptist minister. He tells you he was 6 years old when the Ku Klux Klan burned his home to the ground; later his father was found killed. These terrible memories have never left him. The family broke up and Malcolm went to a boys' institution. Eventually, he moved East and into the underworld. Known as "Big Red," he went to prison for larceny in Massachusetts on an 8-to-10-year sentence, and served seven years. In prison he began to absorb the Muslim religion and to correspond with Muhammad. He likes to say that "Christianity took me to prison and Islam brought me out."

"THIS Elijah," he tells you, "is teaching us that just as Moses solved the problem of the Jews by taking them to a land of their own, this Moses, our Elijah, will lead us to a land of our own."

"Where?" (Some reports have identified the site as three Southern States.)

Malcolm X flashes his smile. "Moses never told the Jews where it was to be. It was part of the Mosaic strategy politically just to lead them out toward the 'promised land.'

"The reason that Muslims don't want integration with the white man," Malcolm X continues, "is because we see what's coming to the white man, what's in store for him. It's a sinking ship.

"We're not anti-white. We're anti-oppression, and the oppressor is white. That's why I say there is a guilt complex among the whites.

"The N.A.A.C.P. is not a Negro organization, so Roy Wilkins [N.A.A.C.P. executive director] is not a Negro leader. As long as Arthur Spingarn is the president, it's a Jewish organization. And it's the same with the Urban League, CORE, the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense Fund—all those are white organizations.

"When Negroes in those organizations open their mouths to speak words of praise, it's always for white people—the good liberals, the good Jews, the good white folks. When they say anything good about Mr. Muhammad, it's always with reservations to let people know that 'I'm not a Muslim.' These are statements by scared men."

Asked whether he feels his racism is comparable to Hitler's he replies blandly: "Uncle Sam was practicing racism and white supremacy before Hitler was born. Hitler learned from Uncle Sam. Kennedy exploited the Negro to get in office and since then he bucked everyone on this earth — U.S. Steel, Khrushchev, Castro, everybody—but he won't buck the Southern segregationists. Tokenism — minimum integration — is a political trick."

BUT is not race irrelevant? Shouldn't man be judged as a human being, not on his color?

"It's too late to undo the chain reaction of events that has been set in motion by the white supremacists. There is some Muslim in a whole lot of Negroes. The only movement with mass appeal today is the Muslim movement. Why? Because Negroes are fed up. The most dangerous thing that confronts whites today is the white man's attempt to minimize the intense dissatisfaction among Negroes."

Malcolm X likes to say that he has no political ambitions, yet like other Muslim ministers, he is constantly recruiting—on speaking tours, at outdoor rallies, on (Continued on Page 86)

Whether you like your house . . .

you'll warm to Techbuilt's award-winning contemporary designs. And the odds are good that we can plan you one (custom-designed in all but price, thanks to our famous modular construction) to meet all your specifications. ▶ As the first step, why don't you send for our new Portfolio? It contains large illustrations and floor plans of ten distinguished Techbuilt homes, plus a handsome brochure which reveals most of our secrets. It's yours for fifty cents.

Techbuilt, Inc., Dept. T-4, 127 Mt. Auburn St., Cambridge, Mass.

TECHBUILT

DOCTRINE OF SEPARATISM—Standing beside a blackboard on which the Muslim viewpoint is presented with graphic simplicity, Malcolm X presides at a meeting in Harlem's Muslim Temple No. 7.

Two Ways: Black Muslim and N.A.A.C.P.

(Continued from Page 27)

college campuses, in pool halls, prisons and drugstores—inviting Negro Christians to attend lectures at the mosque.

So strong is Malcolm X's drawing power in Harlem today that Congressman Adam Clayton Powell, a Baptist preacher, has begun to link himself to the Muslims.

The other week, at a huge, outdoor rally in Harlem Square, the Congressman declared:

"I tell you again and again, we are not going to get anything more in this life except that which we fight for and fight for with all our power. Unless we can seize completely the administration of our national Negro organizations, then we must say there is no hope there for us. This may sound like black nationalism. If it is, then what is wrong with it?"

Powell added that he did not agree with "some things" that Malcolm X preached, but he said Malcolm X was his "friend." In wrathful tones that won loud approval, he attacked on racist grounds such nonviolent, interracial groups as N.A.A.C.P. (of which he happens to be a life member), the Urban League, CORE, and the Rev. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. They had, he said, white people in leadership positions.

Malcolm X rose at the same meeting to declare: "We won't get our problems solved depending on the white man." Both speakers obliquely singled out for attack those leaders with Jewish names.

The leading Negro press has been scathing in reaction to the attacks on the N.A.A.C.P. But in Harlem, the Muslims and Powell have been given a curious boost by the writings of James Hicks, executive editor of The Amsterdam News, a Harlem Negro weekly. Hicks has been trying to paint N.A.A.C.P. leaders and Negroes high in government as in league with "the enemy," calling them "stupid." (His paper, paradoxically, has been advertising that its "great" columnists are the very men he is criticizing — Roy Wilkins and Dr. King.)

During the newspaper strike, when reaction was necessarily mute, the paper charged that "Jews control New York's top jobs." Recently, Hicks wrote that he was "fed up" with leaders who criticized Malcolm X for "fighting the wrong war in the wrong place at the wrong time."

"Who is the enemy?" asked Mr. Hicks.

THE N.A.A.C.P.

THE enemy, answers N.A.A.C.P., is race hatred —whether it comes from men with white skins or black skins.

The N.A.A.C.P. rejects segregation or, as the Muslims call it, "separation." It is biracial. It was founded fifty years ago by liberal whites and Negroes. N.A.A.C.P. fights in three nonviolent ways — legal, legislative and educational — to help Negroes break out of their ghettos. It is trying to teach all people that race is irrelevant, that man must be judged as man.

In contrast with the Muslims, N.A.A.C.P. seeks to bring about complete integration in all phases of American life. It wants equal justice under law, the right to vote (Muslims discourage voting), personal security against mob and police violence, and nondiscriminatory treatment in housing and all public facilities. It is the largest civil rights organization in the nation with some 400,000 paying members and probably millions of supporters, Negro and white.

For traditional reasons, all presidents of N.A.A.C.P. have been white. The board of directors, which sets policy, numbers 60, of whom 11 are whites. The board has included such public figures as Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Ralph Bunche, Gov. Herbert Lehman, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Walter Reuther. Arthur Spingarn, 85-year-old Jewish lawyer, who heads N.A.A.C.P., was for nearly a quarter-century the association's entire "legal department," serving on a no-fee basis.

Today the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense Fund, a separate, nonprofit group, works for civil

(Continued on Following Page)

PICTURE CREDITS

1—BARRETT GALLAGHER; HANSON BALDWIN; NASA; DEPT. OF DEFENSE
21—SOVFOTO
22-23—THE NEW YORK TIMES (SAM FALK, GEORGE TAMES); Dalmas-PIX; USAF
25—KENNETH MILLER
26-27—GERTRUDE SAMUELS; AP; RICHARD SAUNDERS FROM PICTORIAL PARADE
29—THE NEW YORK TIMES (SAM FALK)
30-31—VAN DAMM; GRAPHIC HOUSE; SY FRIEDMAN; ANGUS McBEAN
32—DRAWING BY SUSAN PERL
38-39—CHARLES CLARK FROM NORTH CAROLINA NEWS BUREAU; MARIS FROM EZRA STOLLER ASSOCIATES; GERALD RATTO
41-46—DRAWINGS BY ROY DOTY
48-49—ANTHONY CRICKMAY; ROGER WOOD; S. LIDO FROM DANCE NEWS
62—JACK MANNING
64—STEVE SCHAPIRO FROM BLACK STAR
66—DRAWING BY NAIAD EINSEL
68-69—URSULA MAHONEY
72—DRAWING BY ROY DOTY
76—KROKODIL
79—AUDREY TOPPING
84-85—VAN DAMM; BEN PINCHOT; CULVER PICTURES
86-88—RICHARD SAUNDERS FROM PICTORIAL PARADE; SHABAZZ PHOTO
89—UNITED PRESS INTERNATIONAL
90—KENNETH MILLER
93—AFP FROM PICTORIAL PARADE
94-96—DRAWINGS BY CARL ROSE

MAIL COUPON NOW FOR FREE LITERATURE AND HOME DEMONSTRATION. POSITIVELY NO OBLIGATION.

TO: WINDSOR INC., 171 7th AVE., New York 11, N. Y. Dept. 3261.
Please mail free literature on factory-to-me 100% human hair Windsor Wigs. I am under no obligation to buy.
Name
Street City
Zone State Phone(s)

100% HUMAN HAIR
FASHION WIGS
DIRECT FROM FACTORY TO YOU
AS LOW AS $49.00
(lighter shades higher)
PAY-AS-YOU-WEAR TERMS ONLY $2.50 A WEEK

We don't import wigs. We make them in our own factories, finest quality and workmanship far surpassing most imported wigs. We save you import duty costs and middleman importers' profits. WINDSOR, one of the world leaders, offers an exquisite array of 17 colors from jet black to frosty platinum. No synthetics, lovely soft 100% human hair. Free home demonstration by trained courteous consultant. No obligation.

PHONE NOW CH 3-8250
TO: WINDSOR INC., 171 7th Ave., New York 11, N. Y.
Offices in Principal Cities Coast to Coast, U. S. & Canada

a home ELEVATOR FOR LESS THAN THE COST OF A COMPACT CAR!

Write for illustrated brochure on stair Elevators and the popular "Elevette" — vertical home elevator described in House Beautiful magazine. 31-10B

Inclin-ator
INCLINATOR-ELEVETTE CO. OF NEW YORK, INC.
475 Fifth Avenue New York 17, N. Y. BRyant 9-0644
1213 Teaneck Rd. Teaneck, N. J. TEaneck 3-0880
EXCLUSIVE DISTRIBUTORS INCLINATOR CO. OF AMERICA

what is electrolysis?
How can it help you?
If you are troubled by unwanted hair on face, arms, legs or body, you will want to read the informative booklet published in the public interest by the Electrolysis Society. Explains the scientific principals behind Galvanic and Short-wave electrolysis — the only medically approved methods for permanent hair removal.
Yours FREE. Write today!
THE ELECTROLYSIS SOCIETY OF AMERICA, INC.
155 W. 46th Street
New York 36, N. Y.

danish FURNITURE

No Lower Prices This Side of Copenhagen
Open daily till 7 P.M.
STAGE 331 E. 28 St. New York

THE MODERN, EARLY AMERICAN, VICTORIAN, PROVINCIAL LAMP.

This solid walnut piece would have looked good with stone age period. It's 56" tall. With a 10" by 16" white butcher linen shade. It uses 2-100 watt bulbs. Nobody worried about any particular period when it was designed. They just wanted it to be beautiful. Period. $60.

A BROCHURE FOR THE ASKING
Mail orders and browsers are invited.

GEORGE KOVACS
Dept. 5-12, 888 Madison Avenue (72nd St.)
New York 21, New York Phone UN 1-8955

Are you in the mail-order business?

Improve your business by using the advertising columns of The New York Times Magazine. Circulation is widespread — more than 1,350,000 from coast to coast. Cost is low. Get full details. Write The New York Times, Mail-Order Advertising Department, Times Square, New York 36, N. Y. Or call LAckawanna 4-1000, Ext. 226.

X the Unknown

Asked about his family name, Minister Malcolm X says that he long ago took the surname X: "The last white man to own my forefathers was Little, and it would be an insult to call me by that name."

He told the writer to call him Malcolm X, or Mr. Malcolm X, or Mr. X.

"The X means that I don't know who I am," he said. "No one knows who these Negroes are — their identity was destroyed during slavery. All of the Muslims take X—the unknown. Sixty-seven brothers in our mosque alone have the name James X with the number of their sequence — James X-11, James X-12, etc. We have done this deliberately.

"I feel more intelligent saying my name is X," he added, icily, "than I would saying my name was Little —or Bunche or Powell or King. They don't know that they don't know what their name is."—G. S.

(Continued from Preceding Page)

rights through legal actions. Its nine lawyers (six of whom are Negro) have 121 cases pending in the Southern states. Of these, 66 are school segregation cases; six involve admission of physicians to hospital staffs and patients to treatment facilities; the remainder are sit-in and Freedom Rider cases.

N.A.A.C.P. is also encouraging the economic boycott—what it calls "selective buying." Negro purchasing power is estimated at $15 billion a year; N.A.A.C.P. reports that planned boycotts of certain merchants and retail stores in Jackson, Miss.; Savannah, Ga.; Macon, Ga., and St. Petersburg, Fla., are "effective" and that the idea is spreading.

The chief legal counsel until recently was Thurgood Marshall, a Negro who is now a Federal judge. When asked to comment on the appointment of Jack Greenberg, his successor as director-counsel (now under attack by the Muslims and Congressman Powell), Judge Marshall said: "As those who are fighting discrimination, we cannot afford to practice it."

* * *

URBANITY is the word for Roy Wilkins, N.A.A.C.P.'s graying executive director, who looks younger than his 62 years. The son of a Methodist minister, tall, lean, known as a cool strategist, Wilkins worked his way through the University of Minnesota (as a redcap and a railroad dining-car waiter). He was managing editor of The Call, a Negro weekly in Kansas City, Mo., until he joined the association some thirty years ago. At N.A.A.C.P. headquarters in mid-Manhattan the other day, Wilkins discussed Powell and spoke with contempt of the Muslims and their hate philosophy.

"WHAT is Adam Powell doing in Congress," asked Wilkins, "if he doesn't believe in integration? Logically, if he's given up on the system, or doesn't support what most Negroes want — integration — he ought to resign.

"I don't think that there's any doubt that Negroes are frustrated, bitter and impatient, but I don't see that as identical with the Muslim objectives. This Muslim group is a cult. The first point of departure is its anti-Christianity which gives them the cult aspect and is attention-getting. But Christianity has been for the American Negro part and parcel of his development and his life. So when he is asked to get rid of it and to adopt Islam and Allah, well, it is bound to get attention.

"And, let's face it," he went on coolly, "the white community brought it on themselves. The whites are responsible for

(Continued on Following Page)

ON THE SPEAKERS' STAND—At a Human Rights Rally in Harlem, Malcolm X (center) shares platform with Adam Clayton Powell (left) and Hulan Jack, former Manhattan Borough President.

A GIRL WITHOUT A COUNTRY

Sepier's six years of life have been cruelly tragic. Her family was deported from Turkey and would not be welcomed back, even if there were funds to get back. Her Armenian parents belong to the oldest Christian nation but it no longer exists. There is only a Russian Communist Satellite in the Caucasus. Her father was an invalid when the family was forced to leave Turkey and poor and insufficient food caused his death soon after arriving in Lebanon. For many years the family has existed in a one room hovel. The mother has tried to eke out a living working as a farm hand. Malnutrition has since incapacitated her for hard labor. Now in this one small room, bitter cold for lack of fuel in winter and blistering hot, standing in the dry sun-scorched plain in summer—evicted, unwanted, countryless, a sick mother and her four children have one constant companion—hunger.

There are hundreds of Sepiers in the Near East, born of refugee parents who, in many cases, have lived in the same temporary, makeshift shacks for over 30 years. Their parents are not worthless, good-for-nothing people. But it is hard to keep hoping for a real life for 30 years. The children themselves never asked to be born into such a miserable and hopeless existence.

Sepier is an appealing, sweet child. There is a haunting sadness about her but she is naturally affectionate and appreciative. Little girls like Sepier can be found in many other of the 55 countries listed below where CCF assists over 42,000 children in 469 orphanages and projects. Youngsters like her can be "adopted" and cared for. The cost to the contributor is the same in all countries—ten dollars a month. The child's name, address, story and picture and correspondence with the child are provided for the donor.

COUNTRIES:
Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Borneo, Brazil, Burma, Cameroun, Canada, Ceylon, Chile, Costa Rica, Egypt, England, Finland, France, Greece, Haiti, Hong Kong, India, Indonesia, Iran, Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Kenya, Korea, Lapland, Lebanon, Macao, Malaya, Mexico, Nigeria, Northern Rhodesia, Okinawa, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Portugal, Puerto Rico, Scotland, Southern Rhodesia, South Africa, Republic of; Spain, Swaziland, Syria, Taiwan, Thailand, Turkey, Uruguay, United States (Indian, Negro, White), Vietnam, Western Germany.

For Information write: Dr. J. Calvitt Clarke

CHRISTIAN CHILDREN'S FUND, INC.
Richmond 4, Virginia

I wish to "adopt" a boy ☐ girl ☐ for one year in _____ (Name Country)
I cannot "adopt" child but want to help by giving $_____. I will pay $10 a month ($120 a year). Enclosed is payment for full year ☐ first month ☐.
Please send me child's name, story, address, picture. I understand I can correspond with child, and there is no obligation to continue adoption.

Please send me more information ☐
NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____ ZONE _____
STATE _____
GIFTS OF ANY AMOUNT ARE WELCOME. Gifts are deductible from U.S. and Canadian income taxes. Canadians should write: Christian Children's Fund of Canada, 1139 Bay Street, Toronto 5.

NECTAROSÉ
the wine that goes with everything

The leading Vin Rosé. Imported from France
BROWNE-VINTNERS CO., N.Y., N.Y., SOLE DIST. FOR THE U.S.A.

(Continued from Preceding Page)
the seeds of this cult being even an inch high — their rebuffs to the Negro, their rejection of his worthiness no matter how worthy.

"The supreme push to this defeatist Muslim philosophy was given by the tolerated defiance of the Supreme Court decision. Negro citizens had a right to believe that once the Supreme Court in 1954 had affirmed that segregation was unconstitutional, things would change. But instead of progress, there has been token integration — driplets of compliance. Of course, the Muslims capitalize on all this.

"But for all his frustrations, the Negro is still an American. This is his country. He's sore about a lot of things. But most Negroes—the vast majority—have decided to fight it out, fight for what is their due. The Negro is convinced that he can do something about it. If he didn't believe it, you wouldn't have the steady membership in N.A.A.C.P., the personal following of Martin Luther King, the kneel-ins at the churches, the sit-ins at the lunch-counters, and the demonstrations."

* * *

WHAT is the meaning of the present schism for the Negro community and for America?

Many people believe that the influence of the Muslims is growing. They seem to have plenty of money. Their code, emphasizing race pride and individual decorum, is helping to shatter the Negro stereotype of shiftlessness and lawlessness and has undeniable appeal. As one non-Muslim Negro put it: "No one can calculate the psychological and emotional impact throughout the nation." Though their political power is latent, it is a threat. The immediate danger is that, through them, a growing number of colored people are beginning to experience a real sense of alienation from American society.

SYMBOLS OF DEDICATION—White robes and headdresses are ceremonial garb for women members of Black Muslim movement.

Partly in reaction to the rise of the Muslims but mostly because of its own impatience with the slow progress on civil rights, the N.A.A.C.P. and other moderate groups are being forced into more militant positions. The militancy, especially of the young Negro American, has been dramatized in recent days by the various "freedom walks" and the hundreds of arrests of young Negroes in Birmingham, Ala., in the demonstrations against segregation. Some believe that the very existence of the Muslims points to a failure of the N.A.A.C.P. to reach the grass roots where the cult is having success.

As Roy Wilkins moves about the South, he encounters redcaps, porters and bellhops who keep abreast of events, reading the papers and watching TV. They are apt to ask him: "How're things going? You think those folks are going to act right down there in Washington?"

"I think so," Wilkins replies, "if you keep up the pressure."

"We're going to do it," they answer, "but sometimes—" and they shake their heads—"I don't know . . . I don't know. Adam flies off the handle — but he gets white folks told."

The warnings are clear. The Muslims exist and their influence will remain potent so long as they are able to give the Negro masses something that articulates their pent-up frustrations.

Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, professor of psychology at City College, chief of HARYOU (the Federally supported Harlem Youth Opportunities Unlimited) and himself a target of the Muslims, puts it this way:

"THE danger of the Muslim movement is that it exploits chaos. It is really the other side of the White Citizen Councils of the South. It can put terror into people and intimidate the responsible elements. The anti-Semitism is part of the demagoguery. The Muslims have again demonstrated the ease with which masses of human beings can be aroused by hatred. There is no reason to believe that Negroes are any more immune to this type of hate appeal than are whites."

It is the disease of racism and discrimination that must be attacked. Negro leaders are warning that the whites must open their eyes to some painful realities they have been trying desperately not to see. The racial confrontation in America now exists and cannot be postponed. Gradualism and tokenism are no longer acceptable to the Negro people.

At the highest level of government, it is felt, there must be wider understanding of the sense of urgency. The racial crisis is upon us.

"It must be resolved positively now," Kenneth Clark concludes, "or we run the risk of stagnation, moral dry-rot or worse. No Negro leader in America today can ask the masses to wait for rights which are enjoyed by the newest American citizen who is white."

How Students Feel

The Muslim movement is geared to attract "Young Blacks." It emphasizes youth and masculinity. Its young leaders make a show of self-confidence and a sort of military posturing. They do not wear uniforms but have the Muslim insigne—a star-and-crescent button — in their lapels.

In a meeting with Negro students of Hunter College and City College, the writer asked what the Muslims meant to them. Here is a sampling of their replies:

On the Muslims:

"They are bringing the facts into the open. They're saying the truth and you can't deny it — that civil rights aren't as great as we think they are, that we haven't moved the way people claim we have. As Malcolm X gives you these facts and valid information, you go along and it's rational. But when he moves into these farcical concepts and pie in the sky—the creation of a Black State—I feel he's ridiculous. Why, it's unconstitutional."

"I agree with some things that Malcolm X says, but I don't agree with his racism and separation of the races. When I visited the mosque the men were extremely mannerly and neat. I think that the Negro should have more dignity in being a Negro."

"One thing the Muslims want is for all the shop-owners on 125th Street to be replaced by Negroes. Perhaps that's not such a good idea. If Negro shops are going to survive, they should function in competition with white shops, as they do in the rest of the business world."

"I think it's a dream—this Black State. I don't think it could happen. But I'll say this: The very fact that they could preach it, and people follow them, despite the absurdity of the idea, shows the frustration and bitterness of the Negroes."

"They have shown exactly what is in the minds of Negroes: that the hate is still there, it hasn't gone, and something must be done about it."

On the N.A.A.C.P.:

"In its time, N.A.A.C.P. was radical. Now they're not. If the big move isn't made with this generation, we might just as well wait until the 12th of Never. What do I want? Not a way-out radical approach — but building the concept of equal rights, of getting political and economic awareness."

"Where N.A.A.C.P. keeps speaking on the intellectual level, playing everything out of that legal bag, I wish they would realize that the answer lies with the grass roots. They have to reach the very groups that the Muslims are working with, to move them upward."

"I'd like to see a real Youth Leader branch that would be structured and give directives, for instance, to the youth leaders at my college."

"I'd like an action program—people who will act instead of react to situations like the Muslims. N.A.A.C.P. has done a good job. But it's too middle-class. It has no appeal to most people in Harlem. If it had, would people there flock to the nationalist rallies?"—G. S.

Resistance Grps. Negro
LWD! fyi
PA ✓ MCV JT

Playboy
May, 1963

PLAYBOY INTERVIEW: MALCOLM X

a candid conversation with the militant major-domo of the black muslims

Within the past five years, the militant American Negro has become an increasingly active combatant in the struggle for civil rights. Espousing the goals of unqualified equality and integration, many of these outspoken insurgents have participated in freedom rides and protest marches against their segregationist foes. Today, they face opposition from not one, but two inimical exponents of racism and segregation: the white supremacists and the Black Muslims. A relatively unknown and insignificant radical religious Negro cult until a few years ago, the Muslims have grown into a dedicated, disciplined nationwide movement which runs its own school, publishes its own newspaper, owns stores and restaurants in four major cities, buys broadcast time on 50 radio stations throughout the country, stages mass rallies attended by partisan crowds of 10,000 and more, and maintains its own police force of judo-trained athletes called the Fruit of Islam.

Predicated on the proposition that the black man is morally, spiritually and intellectually superior to the white man, who is called a "devil," Muslim doctrine dooms him to extermination in an imminent Armageddon — along with Christianity itself, which is denounced as an opiate designed to lull Negroes — with the promise of heaven — into passive acceptance of inferior social status. Amalgamating elements of Christianity and Mohammedanism (both of which officially and unequivocally disown it) and spiked with a black-supremacy version of Hitler's Aryan racial theories, Muslimism was founded in 1931 by Elijah Poole, a Georgia-born ex-factory worker who today commands unquestioning obedience from thousands of followers as the Honorable Elijah Muhammad, Messenger of Allah. At the right hand of God's Messenger stands 36-year-old Malcolm Little, a lanky onetime dining-car steward, bootlegger, pimp and dope pusher who left prison in 1952 to heed Muhammad's message, abandoned his "slave name," Little, for the symbolic "X" (meaning identity unknown), and took an oath to abstain thereafter from smoking, drinking, gambling, cursing, dancing and sexual promiscuity — as required of every Muslim. The ambitious young man rose swiftly to become the Messenger's most ardent and erudite disciple, and today wields all but absolute authority over the movement and its membership as Muhammad's business manager, trouble shooter, prime minister and heir apparent.

In the belief that knowledge and awareness are necessary and effective antitoxins against the venom of hate, PLAYBOY asked Malcolm X to submit to a cross-examination on the means and ends of his organization. The ensuing interview was conducted at a secluded table in a Harlem restaurant owned by the Muslims. Interrupting his replies occasionally with a sip of black African coffee and whispered asides to deferential aides, the dark-suited minister of Harlem's Muslim Temple Number Seven spoke with candor and — except for moments of impassioned execration of all whites — the impersonal tone of a self-assured corporation executive.

Many will be shocked by what he has to say; others will be outraged. Our own view is that this interview is both an eloquent statement and a damning self-indictment of one noxious facet of rampant racism. As such, we believe it merits publication — and reading.

---

PLAYBOY: What is the ambition of the Black Muslims?

MALCOLM X: Freedom, justice and equality

"I don't know when Armageddon is supposed to be. But I know that the time is near when the white man will be finished. The signs are all around us."

"Christ wasn't white. Christ was black. The poor, brainwashed Negro has been made to believe Christ was white to maneuver him into worshiping white men."

"Verwoerd is an honest white man. So are the Barnetts, Eastlands and Rockwells. They want to keep white people white; we want to keep black people black."

are our principal ambitions. And to faithfully serve and follow the Honorable Elijah Muhammad is the guiding goal of every Muslim. Mr. Muhammad teaches us the knowledge of our own selves, and of our own people. He cleans us up — morally, mentally and spiritually — and he reforms us of the vices that have blinded us here in the Western society. He stops black men from getting drunk, stops their dope addiction if they had it, stops nicotine, gambling, stealing, lying, cheating, fornication, adultery, prostitution, juvenile delinquency. I think of this whenever somebody talks about someone investigating us. Why investigate the Honorable Elijah Muhammad? They should subsidize him. He's cleaning up the mess that white men have made. He's saving the Government millions of dollars, taking black men off of welfare, showing them how to do something for themselves. And Mr. Muhammad teaches us love for our own kind. The white man has taught the black people in this country to hate themselves as inferior, to hate each other, to be divided against each other. Messenger Muhammad restores our love for our own kind, which enables us to work together in unity and harmony. He shows us how to pool our financial resources and our talents, then to work together toward a common objective. Among other things, we have small businesses in most major cities in this country, and we want to create many more. We are taught by Mr. Muhammad that it is very important to improve the black man's economy, and his thrift. But to do this, we must have land of our own. The brainwashed black man can never learn to stand on his own two feet until he is on his own. We must learn to become our own producers, manufacturers and traders; we must have industry of our own, to employ our own. The white man resists this because he wants to keep the black man under his thumb and jurisdiction in white society. He wants to keep the black man always dependent and begging — for jobs, food, clothes, shelter, education. The white man doesn't want to lose somebody to be supreme over. He wants to keep the black man where he can be watched and retarded. Mr. Muhammad teaches that as soon as we separate from the white man, we will learn that we can do without the white man just as he can do without us. The white man knows that once black men get off to themselves and learn they can do for themselves, the black man's full potential will explode and he will surpass the white man.

PLAYBOY: Do you feel that the Black Muslims' goal of obtaining "several states" is a practical vision?

MALCOLM X: Well, you might consider some things practical that are really impractical. Wasn't it impractical that the Supreme Court could issue a desegregation order nine years ago and there's still only eight percent compliance? Is it practical that a hundred years after the Civil War there's not freedom for black men yet? On the record for integration you've got the President, the Congress, the Supreme Court — but show me your integration, where is it? That's practical? Mr. Muhammad teaches us to be for what's really practical — that's separation. It's more natural than integration.

PLAYBOY: In the view of many, that is highly debatable. However: In a recent interview, Negro author-lecturer Louis Lomax said, "Eighty percent, if not more, of America's 20,000,000 Negroes vibrate sympathetically with the Muslims' indictment of the white power structure. But this does not mean we agree with them in their doctrines of estrangement or with their proposed resolutions of the race problem." Does this view represent a consensus of opinion among Negroes? And if so, is it possible that your separationist and anti-Christian doctrine have the effect of alienating many of your race?

MALCOLM X: Sir, you make a mistake listening to people who tell you how much our stand alienates black men in this country. I'd guess actually we have the sympathy of 90 percent of the black people. There are 20,000,000 dormant Muslims in America. A Muslim to us is somebody who is for the black man; I don't care if he goes to the Baptist Church seven days a week. The Honorable Elijah Muhammad says that a black man is born a Muslim by nature. There are millions of Muslims not aware of it now. All of them will be Muslims when they wake up; that's what's meant by the Resurrection.

Sir, I'm going to tell you a secret: the black man is a whole lot smarter than white people think he is. The black man has survived in this country by fooling the white man. He's been dancing and grinning and white men never guessed what he was thinking. Now you'll hear the bourgeois Negroes pretending to be alienated, but they're just making the white man think they don't go for what Mr. Muhammad is saying. This Negro that will tell you he's so against us, he's just protecting the crumbs he gets from the white man's table. This kind of Negro is so busy trying to be like the white man that he doesn't know what the real masses of his own people are thinking. A fine car and house and clothes and liquor have made a lot think themselves different from their poor black brothers. But Mr. Muhammad says that Allah is going to wake up all black men to see the white man as he really is, and see what Christianity has done to them. The black masses that are waking up don't believe in Christianity anymore. All it's done for black men is help to keep them slaves. Mr. Muhammad is teaching that Christianity, as white people see it, means that whites can have their heaven here on earth, but the black man is supposed to catch his hell here. The black man is supposed to keep believing that when he dies, he'll float up to some city with golden streets and milk and honey on a cloud somewhere. Every black man in North America has heard black Christian preachers shouting about "tomorrow in good old Beulah's Land." But the thinking black masses today are interested in Muhammad's Land. The Promised Land that the Honorable Elijah Muhammad talks about is right here on this earth. Intelligent black men today are interested in a religious doctrine that offers a solution to their problems right now, right here on this earth, while they are alive.

You must understand that the Honorable Elijah Muhammad represents the fulfillment of Biblical prophecy to us. In the Old Testament, Moses lived to see his enemy, Pharaoh, drowned in the Red Sea — which in essence means that Mr. Muhammad will see the completion of his work in his lifetime, that he will live to see victory gained over his enemy.

PLAYBOY: The Old Testament connection seems tenuous. Are you referring to the Muslim judgment day which your organization's newspaper, Muhammad Speaks, calls "Armageddon" and prophesies as imminent?

MALCOLM X: Armageddon deals with the final battle between God and the Devil. The Third World War is referred to as Armageddon by many white statesmen. There won't be any more war after then because there won't be any more warmongers. I don't know when Armageddon, whatever form it takes, is supposed to be. But I know the time is near when the white man will be finished. The signs are all around us. Ten years ago you couldn't have paid a Southern Negro to defy local customs. The British Lion's tail has been snatched off in black Africa. The Indonesians have booted out such would-be imperialists as the Dutch. The French, who felt for a century that Algeria was theirs, have had to run for their lives back to France. Sir, the point I make is that all over the world, the old day of standing in fear and trembling before the almighty white man is gone!

PLAYBOY: You refer to whites as the guilty and the enemy; you predict divine retribution against them; and you preach absolute separation from the white community. Do not these views substantiate that your movement is predicated on race hatred?

MALCOLM X: Sir, it's from Mr. Muhammad that the black masses are learning for the first time in 400 years the real truth

MEET

THE NEW CHRISTY MINSTRELS

exclusively on COLUMBIA RECORDS of how the white man brainwashed the black man, kept him ignorant of his true history, robbed him of his self-confidence. The black masses for the first time are understanding that it's not a case of being anti-white or anti-Christian, but it's a case of seeing the true nature of the white man. We're anti-evil, anti-oppression, anti-lynching. You can't be anti- those things unless you're also anti- the oppressor and the lyncher. You can't be anti-slavery and pro-slavemaster; you can't be anti-crime and pro-criminal. In fact, Mr. Muhammad teaches that if the present generation of whites would study their own race in the light of their true history, they would be anti-white themselves.

PLAYBOY: Are you?

MALCOLM X: As soon as the white man hears a black man say that he's through loving white people, then the white man accuses the black man of hating him. The Honorable Elijah Muhammad doesn't teach hate. The white man isn't important enough for the Honorable Elijah Muhammad and his followers to spend any time hating him. The white man has brainwashed himself into believing that all the black people in the world want to be cuddled up next to him. When he meets what we're talking about, he can't believe it, it takes all the wind out of him. When we tell him we don't want to be around him, we don't want to be like he is, he's staggered. It makes him re-evaluate his 300-year myth about the black man. What I want to know is how the white man, with the blood of black people dripping off his fingers, can have the audacity to be asking black people do they hate him. That takes a lot of nerve.

PLAYBOY: How do you reconcile your disavowal of hatred with the announcement you made last year that Allah had brought you "the good news" that 120 white Atlantans had just been killed in an air crash en route to America from Paris?

MALCOLM X: Sir, as I see the law of justice, it says as you sow, so shall you reap. The white man has reveled as the rope snapped black men's necks. He has reveled around the lynching fire. It's only right for the black man's true God, Allah, to defend us — and for us to be joyous because our God manifests his ability to inflict pain on our enemy. We Muslims believe that the white race, which is guilty of having oppressed and exploited and enslaved our people here in America, should and will be the victims of God's divine wrath. All civilized societies in their courts of justice set a sentence of execution against those deemed to be enemies of society, such as murderers and kidnapers. The presence of 20,000,000 black people here in America is proof that Uncle Sam is guilty of kidnaping — because we didn't come here voluntarily on the Mayflower. And 400 years of lynchings condemn Uncle Sam as a murderer.

PLAYBOY: We question that all-inclusive generalization. To return to your statement about the plane crash, when Dr. Ralph Bunche heard about it, he called you "mentally depraved." What is your reaction?

MALCOLM X: I know all about what Dr. Bunche said. He's always got his international mouth open. He apologized in the UN when black people protested there. You'll notice that whenever the white man lets a black man get prominent, he has a job for him. Dr. Bunche serves the white man well — he represents, speaks for and defends the white man. He does none of this for the black man. Dr. Bunche has functioned as a white man's tool, designed to influence international opinion on the Negro. The white man has Negro local tools, national tools, and Dr. Bunche is an international tool.

PLAYBOY: Dr. Bunche was only one of many prominent Negroes who deplored your statement in similar terms. What reply have you to make to these spokesmen for your own people?

MALCOLM X: Go ask their opinions and you'll be able to fill your notebook with what white people want to hear Negroes say. Let's take these so-called spokesmen for the black men by types. Start with the politicians. They never attack Mr. Muhammad personally. They realize he has the sympathy of the black masses. They know they would alienate the masses whose votes they need. But the black civic leaders, they do attack Mr. Muhammad. The reason is usually that they are appointed to their positions by the white man. The white man pays them to attack us. The ones who attack Mr. Muhammad the most are the ones who earn the most. Then take the black religious leaders, they also attack Mr. Muhammad. These preachers do it out of self-defense, because they know he's waking up Negroes. No one believes what the Negro preacher preaches except those who are mentally asleep, or in the darkness of ignorance about the true situation of the black man here today in this wilderness of North America. If you will take note, sir, many so-called Negro leaders who once attacked the Honorable Elijah Muhammad don't do so anymore. And he never speaks against them in the personal sense except as a reaction if they speak against him. Islam is a religion that teaches us never to attack, never to be the aggressor — but you can waste somebody if he attacks you. These Negro leaders have become aware that whenever the Honorable Elijah Muhammad is caused by their attack to level his guns against them, they always come out on the losing end. Many have experienced this.

PLAYBOY: Do you admire and respect any other American Negro leaders—Martin Luther King, for example?

MALCOLM X: I am a Muslim, sir. Muslims can see only one leader who has the qualifications necessary to unite all elements of black people in America. This is the Honorable Elijah Muhammad.

PLAYBOY: Many white religious leaders have also gone on record against the Black Muslims. Writing in the official NAACP magazine, a Catholic priest described you as "a fascist-minded hate group," and B'nai B'rith has accused you of being not only anti-Christian but anti-Semitic. Do you consider this true?

MALCOLM X: Insofar as the Christian world is concerned, dictatorships have existed only in areas or countries where you have Roman Catholicism. Catholicism conditions your mind for dictators. Can you think of a single Protestant country that has ever produced a dictator?

PLAYBOY: Germany was predominantly Protestant when Hitler ——

MALCOLM X: Another thing to think of — in the 20th Century, the Christian Church has given us two heresies: fascism and communism.

PLAYBOY: On what grounds do you attribute these "isms" to the Christian Church?

MALCOLM X: Where did fascism start? Where's the second-largest Communist party outside of Russia? The answer to both is Italy. Where is the Vatican? But let's not forget the Jew. Anybody that gives even a just criticism of the Jew is instantly labeled anti-Semite. The Jew cries louder than anybody else if anybody criticizes him. You can tell the truth about any minority in America, but make a true observation about the Jew, and if it doesn't pat him on the back, then he uses his grip on the news media to label you anti-Semite. Let me say just a word about the Jew and the black man. The Jew is always anxious to advise the black man. But they never advise him how to solve his problem the way the Jews solved their problem. The Jew never went sitting-in and crawling-in and sliding-in and freedom-riding, like he teaches and helps Negroes to do. The Jews stood up, and stood together, and they used their ultimate power, the economic weapon. That's exactly what the Honorable Elijah Muhammad is trying to teach black men to do. The Jews pooled their money and bought the hotels that barred them. They bought Atlantic City and Miami Beach and anything else they wanted. Who owns Hollywood? Who runs the garment industry, the largest industry in New York City? But the Jew that's advising the Negro joins the NAACP, CORE, the Urban League, and others. With money donations, the Jew gains control, then he sends the black man doing all this wading-in, boring-in, even burying-in—everything but buying-in. Never shows him how to set up factories and hotels. Never advises him how to own what he wants. No, when there's something worth owning, the Jew's got it.

PLAYBOY: Isn't it true that many Gentiles have also labored with dedication to advance integration and economic improvement for the Negro, as volunteer workers for the NAACP, CORE and many other interracial agencies?

MALCOLM X: A man who tosses worms in the river isn't necessarily a friend of the fish. All the fish who take him for a friend, who think the worm's got no hook in it, usually end up in the frying pan. All these things dangled before us by the white liberal posing as a friend and benefactor have turned out to be nothing but bait to make us think we're making progress. The Supreme Court decision has never been enforced. Desegregation has never taken place. The promises have never been fulfilled. We have received only tokens, substitutes, trickery and deceit.

PLAYBOY: What motives do you impute to PLAYBOY for providing you with this opportunity for the free discussion of your views?

MALCOLM X: I think you want to sell magazines. I've never seen a sincere white man, not when it comes to helping black people. Usually things like this are done by white people to benefit themselves. The white man's primary interest is not to elevate the thinking of black people, or to waken black people, or white people either. The white man is interested in the black man only to the extent that the black man is of use to him. The white man's interest is to make money, to exploit.

PLAYBOY: Is there any white man on earth whom you would concede to have the Negro's welfare genuinely at heart?

MALCOLM X: I say, sir, that you can never make an intelligent judgment without evidence. If any man will study the entire history of the relationship between the white man and the black man, no evidence will be found that justifies any confidence or faith that the black man might have in the white man today.

PLAYBOY: Then you consider it impossible for the white man to be anything but an exploiter and a hypocrite in his relations with the Negro?

MALCOLM X: Is it wrong to attribute a predisposition to wheat before it comes up out of the ground? Wheat's characteristics and nature make it wheat. It differs from barley because of its nature. Wheat perpetuates its own characteristics just

PORTAGE
shoes for men

They flair to be different . . . with a custom look that bespeaks good taste. Take the continental swank of the 3-Eye Cablelace PORTAGE Moccasin . . . a vigorous new styling expression that is slim yet bold. There's a new note in style distinction, too, in the sharp PORTAGE Boot . . . a clean new design that belongs in every man's shoe wardrobe. See your PORTAGE Dealer or write us for his name.
From $11.95 to $24.95.

PORTAGE SHOE MFG. CO., Milwaukee 1, Wis.
A Division of Weyenberg Shoe Mfg. Co.

as the white race does. White people are born devils by nature. They don't become so by deeds. If you never put popcorn in a skillet, it would still be popcorn. Put the heat to it, it will pop.

PLAYBOY: You say that white men are devils by nature. Was Christ a devil?

MALCOLM X: Christ wasn't white. Christ was a black man.

PLAYBOY: On what Scripture do you base this assertion?

MALCOLM X: Sir, Billy Graham has made the same statement in public. Why not ask him what Scripture he found it in? When Pope Pius XII died, Life magazine carried a picture of him in his private study kneeling before a black Christ.

PLAYBOY: Those are hardly quotations from Scripture. Was He not reviled as "King of the Jews"—a people the Black Muslims attack?

MALCOLM X: Only the poor, brainwashed American Negro has been made to believe that Christ was white, to maneuver him into worshiping the white man. After becoming a Muslim in prison, I read almost everything I could put my hands on in the prison library. I began to think back on everything I had read and especially with the histories, I realized that nearly all of them read by the general public have been made into white histories. I found out that the history-whitening process either had left out great things that black men had done, or some of the great black men had gotten whitened.

PLAYBOY: Would you list a few of these men?

MALCOLM X: Well, Hannibal, the most successful general that ever lived, was a black man. So was Beethoven; Beethoven's father was one of the blackamoors that hired themselves out in Europe as professional soldiers. Haydn, Beethoven's teacher, was of African descent. Columbus, the discoverer of America, was a half-black man.

PLAYBOY: According to biographies considered definitive, Beethoven's father, Johann, was a court tenor in Cologne; Haydn's parents were Croatian; Columbus' parents were Italian——

MALCOLM X: Whole black empires, like the Moorish, have been whitened to hide the fact that a great black empire had conquered a white empire even before America was discovered. The Moorish civilization—black Africans—conquered and ruled Spain; they kept the light burning in Southern Europe. The word "Moor" means "black," by the way. Egyptian civilization is a classic example of how the white man stole great African cultures and makes them appear today as white European. The black nation of Egypt is the only country that has a science named after its culture: Egyptology. The ancient Sumerians, a black-skinned people, occupied the Middle Eastern areas and were contemporary with the Egyptian civilization. The Incas, the Aztecs, the Mayans, all dark-skinned Indian people, had a highly developed culture here in America, in what is now Mexico and northern South America. These people had mastered agriculture at the time when European white people were still living in mud huts and eating weeds. But white children, or black children, or grownups here today in America don't get to read this in the average books they are exposed to.

PLAYBOY: Can you cite any authoritative historical documents for these observations?

MALCOLM X: I can cite a great many, sir. You could start with Herodotus, the Greek historian. He outright described the Egyptians as "black, with woolly hair." And the American archaeologist and Egyptologist James Henry Breasted did the same thing.

PLAYBOY: You seem to have based your thesis on the premise that all nonwhite races are necessarily black.

MALCOLM X: Mr. Muhammad says that the red, the brown and the yellow are indeed all part of the black nation. Which means that black, brown, red, yellow, all are brothers, all are one family. The white one is a stranger. He's the odd fellow.

PLAYBOY: Since your classification of black peoples apparently includes the light-skinned Oriental, Middle Eastern and possibly even Latin races as well as the darker Indian and Negroid strains, just how do you decide how light-skinned it's permissible to be before being condemned as white? And if Caucasian whites are devils by nature, do you classify people by degrees of devilishness according to the lightness of their skin?

MALCOLM X: I don't worry about these little technicalities. But I know that white society has always considered that one drop of black blood makes you black. To me, if one drop can do this, it only shows the power of one drop of black blood. And I know another thing—that Negroes who used to be light enough to pass for white have seen the handwriting on the wall and are beginning to come back and identify with their own kind. And white people who also are seeing the pendulum of time catching up with them are now trying to join with blacks, or even find traces of black blood in their own veins, hoping that it will save them from the catastrophe they see ahead. But no devil can fool God. Muslims have a little poem about them. It goes, "One drop will make you black, and will also in days to come save your soul."

PLAYBOY: As one of this vast elite, do you hold the familiar majority attitude toward minority groups—regarding the white race, in this case, as inferior in quality as well as quantity to what you call the "black nation"?

MALCOLM X: Thoughtful white people know they are inferior to black people. Even Eastland knows it. Anyone who has studied the genetic phase of biology knows that white is considered recessive and black is considered dominant. When you want strong coffee, you ask for black coffee. If you want it light, you want it weak, integrated with white milk. Just like these Negroes who weaken themselves and their race by this integrating and intermixing with whites. If you want bread with no nutritional value, you ask for white bread. All the good that was in it has been bleached out of it, and it will constipate you. If you want pure flour, you ask for dark flour, whole-wheat flour. If you want pure sugar, you want dark sugar.

PLAYBOY: If all whites are devilish by nature, as you have alleged, and if black and white are essentially opposite, as you have just stated, do you view all black men — with the exception of their non-Muslim leaders — as fundamentally angelic?

MALCOLM X: No, there is plenty wrong with Negroes. They have no society. They're robots, automatons. No minds of their own. I hate to say that about us, but it's the truth. They are a black body with a white brain. Like the monster Frankenstein. The top part is your bourgeois Negro. He's your integrator. He's not interested in his poor black brothers. He's usually so deep in debt from trying to copy the white man's social habits that he doesn't have time to worry about nothing else. They buy the most expensive clothes and cars and eat the cheapest food. They act more like the white man than the white man does himself. These are the ones that hide their sympathy for Mr. Muhammad's teachings. It conflicts with the sources from which they get their white-man's crumbs. This class to us are the fence-sitters. They have one eye on the white man and the other eye on the Muslims. They'll jump whichever way they see the wind blowing. Then there's the middle class of the Negro masses, the ones not in the ghetto, who realize that life is a struggle, who are conscious of all the injustices being done and of the constant state of insecurity in which they live. They're ready to take some stand against everything that's against them. Now, when this group hears Mr. Muhammad's teachings, they are the ones who come forth faster and identify themselves, and take immediate steps toward trying to bring into existence what Mr. Muhammad advocates. At the bottom of the social heap is the black man in the big-city ghetto. He lives night and day with the rats and cockroaches and drowns

H. D. Lee Co., Inc., Kansas City 41, Mo.

DO $5.95 SLACKS GO WITH A $50 BLAZER?

Yes...when they have the authority of Lee Lustre Sateens

Dressing well is not a cold science you measure mathematically with dollar signs. It's a matter of taste, of knowing what looks right. Here, a great looking blazer with great looking slacks. Who's going to evaluate price tags...no one! Lee Lustre Sateens in this classic style with cuffs and belt loops, or in a continental cut. Both Sanforized-Plus for reliable wash and wear. Classic in Sea Foam, Bone, Smoke Loden; continental in Black, Elephant Brown, Green Sand.

Leesures® by Lee himself with alcohol and anesthetizes himself with dope, to try and forget where and what he is. That Negro has given up all hope. He's the hardest one for us to reach, because he's the deepest in the mud. But when you get him, you've got the best kind of Muslim. Because he makes the most drastic change. He's the most fearless. He will stand the longest. He has nothing to lose, even his life, because he didn't have that in the first place. I look upon myself, sir, as a prime example of this category — and as graphic an example as you could find of the salvation of the black man.

PLAYBOY: Could you give us a brief review of the early life that led to your own "salvation"?

MALCOLM X: Gladly. I was born in Omaha on May 19, 1925. My light color is the result of my mother's mother having been raped by a white man. I hate every drop of white blood in me. Before I am indicted for hate again, sir — is it wrong to hate the blood of a rapist? But to continue: My father was a militant follower of Marcus Garvey's "Back to Africa" movement. The Lansing, Michigan, equivalent of the Ku Klux Klan warned him to stop preaching Garvey's message, but he kept on and one of my earliest memories is of being snatched awake one night with a lot of screaming going on because our home was afire. But my father got louder about Garvey, and the next time he was found bludgeoned in the head, lying across streetcar tracks. He died soon and our family was in a bad way. We were so hungry we were dizzy and we had nowhere to turn. Finally the authorities came in and we children were scattered about in different places as public wards. I happened to become the ward of a white couple who ran a correctional school for white boys. This family liked me in the way they liked their house pets. They got me enrolled in an all-white school. I was popular, I played sports and everything, and studied hard, and I stayed at the head of my class through the eighth grade. That summer I was 14, but I was big enough and looked old enough to get away with telling a lie that I was 21, so I got a job working in the dining car of a train that ran between Boston and New York City.

On my layovers in New York, I'd go to Harlem. That's where I saw in the bars all these men and women with what looked like the easiest life in the world. Plenty of money, big cars, all of it. I could tell they were in the rackets and vice. I hung around those bars whenever I came in town, and I kept my ears and eyes open and my mouth shut. And they kept their eyes on me, too. Finally, one day a numbers man told me that he needed a runner, and I never caught the night train back to Boston. Right there was when I started my life in crime. I was in all of it that the white police and the gangsters left open to the black criminal, sir. I was in numbers, bootleg liquor, "hot" goods, women. I sold the bodies of black women to white men, and white women to black men. I was in dope, I was in everything evil you could name. The only thing I could say good for myself, sir, was that I did not indulge in hitting anybody over the head.

PLAYBOY: By the time you were 16, according to the record, you had several men working for you in these various enterprises. Right?

MALCOLM X: Yes, sir. I turned the things I mentioned to you over to them. And I had a good working system of paying off policemen. It was here that I learned that vice and crime can only exist, at least the kind and level that I was in, to the degree that the police cooperate with it. I had several men working and I was a steerer myself. I steered white people with money from downtown to whatever kind of sin they wanted in Harlem. I didn't care what they wanted, I knew where to take them to it. And I tell you what I noticed here — that my best customers always were the officials, the top police people, businessmen, politicians and clergymen. I never forgot that. I met all levels of these white people, supplied them with everything they wanted, and I saw that they were just a filthy race of devils. But despite the fact that my own father was murdered by whites, and I had seen my people all my life brutalized by whites, I was still blind enough to mix with them and socialize with them. I thought they were gods and goddesses — until Mr. Muhammad's powerful spiritual message opened my eyes and enabled me to see them as a race of devils. Nothing had made me see the white man as he is until one word from the Honorable Elijah Muhammad opened my eyes overnight.

PLAYBOY: When did this happen?

MALCOLM X: In prison. I was finally caught and spent 77 months in three different prisons. But it was the greatest thing that ever happened to me, because it was in prison that I first heard the teachings of the Honorable Elijah Muhammad. His teachings were what turned me around. The first time I heard the Honorable Elijah Muhammad's statement, "The white man is the devil," it just clicked. I am a good example of why Islam is spreading so rapidly across the land. I was nothing but another convict, a semi-illiterate criminal. Mr. Muhammad's teachings were able to reach into prison, which is the level where people are considered to have fallen as low as they can go. His teachings brought me from behind prison walls and placed me on the podiums of some of the leading colleges and universities in the country. I often think, sir, that in 1946, I was sentenced to 8 to 10 years in Cambridge, Massachusetts, as a common thief who had never passed the eighth grade. And the next time I went back to Cambridge was in March 1961, as a guest speaker at the Harvard Law School Forum. This is the best example of Mr. Muhammad's ability to take nothing and make something, to take nobody and make somebody.

PLAYBOY: Your rise to prominence in the Muslim organization has been so swift that a number of your own membership have hailed you as their articulate exemplar, and many anti-Muslims regard you as the real brains and power of the movement. What is your reaction to this sudden eminence?

MALCOLM X: Sir, it's heresy to imply that I am in any way whatever even equal to Mr. Muhammad. No man on earth today is his equal. Whatever I am that is good, it is through what I have been taught by Mr. Muhammad.

PLAYBOY: Be that as it may, the time is near when your leader, who is 65, will have to retire from leadership of the Muslim movement. Many observers predict that when this day comes, the new Messenger of Allah in America — a role which you have called the most powerful of any black man in the world — will be Malcolm X. How do you feel about this prospect?

MALCOLM X: Sir, I can only say that God chose Mr. Muhammad as his Messenger, and Mr. Muhammad chose me and many others to help him. Only God has the say-so. But I will tell you one thing. I frankly don't believe that I or anyone else am worthy to succeed Mr. Muhammad. No one preceded him. I don't think I could make the sacrifice he has made, or set his good example. He has done more than lay down his life. But his work is already done with the seed he has planted among black people. If Mr. Muhammad and every identifiable follower he has, certainly including myself, were tomorrow removed from the scene by more of the white man's brutality, there is one thing to be sure of: Mr. Muhammad's teachings of the naked truth have fallen upon fertile soil among 20,000,000 black men here in this wilderness of North America.

PLAYBOY: Has the soil, in your opinion, been as fertile for Mr. Muhammad's teachings elsewhere in the world — among the emerging nations of black Africa, for instance?

MALCOLM X: I think not only that his teachings have had considerable impact even in Africa but that the Honorable Elijah Muhammad has had a greater impact on the world than the rise of the African nations. I say this as objectively as I can, being a Muslim. Even the Christian missionaries are conceding that in black Africa, for every Christian conversion, there are two Muslim conversions.

PLAYBOY: Might conversions be even more numerous if it weren't for the somewhat strained relations which are said by several Negro writers to exist between the black people of Africa and America?

MALCOLM X: Perhaps. You see, the American black man sees the African come here and live where the American black man can't. The Negro sees the African come here with a sheet on and go places where the Negro — dressed like a white man, talking like a white man, sometimes as wealthy as the white man — can't go. When I'm traveling around the country, I use my real Muslim name, Malik Shabazz. I make my hotel reservations under that name, and I always see the same thing I've just been telling you. I come to the desk and always see that "here-comes-a-Negro" look. It's kind of a reserved, coldly tolerant cordiality. But when I say "Malik Shabazz," their whole attitude changes: they snap to respect. They think I'm an African. People say what's in a name? There's a whole lot in a name. The American black man is seeing the African respected as a human being. The African gets respect because he has an identity and cultural roots. But most of all because the African owns some land. For these reasons he has his human rights recognized, and that makes his civil rights automatic.

PLAYBOY: Do you feel this is true of Negro civil and human rights in South Africa, where the doctrine of apartheid is enforced by the government of Prime Minister Verwoerd?

MALCOLM X: They don't stand for anything different in South Africa than America stands for. The only difference is over there they preach as well as practice apartheid. America preaches freedom and practices slavery. America preaches integration and practices segregation. Verwoerd is an honest white man. So are the Barnetts, Faubuses, Eastlands and Rockwells. They want to keep all white people white. And we want to keep all black people black. As between the racists and the integrationists, I highly prefer the racists. I'd rather walk among rattlesnakes, whose constant rattle warns me where they are, than among those Northern snakes who grin and make you forget you're still in a snake pit. Any white man is against blacks. The entire American economy is based on white supremacy. Even the religious philosophy is, in essence, white supremacy. A white Jesus. A white Virgin. White angels. White everything. But a black Devil, of course. The "Uncle Sam" political foundation is based on white supremacy, relegating nonwhites to second-class citizenship. It goes without saying that the social philosophy is strictly white supremacist. And the educational system perpetuates white supremacy.

PLAYBOY: Are you contradicting yourself by denouncing white supremacy while praising its practitioners, since you admit that you share their goal of separation?

MALCOLM X: The fact that I prefer the candor of the Southern segregationist to the hypocrisy of the Northern integrationist doesn't alter the basic immorality of white supremacy. A devil is still a devil whether he wears a bed sheet or a Brooks Brothers suit. The Honorable Elijah Muhammad teaches separation simply because any forcible attempt to integrate America completely would result in another Civil War, a catastrophic explosion among whites which would destroy America — and still not solve the problem. But Mr. Muhammad's solution of separate black and white would solve the problem neatly for both the white and black man, and America would be saved. Then the whole world would give Uncle Sam credit for being something other than a hypocrite.

PLAYBOY: Do you feel that the Administration's successful stand on the integration of James Meredith into the University of Mississippi has demonstrated that the Government — far from being hypocritical — is sympathetic with the Negro's aspirations for equality?

MALCOLM X: What was accomplished? It took 15,000 troops to put Meredith in the University of Mississippi. Those troops and $3,000,000 — that's what was spent — to get one Negro in. That $3,000,000 could have been used much more wisely by the Federal Government to elevate the living standards of all the Negroes in Mississippi.

PLAYBOY: Then in your view, the principle involved was not worth the expense. Yet it is a matter of record that President Kennedy, in the face of Southern opposition, championed the appointment of Dr. Robert Weaver as the first Negro Cabinet member. Doesn't this indicate to you, as it does to many Negro leaders, that the Administration is determined to combat white supremacy?

MALCOLM X: Kennedy doesn't have to fight; he's the President. He didn't have any fight replacing Ribicoff with Celebrezze. He didn't have any trouble putting Goldberg on the Supreme Court. He hasn't had any trouble getting anybody in but Weaver and Thurgood Marshall. He wasn't worried about Congressional objection when he challenged U. S. Steel. He wasn't worried about either Congressional reaction or Russian reaction or even world reaction when he blockaded Cuba. But when it comes to the rights of the Negro, who helped to put him in office, then he's afraid of little pockets of white resistance.

PLAYBOY: Has any American President, in your opinion — Lincoln, FDR, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy — accomplished anything for the Negro?

MALCOLM X: None of them have ever done anything for Negroes. All of them have tricked the Negro, and made false promises to him at election times which they never fulfilled. Lincoln's concern wasn't freedom for the blacks but to save the Union.

PLAYBOY: Wasn't the Civil War fought to decide whether this nation could, in the words of Lincoln, "endure permanently half slave and half free"?

MALCOLM X: Sir, many, many people are completely misinformed about Lincoln and the Negro. That war involved two thieves, the North and the South, fighting over the spoils. The further we get away from the actual incident, the more they are trying to make it sound as though the battle was over the black man. Lincoln said that if he could save the Union without freeing the slaves, he would. But after two years of killing and carnage he found out he would have to free the slaves. He wasn't interested in the slaves but in the Union. As for the Emancipation Proclamation, sir, it was an empty document. If it freed the slaves, why, a century later, are we still battling for civil rights?

PLAYBOY: Despite the fact that the goal of racial equality is not yet realized, many sociologists—and many Negro commentators—agree that no minority group on earth has made as much social, civil and economic progress as the American Negro in the past 100 years. What is your reaction to this view?

MALCOLM X: Sir, I hear that everywhere almost exactly as you state it. This is one of the biggest myths that the American black man himself believes in. Every immigrant ethnic group that has come to this country is now a genuinely first-class citizen group — every one of them but the black man, who was here when they came. While everybody else is sharing the fruit, the black man is just now starting to be thrown some seeds. It is our hope that through the Honorable Elijah Muhammad, we will at last get the soil to plant the seeds in. You talk about the progress of the Negro — I'll tell you, mister, it's just because the Negro has been in America while America has gone forward that the Negro appears to have gone forward. The Negro is like a man on a luxury commuter train doing 90 miles an hour. He looks out of the window, along with all the white passengers in their Pullman chairs, and he thinks he's doing 90, too. Then he gets to the men's room and looks in the mirror — and he sees he's not really getting anywhere at all. His reflection shows a black man standing there in the white uniform of a dining-car steward. He may get on the 5:10, all right, but he sure won't be getting off at Westport.

PLAYBOY: Is there anything then, in your opinion, that could be done—by either whites or blacks—to expedite the social and economic progress of the Negro in America?

MALCOLM X: First of all, the white man must finally realize that he's the one who has committed the crimes that have produced the miserable condition that our people are in. He can't hide this guilt by reviling us today because we answer his criminal acts – past and present – with extreme and uncompromising resentment. He cannot hide his guilt by accusing us, his victims, of being racists, extremists and black supremacists. The white man must realize that the sins of the fathers are about to be visited upon the heads of the children who have continued those sins, only in more sophisticated ways. Mr. Elijah Muhammad is warning this generation of white people that they, too, are also facing a time of harvest in which they will have to pay for the crime committed when their grandfathers made slaves out of us.

But there is something the white man can do to avert this fate. He must atone – and this can only be done by allowing black men, those who choose, to leave this land of bondage and go to a land of our own. But if he doesn't want a mass movement of our people away from this house of bondage, then he should separate this country. He should give us several states here on American soil, where those of us who wish to can go and set up our own government, our own economic system, our own civilization. Since we have given over 300 years of our slave labor to the white man's America, helped to build it up for him, it's only right that white America should give us everything we need in finance and materials for the next 25 years, until our own nation is able to stand on its feet. Then, if the Western Hemisphere is attacked by outside enemies, we would have both the capability and the motivation to join in defending the hemisphere, in which we would then have a sovereign stake.

The Honorable Elijah Muhammad says that the black man has served under the rule of all the other peoples of the earth at one time or another in the past. He teaches that it is now God's intention to put the black man back at the top of civilization, where he was in the beginning – before Adam, the white man, was created. The world since Adam has been white – and corrupt. The world of tomorrow will be black – and righteous. In the white world there has been nothing but slavery, suffering, death and colonialism. In the black world of tomorrow, there will be true freedom, justice and equality for all. And that day is coming – sooner than you think.

PLAYBOY: If Muslims ultimately gain control as you predict, do you plan to bestow "true freedom" on white people?

MALCOLM X: It's not a case of what would we do, it's a case of what would God do with whites. What does a judge do with the guilty? Either the guilty atone, or God executes judgment.

cut out for each other

(you, and your contour-cut University Row sportshirt)

The shirt that's in a class by itself, when it comes to neat, trim fit: the Manhattan University Row sportshirt with traditional contour-cut. The print is a smart paisley; the manner is strictly Ivy. It's the casual, yet distinctive sportshirt that's at home on any campus. And no matter how many extra-curricular activities are on your schedule, it's always ready to go. Because it's Mansmooth 100% cotton. Here, one example from the University Row collection. $5.

University Row by Manhattan

Quality makers of the finest men's furnishings, sportswear and Lady Manhattan® sportswear.

The Christian Century
6/5/63

Malcolm X: Charismatic Demagogue

Racist. Supo Negro

An interview with the number two man in the militantly antiwhite Black Muslim movement.

ALBERT B. SOUTHWICK

✦ IT IS ALWAYS interesting to meet someone who is the object of national controversy, if only to see how the flesh and blood person differs from one's prior impressions. Excellent as news stories and magazine articles and even television presentations may be, as far as personality is concerned they usually fail to carry the third dimension of reality.

I was reminded of this fact a few weeks ago when I and five fellow newsmen met and talked with Malcolm X, the number two man in the Black Muslim movement and the heir apparent to ailing Elijah Muhammad, founder of the extremist Negro organization.

The White Liberals' Frankenstein

I had read quotations from the speeches of Elijah Muhammad and Malcolm X which suggested that the Black Muslims nurse such a burning hatred against all whites that civil discourse with one of them would be impossible. But Malcolm X shook hands cordially, smiled easily, and seemed at ease even while countering the most pointed questions. He is a handsome, coffee-colored man of perhaps 45 who displays a charismatic demagoguery before a crowd and the talent of an able if somewhat devious lawyer when locked in hard debate across a table. Like all other Black Muslims he has dropped his family name for a letter of the alphabet, thus supposedly casting off the heritage of servility and shame bequeathed the Negro by the white man in the days of slavery. Those days, Malcom X never tires of telling his Negro audiences, have not ended, and will not end until the Negro people, in the pride of their race, rise up and separate themselves once and for all from the white man's culture and civilization. The message of the Black Muslims is one of contempt for and hostility toward all efforts to ameliorate a condition which can be cured, they say, only by radical surgery. Christian Negro leaders such as Martin Luther King, Jr., are reviled as "modern Uncle Toms" and "puppets of the white liberals." Ralph Bunche is an object of derision: "Instead of straightening out the Congo, why doesn't he straighten out Mississippi?"

It takes only a few moments with Malcolm X to learn that the "white liberals" are almost an obsession with him; such people are, he believes, deserving of the most corrosive sarcasm. "The white liberals," he said, facing six men who probably fitted the designation, "have a guilt complex about the Negro. They love people like King who salve that guilt feeling a little. That's why they finance him. He's their darling. But when a Negro moves into a white neighborhood, who are the first to flee? The white liberals every time. Negroes who think otherwise are blinding themselves to the facts."

"You whites," he charged, warming to his subject, "have created a Frankenstein monster by your treatment of the American Negro. You've created a man who is black outside and white inside. Despite his black skin, he wants to be a white man. He wants what the white man has. No matter what you've been told, he wants your sister, your wife—even your mother."

The American Negro can be redeemed only by the physical separation of the races. "Separation, not segregation," Malcolm X repeated again and again. "Segregation is a condition enforced by a superior on an inferior. Separation is a mutual agreement between equals. The white man will never have any respect for the black man until they are separated from each other. You have a higher opinion of Africans than you do of American Negroes because the Africans are separate."

His finger was pointed at me, so I began to object. Immediately he softened. "I don't mean you personally; I mean the collective you, the collective white man. We can't be bothered with individuals."

Not even individual Negroes?

"We have to think of the collective situation," he said with only a slight pause. "We can't think about individuals."

No Road Maps of the Promised Land

One of the most frequent questions thrown at the Black Muslims is just how and where the physical separation of Negro from white Americans is to be accomplished. The most popular theory is that Elijah Muhammad has staked out Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana and part of Texas for the future independent Negro state. But Malcolm X refused to be pinned down. Blandly he declared: "I have never heard Mr. Muhammad discuss the geographical factors involved, although he has said that when the American government wants to come to him, he will have proposals to make."

If Malcolm X has never heard Mr. Muhammad

---

Mr. Southwick is an editorial writer for the Worcester, Massachusetts, Telegram and Gazette.

discuss the matter, it is fairly certain that no one else has—which suggests that the Black Muslim leaders are being astute. If there is one thing that will puncture the balloon of a charismatic ideology, it is such abrasive revelations as just where the leader is heading. For the moment Muhammad is holding out the vision of the promised land without distributing any road maps.

Whether the Black Muslims are an authentic part of Islam is a matter of debate. Certain Arab scholars have expressed negative opinions on the question. But Elijah Muhammad has been to Mecca, his son is now enrolled in a Moslem university in Cairo, and the Black Muslims do read the Koran and observe Moslem fasts and prayers. Malcolm X was eloquent as he described how, as a convict in a Massachusetts prison, he first learned about Elijah Muhammad, and how his life was changed so that he no longer indulged in his old vices of drinking, smoking, whoring, stealing and violence. "I went only as far as the eighth grade. Everything I know beyond that," he said reverently, "Mr. Muhammad taught me."

Christians would do well to mark one thing: the Black Muslims claim to have done more and better rehabilitation work among Negro prisoners than all the social agencies, psychiatrists and Christian ministers and priests combined. The claim is attested to by independent witnesses who state that the Muslims succeed in reaching and reforming dregs of humanity who were considered hopeless by everyone else. And the Black Muslim movement, even at its most hate-filled, antiwhite, anti-Semitic rallies, is strictly law abiding. Muslims are forbidden to smoke, drink, indulge in excessive sensuality, or break the law in any way, and there is reason to believe that they live up to this strict standard. Recidivism among former convicts who become Muslims is extremely rare.

Fanaticism Tempered by Opportunism

Yet the impression Malcolm X left on six admittedly skeptical newsmen was not that of the pure fanatic devoted at all costs to his suffering people. Fanatic he certainly is, and his words stir thousands of Negroes, but there is also in the man a hunger for power coupled with a demagogic opportunism. On the one hand, he spoke of his complete absorption in the Muslim religion as the turning point of his life. On the other, he remarked shrewdly that it was very difficult for the F.B.I. or the congressional investigating committees to unduly harass a religious body.

Malcolm X seemed disconcerted only when he was asked whether Muhammad fosters race hatred. But he quickly recovered his assurance. The Black Muslims, he explained, do not preach hatred (the claim is not true; they certainly do preach hatred if there is any meaning in words). Gesturing toward a young Negro student accompanying him, he asserted: "If I tell him that you have robbed him and beaten him and stolen his self-respect and broken his legs, I'm only telling him what you've actually done to him. That's not the same as preaching hatred."

Another mark of the man's technique is his habit of imputing base motives to others. Negro leaders who oppose the Muslims are "Uncle Toms" eager to curry favor with the white man. James Baldwin's name drew a snort of contempt. "James Baldwin can't afford to come out openly for us; if he did, he wouldn't be the darling of Harper's and the white liberals any more." This low blow makes a double insinuation against Baldwin: first, that he secretly is allied with the Muslims; second, that he is too much of a toady to come out openly for them. The late Senator McCarthy could have learned from Malcolm X.

Challenge to Christianity

In retrospect I find it hard to believe that any large segment of the American Negro community will follow the Muslim vision for any great distance. The promised land of an independent Negro state is a chimera. The Muslim theological indictment of the collective white man for demoralizing the collective Negro is neurotic nonsense.

But at the same time, and without pretending to be an expert on the subject of Negro thinking, I must say that I fear that the mood projected by Malcolm X is already becoming a part of the Negro consciousness. A Negro may see the absurdity in the claims of the new Black Islam, but Malcolm X touches a responsive chord in his heart as he describes in painful detail the bitter hopelessness of life under the present dispensation of N.A.A.C.P. servility and "white power structure" ruthlessness. After three centuries of living with the white man, he tells his Negro audiences, the only thing a Negro owns are his churches. According to Alan Lomax, a sensitive observer of the Negro scene, a wave of disaffection with Christianity is sweeping the Negro ghettos.

It is a supreme irony that the new black proletariat spawned in the slums of America should now be looking for succor to the fighting faith that mortally challenged Christianity in eastern Europe centuries ago. One wonders if modern Christianity has the vigor needed to meet the new challenge of Black Islam.

But one need not wax apocalyptic to recognize that at the very least the Black Muslims are proof that Negro patience is not inexhaustible. The Muslims' bitter feeling of alienation from American life is shared at least in part by most American Negroes. If the dangerous sparks of black racism being thrown off continually by Malcolm X should ever start a real conflagration among one-tenth of our citizens, our past racial troubles will seem like child's play.

The Activist Fall 1963

The Question of Violence: The Black Muslims

by Ethan Geto

Resist. Imp. Negro

"We are never aggressors. We will not attack anyone...BUT --- we teach our people that if anyone attacks you, lay down your life!"(1) Thus Minister Malcolm X of Muslim Temple #7 (in Harlem) addressed a Muslim rally. Islam preaches a doctrine of peace. Yet the Muslims believe in "justified" retaliation. They insist that they will never initiate violence, but will, under all circumstances, retaliate against white aggression. Most editions of "Muhammad Speaks", the Muslims' weekly newspaper, admonish Negro men to protect their women from the inevitable assaults of white men,and in general to be physically prepared to combat the white enemy. A special "Extra" edition boasts a blazing red headline: "SEVEN UNARMED NEGROES SHOT IN COLD BLOOD BY LOS ANGELES POLICE"; the front page photo shows police with rifles standing over the bodies of several Negroes. (2) So long as white brutality persists it becomes more difficult to intellectually refute the Muslims' emotional appeals.

The Fruit of Islam, a para-military organization, was established to protect the Muslim brotherhood from physical attack by hostile individuals, or, as the Muslims expect, by the police. Fruit of Islam (FOI) candidates are enrolled in a rigorous course of physical conditioning and in the use of weapons. FOI members guard famous Muslim personalities, and Muslim property. They have not been utilized as an aggressive strike force against the white community -- and as many critics have added,"yet". But it is important to remind oneself that violence originating from the Negro community need not be triggered by the Muslims. James Farmer, director of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), speculated about just such possibilities: "There is a real danger of violence...if it should break out, God forbid, I think it may well be directed against the merchants in Harlem and against landlords and their rent collectors."(3) Mass reprisal may be influenced by black nationalist agitation, but would be largely the spontaneous result of the deep and long-term dissatisfaction of the American Negro.

The Muslims have not specifically stated that violence is a necessary precondition to their "liberation" -- they do feel that violence will be a prominent factor in the destiny of the white race, but a superhuman violence inflicted by divine sources. The Muslims forecast a Battle of Armageddon in which the whites will be destroyed, and only the Black Race (4) will survive.Allah "declared the doom of America for her evils (against) Black Men." (5) This doctrine is sometimes interpreted as a covert threat on the part of the Muslims to one day wage a fanatic "Holy War" against whites. The Muslims ask that, since the white race is soom to be destroyed, "Why integrate with a dying world?" (6)

It is informative to examine the theory of the origination of the white "race" as put forth by the Muslims: The white race was created by an ancient named Yakub, "a black scientist in rebellion against Allah. (7) Yakub, by means of a 600 year-long human breeding experiment, created the white race (6,647 years ago). "In grafting out his creatures' color, Yakub grafted out their very humanity." (8) The theory goes on to state that "these devils were given six thousand years to rule. The alloted span of their rule was ended in 1914, coinciding with a major conflagration involving all of the white western nations; and further, that the seventy-year grace period, beginning in 1914, will terminate in 1984 -- again "coincidental" concurrence with a symbolic year.

A more realistic interpretation of this doctrine (of Armeddon) is one which the Muslims have often set forth in their publications: Because the white race has an immense capacity for devilish hostility, and posesses weapons capable of destroying the world,once Negroes have isolated themselves from white society, the whites will turn on one another and liquidate their race, man by man, nation by nation. The Black Men of the world are impatiently waiting for their brothers in America to separate from the whites, so that Allah may finally obliterate the white race.

Day-to-day Muslim hostility usually occurs in dramatic, yet relatively non-violent ways. A New York newspaper recently reported an incident presumably involving Muslims ("presumably," as many papers are apt to blame the Muslims for any Negro aggressions): "MUSLIMS TOSS EGGS AT KING," reads the headline; Dr. Martin Luther King was egged by Black Muslims last night when he appeared to address 2,000 persons in Salem Methodist Church (in Harlem) ...when his auto approached the church eggs were thrown by some in a crowd of 500 outside. Another egg hit King on an elbow as he went into the church...King said: 'I cannot understand what my colored brothers have against me. I have become accustomed to white mobs in Mississippi and Alabama but I have not yet adjusted myself to what I just experienced here in Harlem.'" (10)

The Philosophy of Non-Violence

Passive resistance, according to Martin Luther King, "is passive physically, but strongly active spiritually. It is not passive nonresistence to evil."(11) No one in Twentieth Century America until Dr. King has mobilized this doctrine into a dynamic, popular force, perhaps capable of achieving great progress.

The American foundation of nonviolence is Christianity. "Any religion that professes to be with the souls of men and is not concerned with the slums that damn them, the economic conditions that strangle them, and the social conditions that cripple them is a dry-as-dust religion.(12) Nonviolence, like the Muslim movement, professes a religious basis. In a direct refutation of the Muslim philosophy, Dr. King states: "God is not interested merely in the freedom of black men, and brown men, and yellow men; God is interested in the freedom of the whole human race."(13)

A student who has participated in freedom rides places the Christian basis of nonviolence into a more understandable perspective when he observes, "Make no mistake, it is not particularly easy to love your 'enemy' -- especially when he has his foot on your throat! But in the life and teachings of Jesus there is no reference to the fact that the way of the cross was an easy way."(14)

Dr. King had not advocated nonviolence merely because it conforms to Christian doctrine, nor because it is supposedly ethical, moral,and civilized. Although a cleric, Dr. King is an individual who has assumed the earthly leadership of an oppressed people. Therefore, his doctrine must encompass what he feels to be a pragmatic militancy within a broad theological framework. Dr. King apparently believes that the nonviolent method is the best method; and that the subsequent outcome will be the best one for the American Negro. "Violence...is impractical because it is a descending spiral ending in destruction for all. The old law of an eye for an eye leaves everybody blind, (and)it is immoral because it seeks to humiliate the opponent rather than win his understanding...it creates bitterness in the survivors and brutality in the destroyers." (15)

The NAACP and the Urban League certainly do not fall under the classification of "violent organizations". Yet, on the other hand, they have not yet joined the ranks of the new passive resistance movement.

Although the work of the NAACP and the Urban League has surely been commendable, today many Negroes feel that these established organizations are not acting with the vitality necessary to extinguish racial discrimination. "The precise legalism of the NAACP, while gaining spectacular courtroom results, has made relatively little practical headway.(16) A further observation is that "the sit-ins and freedom rides have relieved more common indignities for more common people in two years than legislation has accomplished in a quarter of a century."(17) Many Negroes believe that the leaders of an organization such as the NA ACP, being successful, entrenched professionals, are actually serving as a conservative rather than a progressive force. Because NAACP leaders have themselves gained social status within white society, and because they value theircareers,they are not willing to risk all that they have gained as individuals.Students complain that the leaders of the NAACP must suffer the indignities inflicted upon those Negroes who are active participants in the mass movements. The NAACP has made vigorous efforts to meet this charge, but not without dissent within the organization. The traditional NAACP position was advocated with great force at the recent NAACP convention by James Meredith; it is a sign of the times that Meredith was opposed by national secretary Roy Wilkins.

Muslim attacks on the philosophy of non-violence are predictable and vociferous. For organizations like the NAACP the Muslims have more than contempt: they charge that it is controlled by the whites on its executive councils. Muslim racism and opposition to cooperation does make distinctions between whites -- some of the enemy race are more dangerous. Muslim racism and nationalism takes the form of all secular "religions" based on race: it becomes anti-semitic. (George Lincoln Rockwell spoke at the Muslim's February 1962 convention.) And, in Muslim eyes, it is the Jews who control the NAACP.(18)

The Appeal of the Black Muslims

When a man is accepted as a member of a Muslim Temple, he is assigned the name "X" in place of his family name. When a Muslim has proven his worth as a servant of Allah, his "X" name is replaced by an Arabic name bestowed on him by Muslim elders. The letter "X" seems to be an anonymous, mysterious symbol with no special significance. Yet the Muslims offer an intriguing explanation: "The symbol X has a double meaning: implying 'ex', it signifies that the Muslim is no longer what he was; and as 'X' it signifies an unknown quality or quantity. It at once repudiates the white man's name and announces the rebirth of the Black Man, endowed with a set of qualities the white man does not know."(19)

The Negro, according to one source, is "grateful for a mystique, especially one dignified as a religion, that rationalizes his resentment and hatred as spiritual values in a cosmic war of good against evil."(20) Christ is supposed to have been a Muslim prophet -- thus the Muslims downgrade Christ's status, yet at the same time transform him into both a black man and a servant of Allah. An attack on the religion which most American Negroes presently embrace is a logical strategy of the Black Muslims. "The Christian religion was and is the master strategem for keeping the so-called Negro (21) enslaved. The whites gave him the 'poisoned book'...which teaches him to love his oppressor ."(22) The Muslims continually deride the hypocrisy of American Christians, as well as denouncing Christians throughout the world as being morally reprehensible. Specific reference to the horrendous World Wars and the colonielism which white Christians initiated are often made. The Muslim attack on Christianity, though, implies "a strong, though disillusioned, Muslim respect for Christian ideals,(23) for they are continually measuring the shortcomings of Americans against their Christian philosophy.

The Muslims attempt to create an atmosphere of security and identity for the individual Negro. The Muslims present "an explicit rejection of the symbols of the 'alien' white culture, balanced by an exaggerated and undiluted pride in 'black' culture."(24) The Muslims realize that the Negro is painfully conditioned to reject fellow Negroes (and by extension, himself), and to glorify all that is white.(25) But the Muslims offer a psychological retreat by extolling the Black Man,and encouraging race pride. The Black Muslims claim that they reveal the true past of the Negro people,which they (as well as other Negro groups) feel has been purposefully ommitted from American history textbooks and other historical sources. "When the Negro learns the truth about himself he will be proud to associate with his own kind."(26)

Certain observers, although largely opposed to many of the Muslims' goals, feel that the Muslims are actually serving a vital purpose at this moment in the history of American race relations. Omar A. Ahmed, a believer in Islam (although not a member of the Black Muslims), expressed this point of view: "For years the Negro has been told that he is equal. It is obvious that this indoctrination has neither made the Negro feel equal psychologically, nor made him equal in reality. It is time that the Negro be told that he is a superior human being, and this grasping for something higher than equality will actually raise the Negro up to a true feeling of equality with the white man."

The Muslims have avidly followed the growth of the new African states. "The Muslims...count themselves a part of the growing alliance of non-white peoples,which they expect eventually to innundate the white race, washing away the hated supremacy that that race has so long enjoyed."(27)

The Black Muslims' Political and Social Programs

The Muslims propose separation from white American society, and withdrawal into a Negro-ruled,Negro-populated society, in which Negroes would manage their own industries and would be wholly independent of the white man. "We Must Have Some Of This Earth," reads a headline of an edition (28) of "Muhammad Speaks." The pages of this issue are replete with the Muslims' demands for a country of their own. "If they won't give us justice, then let us separate ourselves from them and live in four or five states."(29) At first, these programs strike even the most impersonal observer as being blatantly ludicrous. Nevertheless, if one substitutes oneself for a resident of a Negro Ghetto, the concepts of "A Land Of Our Own" becomes more plausible -- for after all, the average American Negro today dwells within a "land of his own", segregated from the white community, compressed into slums, and surrounded by a hostile white culture.

The Muslims propose that the Negro must establish, once having obtained his own land, an entirely self-sufficient economy. Only under such conditions can the Negro really be "free", according to the Muslims. A cartoon in "Muhammad Speaks" portrays President Kennedy holding Thurgood Marshall (30) in his hands and saying, "Certainly you're equal to me, Thurgood! Who cares about your not having any land of your own, nor any factories or diesel trains....Who cares that I'm the maker of your Cadillacs, TV,movies, chewing gum, false teeth,matches, toothpicks, your toilet paper.... Just because you're too lazy to provide your own folk with even a few of life's necessities....YOUR'RE STILL MY EQUAL....ALLRIGHT,BOY??" The above irony might be directly translated into the Muslims' dream of economic power.

At the present, the Muslims are conducting a vigorous campaign to reform the morals of the Negro community, and combat the cynicism impressed upon them by whites. Alcoholism, dope addicition, crime(especially juvenile delinquency), prostitution, gambling, and illicit sexual conduct are the prime targets of Muslim crusades. The Muslims actively recruit criminals(they do much of their recruiting in prisons), and have enjoyed enormous success in reforming these outcasts. The heir apparent to Elijih Muhammad is New York Muslim leader Malcolm X, himself reformed by the Muslims while in prison.

The Future of Race Conflict

The contrast between American ideals and American reality has always been marked, and nowhere moreso than in race relations. Up to the present, it is a testament of the power of the American promise that the Negro, despite all injustice and disappointment, has coninued to hold to it. But the time has come when that devotion is itselfin doubt.

Younger Negroes, especially, demand a resolution of the race conflict immediately. "Negroes have been told to 'wait a little longer' or 'let's not go too fast' for so long that it is ludicrous. What white men mean when they say this is 'don't push me at all'." (31) The very fact of success has created a sense of possibility and a mature recognition of opportunities for real equality: racism has become intolerable. It is an ominous fact that the appeal of Muslim ideas is so strong to the young: up to 80% of a typical congregation is between the ages of 17 and 35.(32)

In the Prophetic words of Dr. King,"If the moderates...fail to act now, history will have to record that the greatest tragedy of this period of social transition was not the strident clamor of the bad...,but the appalling silence of the good people."(33)

---

Footnotes

1) C, Eric Lincoln, The Black Muslims in America, Beacon Press, Boston, 1961; page 4
2) "Muhammad Speaks", August, 1962.
3) "Jet", Vol. 24, #11, July 4, 1963; page 30
4) The Black Race includes everyone who is not Caucasian: thus Arabs, Chinese, etc., are black.
5) op. cit., Lincoln; page 74
6) ibid., page 89
7) ibid., page 76
8) ibid., page 77
9) loc. cit, page 77
10) The NY Daily News, July 1, 1963, page 10
11) Martin Luther King, Jr., Stride Toward Freedom, Ballantine Books, NYC, 1958; page 82
12) ibid., page 28, 29
13) ibid., page 180
14) Glenford E. Mitchell and William H. Peace III, The Angry Black South, Corinth Books, NY, 1962; page 228
15) op.cit., King; page 173, 174
16) Louis Lomax, The Negro Revolt, Signet Books,1962; page 112
17) ibid., page 127
18) Contrary to popular belief, the Muslims seem not to be any more anti-Semitic than they are anti-Christian.
19) op.cit., Lincoln; page 110
20) ibid., page 48, 49
21) The Muslims object to the word "Negro", noting that whites are not referred to as "Caucasians" but as "white people." The Muslims prefer that the Negro be termed "Black Man," When using the word "Negro", Muslims prefix it with "so-called".
22) op.cit, Lincoln, page 78
23) ibid., page 248

24) ibid., page 44
25) The concept of whiteness as good and blackness as evil is a recognizable part of Western, if not universal, culture.
26) op.cit., Lincoln; page 174
27) ibid., page 27
28) "Muhammad Speaks"; page 3 (April, 1962)
29) op.cit, Lincoln, page 95
30) Former head of the NAACP Legal Defense and Education fund; a negro
31) op.cit., Mitchell and Peace, page 44
32) op.cit., Lincoln, page 22
33) op.cit., King, pahe 164

JULES FEIFFER

-- reprinted from the village voice with special permission from jules feiffer --

Resistance Groups - Negro

UPI A21N AJ

NIGHT LEAD MUSLIMS

RIVHMOND, VA., AUG. 1 (UPI)--A FEDERAL COURT REJECTED AN APPEAL TODAY BY 21 JAILED BLACK MUSLIMS WHO WANTED PORK-FREE PRISON MEALS SERVED IN THE DARKNESS--AT AN HOUR WHEN IT WAS IMPOSSIBLE TO DISTINGUISH WHITE THREAD FROM BLACK.

THE CASE WAS HEARD BY THE U. S. FOURTH CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, WHICH UPHELD A LOWER COURT'S DECISION REFUSING TO ORDER OFFICIALS OF THE LORTON, VA., FEDERAL REFORMATORY TO SERVE SUCH MEALS.

MUSLIM MINISTER JAMES 15X C. (CQ) WHITE, AN INMATE, FIRST TOOK THE CASE BEFORE U. S. DISTRICT JUDGE OREN R. LEWIS LAST DECEMBER--THE MONTH THAT MUSLIMS FAST DURING DAYLIGHT HOURS.

THE MINISTER EXPLAINED THAT MUSLIMS CONSIDER THERE IS DARKNESS ONLY WHEN IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO DISTINGUISH Q WHITE THREAD FROM A BLACK THREAD WHEN HELD SIDE BY SIDE.

MINISTER WHITE AND HIS 20 FELLOW MUSLIM INMATES, AOO SERVING TIME FOR VARIOUS CRIMES COMMITTED IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, CONCEDED PRISON OFFICIALS HAD GONE ALONG WITH THEIR REQUEST FOR A PORK-FREE DIET DURING DECEMBER OF 1962, BUT THEY CLAIMED THE EVENING MEAL WAS SERVED ONLY MINUTES AFTER OFFICIAL SUNSET.

LEWIS DISMISSED THE SUITS AS FRIVILOUS AND UNJUSTIFIED.

THE APPEALS COURT, IN UPHOLDING THE DISTRICT JUDGE TODAY, SAID IN THE MAJORITY OPINION:

--THAT THE PRISON OFFICIALS SHOULD BE COMMENDED FOR ALLOWING THE MUSLIMS TO EAT BEFORE SUNRISE AND AFTER SUNSET IN DECEMBER.

--THAT MEAL-SCHEDULING IS A MATTER OF INTERNAL PRISON ADMINISTRATION.

--THAT THE QUESTION OF AN INDIVIDUAL'S CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS WAS NOT INVOLVED.

--THAT THE MUSLIMS WERE SEEKING SPECIAL PRIVILEGES "NOT EXTENDED TO THE OTHER INMATES."

--THAT PRISONERS MAY EXPECT TO "SUFFER A LIMITATION OF MANY PRIVILEGES AND RIGHTS" BECAUSE OF THEIR STATUS AS CONVICTS.

"THE OBVIOUS WAY IN WHICH THE PLAINTIFFS MAY ASSURE THEIR RIGHT TO THE FREE AND UNFETTERED PRACTICE OF THEIR RELIGION IN ITS EVERY DETAILED TEACHING AND CUSTOM IS TO EARN THE RIGHT TO LIVE OUTSIDE THE FEDERAL PRISON," JUSTICES CLEMENT F. HAYSWORTH JR. AND HERBERT S. BORMAN SAID IN WRITING THE MAJORITY OPINION.

"IT WOULD APPEAR THAT THE PRISON AUTHORITIES ARE ENTITLED TO PLAINTIFFS' COMMENDATIONS FOR THEIR EFFORTS TO COOPERATE BUT SHOULD NOT BE SUBJECTED TO COURT INTERFERENCE WITH THE ROUTINE MANAGEMENT OF THE INSTITUTION."

S

Grace Boggs
WA 11236
Resist. Grp. Negro

LWD ✓
PW ✓
VJ ✓
PA ✓ WB ✓ ML ✓
SB ✓

NEW NORTHERN NEGRO ORGANIZATION LAUNCHED

DETROIT --- A new, militant, all-black organization, presently linking 11 northern cities in eight states, came into being Sunday night at King Solomon Baptist Church in Detroit amid electrifying addresses by Reverend Albert B. Cleage of Detroit, William Worthy of New York, and Malcolm X of the Black Muslims.

Called the Northern Negro Grass Roots Leadership Conference, this first coast-to-coast Northern black conference:

Announced support of the boycott campaign being carried on in Cleveland against Cadillac and instructed the Grass Roots Leadership Conference's (GRIC) Steering Committee to work out "ways and means of organizing a nation-wide campaign paign";

Called a "Christmas boycott against all merchants";

Authorized creation of machinery for calling national boycotts of schools to end discrimination and the use of biased textbooks;

Entered the campaign against persecution of Robert ("Negroes With Guns") Williams and Mae Mallory in the infamous Monroe, North Carolina, civil rights "kidnap" incident;

Called on members to organize units of the GOAL-sponsored International All-Trades Union of the World in their home areas;

Recognized " solidarity with the colored oppressed people of the world";

Gave "whole-hearted" backing to the Freedom-Now Party, and Announced support of the "principle of self-defense."

The self-defense resolution, read by Program Chairman Reginald Wilson of Detroit, received a resounding, four-minute, standing ovation from the 2,000 people gathered in the auditorium.

Sponsored by the Group On Advanced Leadership (GOAL), the conference-culminating rally was opened with a prayer by the Reverend Laurence Henry of Philadelphia, who married an English version of an Islamic invocation into his Christian prayer as a symbol of the "active tolerance and fraternity" now existing between GOAL, with a Christian leadership, and the Islamic Black Muslins.

Richard Henry, GOAL President, then welcomed the guests with the words: "Welcome to the revolution!"

The GRLC is a constinuing organization of individuals --- not groups --- and the GRLC members are bound to carry out GRLC resolutions through the organizations to which they already belong, and by other means. GRLC members will solicit other individual members. The membership fee is five dollars.

The next general session of the Conference will be in Chicago within six months and a constitution and permanent officers are expected to be chosen at that time. GRLC resolutions are being carried out and organizational procedures worked out by an 9 member steering committee, composed of:

James Boggs, Chairman, 3061 Field, Detroit 14, Michigan, WA 11236; Selma Sparks, Executive Vice Chairman, 499 Park Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., MA 22564; James M. Russell, Exeutive Vice Chairman, 14715 Darwin Ave., Cleveland 10, Ohio, 761-1743; Harold Hill, Executive Vice Chairman, 7442 S. Evans, Chicago, Ill., ST 36702; Richard Thorne, Executive Vice Chairman, 2816 A. Grove St., Berkeley, Calif.; Joseph L. Constantine, Jr., 1220 N. Broadstreet, Philadelphia 30, Pa., PO 55085; Wilbur V. Grattan, Constitutional Committee Chairman, 2635 E. 48th. St., Cleveland, Ohio, EX 11029; Rosetta Fleming, 9810 S. Normal, Chicago, Ill., PR 96060; Gwendolyn Mallett, Treasurer, 3303 Sturtevant, Detroit 6, Michigan, 865-9542.

Minister Malcolm told the audience that "there is a Negro revolution and there is a black revolution." The Black Revolution, he said, was concerned with completely changing the Negro's position in this country; the "Negro revolution" he said, was concerned with eating at lunch counters and going to the toilet with white people. He promised support of black political candidates who are not Uncle Toms.

He said the Muslims would permit no betrayal.

Reverend Cleage called for support of the Conference's resolution and for a Negro commitment to settle for only total freedom. He denied that Christ taught the type of non-violence taught by Martin Luther King. "That is not the way," he said.

Among the papers presented at the conference was a pamphlet by Richard Henry entitled "VIOLENCE AND NON*VIOLENCE, THE THEORY OF PROPORTIONED GUERRILLA WAR." Also submitted was a pamphlet by James Boggs entitled "PAGES FROM A NEGRO WORKER'S NOTEBOOK." Another pamphlet by Henry, entitled, JOBS, was also submitted.

#######

Desist. Grp. Negro

8,000 STUDENTS HEAR MALCOLM X BLAST WHITE LIBERALS

BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA - Speaking at a capacity SLATE-sponsored Rally at the University of California's Dwinelle Plaza, Minister Malcolm X, national representative of Messenger Elijah Muhammad leader of the Muslims, indicted America's white liberals for their hypocrisy and named them the real criminals in the oppression and exploitation of the Negro.

He warned his listeners that America stands in danger of exploding into a bloody race war. Malcolm X said, "white liberals in the North make a lot of noise over what's happening in the south, this is designed to keep the Negroes' mind closed to what's really going on in the North."

White liberals were blamed for building the vicious trap of ignorance, poverty, disease and death, which surrounds and eventually ensnares all Negroes.

Malcolm X said, "white liberals urge the Negroes to move into white neighborhoods and go to white schools, knowing full well that when they do, the whites will evacuate the neighborhood and the school as though the Negro is contaminated. These same whites will move to the suburbs, and set up another lily-white community, leaving the Negro living in a newly formed ghetto.

Because these formerly white owned houses are sold to Negroes (by white liberals) at exorbitant prices, the Negro has to take roomers into his home to help make the payments. The resulting crowded conditions stop all opportunities for Negroes to live peaceful, clean, decent and moral lives," he said.

Under such conditions the only provider many Negro children know is the white welfare worker. He added, "Many of them think of him as their father and in many cases this is true."

Levelling his sharp tongue and wit at the integrationists' efforts, and claiming there is no real integration anywhere, only miserable failures in attempts to integrate schools and housing, Malcolm X decalred, "As long as the integration happy Negroes were clamoring for the white man's schools and houses, the whites could always move out to the suburbs and saart their "separated white communities" all over again, now the Negro leaders are demanding white men's jobs. And white men can't move to the suburbs and create new jobs for themselves, so the Negro demands for jobs must lead to violence and bloodshed."

He continued, "the white should never be of the opinion that Negroes still harbor the fear of their slave-parents. Our people have lost all fear-we have ceased turning our non-violent other cheek." Mr. X quoted from the bible the Mosaic Code of 'an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth,' also, in the Holy Koran, the believer is given the right of self defense where it states, 'fight with those who fight with you." saying "Negroes will pay for freedom with their lives if need be."

Minister Malcolm likened the role of Messenger Elijah Muhammad to that of Moses, sent by God to free the Hebrew slaves from Pharoah, America as the land of bondage and the government played the role of Pharoah in his analogy.

He accused the "Catholic Administration in Washington, D.C." of playing political football with the Negro and said that the Kennedy civil rights program would turn America in to a dictatorial police state, but the Negro would still be begging for freedom.

Since integration has proven to be a failure, the only solution to America's race problem lies in complete separation, he said, "The Black people here in America must be allowed to go back to their own land and people, instead of waiting around another thousand years for the white man to have a change of heart and then solve their problems.

But the white man doesn't want the Negro to go back to his own people and his propaganda machine is at work day and night to make the Negro think that no matter how bad things are getting here in America, they are better than they would be anywhere else," Malcolm stated.

He concluded with the warning that the destiny of America and all those black people who fall for the white man's false, empty promises hangs in the balance saying "come out of her my people be not partakers of her sins neither of her plagues, flee for your lives and save yourselves!"

The Meeting was then open to questions from the audience. One of the questions was, "how will you get this land you want, and how will you get there?"

Malcolm X answered, "We had no trouble getting here." He explained how the Negro was brought to America in chains and gave 310 years of free labor to this country. In return, the Muslims believe the federal government should pay transportation and support their Nation for the next 20 to 25 years. This is classified as back-wages.

If the government does not want the Negro to return to Africa, the alternative is to set aside a part of the United States, where the Negro can set up his own Nation. He said that if the government can send foreign aid to communist countries such as Poland, Czechoslovokia and Yugoslovia, it should be glad to contribute to the establishment of a free independent nation of Black people.

When a questioner asked Mr. X what land was available that doesn't already belong to somebody. He replied, "You took this land away from the Indians, so that's no problem."

Another student asked why can't Negroes infiltrate the political machine and use the power structure to their own benefit.

Malcolm X replied that it might be possible, but that there are only two courses open to Negroes entering politics. One is to become a puppet of the white power structure; the other is to be independent and really speak for the Black people.

To be successful Negro politician support of the black masses is necessary and to get the support of black people, one must speak in terms the black man can understand, he said. And a politician who manages to do so is immediately "condemned by whites as an extremist, racist and hate teacher."

-30-

Negro Student Shot In Nashville Riot

RIOTS

AC 4/10/67

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP)—A Negro college student was shot through the neck Sunday night as racial violence crackled like a brushfire across a 30-block section of Tennessee's capital city.

Calvin Conners, 19, was shot when police exchanged gunfire with a crowd of 300 rioters at predominantly Negro Tennessee A&I University. He was the second shooting victim in two nights of rioting that had spread from two other predominantly Negro schools, Fisk University and Meharry College.

Conners was admitted to Hubbard Hospital in undertermined condition.

At least 15 persons were injured and 40 arrested in the two nights of racial trouble that started when police arrested a young Negro near Fisk and charged him with disorderly conduct.

Roving band of Negroes roamed the streets like guerrilla units, throwing bricks and stones, looting shops and starting fires.

At least two Molotov cocktails were thrown. One burst into flames and badly damaged a small store, but police snuffed

Continued on Page 20, Col. 1

★★

Negro Student Shot in Riot As Nashville Police Fire Back

Continued from Page 1

out the other, tossed into an oil company office.

Police shot back, but Assistant Chief Donald Barton insisted they aimed their guns high into the air.

Stone said between 100 and 150 shots were fired as the students laid siege to the police positions for 20 minutes.

The battle ended, Barton said, when police withdrew shortly after debating whether to move huge spotlights onto the Tennessee A&I campus, where the trouble had spread from Fisk University and Meharry College.

Police withdrew to dark vantage points and kept watch on the milling students who were difficult to spot as they darted from spot to spot on a tree-dotted field near the gymnasium.

The trouble erupted suddenly when a mob of students gathered at Tennessee A&I, a state university located about one mile from Fisk and Meharry, where rioting broke out earlier in the day.

Shortly before the gunfire, a police officr at A&I reported "They're throwing bricks at everything that moves."

Moments later, shots rang out from a mob of about 300 young Negroes. Fifty riot policemen were at the scene and some of them began returning the fire.

From other sections of the embattled 30-block trouble area came reports of sporadic trouble. A Molotov cocktail was hurled through the window of a small store, starting a fire that caused heavy damage to the shop. Five bullet holes were found in the windshield of a parked car at Fisk.

Both police and Negro bands of troublemakers moved like guerrilla units through the predominantly Negro trouble area. Nine riot squads patrolling the area were sporadically hit by flying bricks and stones thrown by Negroes lurking behind bushes, trees and fences.

When small trouble developed, police moved in swiftly in an effort to keep the roving bands to a minimum. Police said five persons were arrested at the Fisk campus, but there were no immediate details.

The roving bands of Negroes stoned cars and broke windows. Gunfire broke at least one windshield, but the driver was not hurt.

 4/10/67 RIOTS

Associated Press Wirephoto

HELMETED NASHVILLE POLICE SURROUND SNCC LEADERS ARRESTED IN RIOT
Suspects Identified as Ernest Stephens, in Sweater, and George Washington Ware, in Plaid Shirt

Atlantan Charged In Nashville Riot

NASHVILLE, Tenn., April 10 (AP)—A light rain and sunlight brought an apparent end early Monday to Nashville's second straight night of racial violence in the city's Negro college section.

Gunshots, fires and looting erupted overnight, continuing into the early hours Monday morning—and left one student seriously wounded. But the dawn—coupled with so many arrests that police officials said they were uncertain of the number—apparently brought the Sunday night strife to an end.

Police charged two Negroes with inciting a riot. They were identified, as George Washington Ware, 26, of Atlanta and Ernest Stephens, 25, of Tuskegee, Ala., and were held under $2,500 bond each early today.

Ware told police he was with "black power" advocate Stokely Carmichael here Saturday. Stephens said he was a worker for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, headed by Carmichael.

The charges stemmed from riots which erupted Saturday night — a few hours after Carmichael spoke at a symposium at predominantly white Vanderbilt University. The violence was triggered when police ejected a Negro from a Negro tavern at the owner's request. Police said Carmichael was not seen in the area of the rioting.

One Negro college student was shot in the neck Sunday night and hospitalized as Negro rioters fired at police, stoned passing cars and roamed the streets between the campuses of predominantly Negro Fisk and Tennessee State universities a mile apart.

Most charges ranged from disorderly conduct to unauthorized possession and transportation of explosives. Four white men arrested had a shotgun and a pistol in their possession. Police arrested six men and a woman at a house where officers said they found some Molotov cocktails.

Three businesses, one owned by a white man, were set afire by Molotov cocktails, police said, and one vacant house and several trucks caught fire. Rocks were thrown at fire engines en route to the blazes, which were extinguished quickly.

At a food store, several Negroes fled under a hail of police bullets after a window was broken.

Hospitals reported many persons injured by rocks and bottles thrown from behind bushes, trees and stone walls.

Helmeted riot police patrolled the area during the night and at the Tennessee State campus, where officers attempted to disperse a growing crowd, shots rang out for 20 minutes.

Police said the shooting began when they fired into the air as a warning. Officers said the gunfire was returned from the campus and bullets struck a rock wall behind which police had taken cover.

Lindsay Puts Life Ahead of Property In Curbing Looters

RIOTS NYT 7/17/64

By RICHARD REEVES

Mayor Lindsay summed up the city's philosophy and strategy of dealing with racial violence yesterday in these words:

"We happen to think that protection of life, particularly innocent life, is more important than protecting property or anything else. ...We are not going to turn disorder into chaos through the unprincipled use of armed force. In short, we are not going to shoot children in New York City."

The Mayor contrasted his thinking with the orders of Mayor Richard J. Daley of Chicago to shoot rioters—orders that were also criticized yesterday by Gov. Richard J. Hughes of New Jersey and former Mayor Robert F. Wagner.

Mr. Lindsay was showered with questions about the orders to Chicago police during a City Hall news conference. Mayor Daley had an-

Continued on Page 29, Column 2

NEGROES CRITICIZE DALEY RIOT ORDER

But Aide Says Majority of Telegrams Support Mayor

Special to The New York Times

CHICAGO, April 16—Many Negro leaders were sharply critical today of Mayor Richard J. Daley's orders to the police yesterday to shoot arsonists and looters in any future rioting.

Criticism came from spokesman for some organizations concerned with civil rights and improving race relations. There was also, however, some strong support for Mr. Daley's position. The views were expressed in interviews and in prepared statements.

One of Mr. Daley's aides said he had scanned more than 200 telegrams received by the Mayor and found that the majority of senders had praised the Mayors stand.

At his news conference yesterday, Mr. Daley said he had ordered that policemen be instructed to "shoot to kill" arsonists and to "shoot to maim or cripple" looters when necessary to arrest them.

In rioting that reached its peak the weekend of April 5-7, more than 200 buildings were destroyed or badly damaged here with loss estimated by insurers at $9-million. At least seven persons were killed, several hundred were injured, and about 3,000 persons were arrested.

Five thousand Federal troops and 6,700 Illinois National Guardsmen were called in to help restore order.

Order Called Biased

Today, Robert Lucas, chairman of the Chicago Chapter of the Congress on Racial Equality said that Mr. Daley was giving a "racist" police department full power to be judge, jury and executioner. He said the orders were obviously aimed if Mr. Daley's "shoot" orders were carried out they would be effective.

Stern Action Asked

ST. LOUIS, April 16 (UPI)—Mayor Alfonso J. Cervantes said in a state of the city message today that "this is no time

Lindsay Puts Life Before Goods in Curbing Looters

Continued From Page 1, Col. 2

nounced on Monday that he had ordered Chicago police to "shoot to kill" arsonists and "shoot to maim or cripple" looters.

The Chicago Mayor had added that he did not want children shot, but suggested that his police use the temporarily disabling chemical spray, Mace, on young looters. But Mr. Lindsay, who said he was against using Mace on looters, sai dMr. Daley's orders "may come down to shooting children."

Thumping with his right hand a copy of the report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, Mr. Lindsay said:

"If you take the trouble to read this, you'll find out why it may come down to shooting children."

Mr. Lindsay rejected charges by some merchants that city police were "soft" on looters in Harlem and Bedford-Stuyvesant in the nights following the murder of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

Citing his experience as vice chairman of the civil disorders commission, the Mayor said:

"The Federal Bureau of Investigation cautioned against overresponding to disturbances. There were incidents last summer when persons thought to be looters were killed, but it turned out upon later investigation that they were not looters."

Mr. Lindsay then dismissed as "simply not true" charges by merchants that he was minimizing the damage caused by looters and arsonists. He said the city had made no estimates and was stil gathering information on how much damage was done during the violence after Dr. King's death.

The Mayor announced that he had directed Richard Lewisohn, administrator of the city's Commerce Administration, to "work with any businessman who has had damage done to his store."

"We're doing everything we can to assist those businessmen," he said, "although we don't have any legal obligation or legal power in that area."

Redress Is Considered

City officials, he continued, are conferring with banks, insurance companies and the Federal Small Business Administration to determine what aid is available for merchants who lost property because of looting or arson.

Mr. Lindsay repeated yesterday that he believed the Federal riot commission should reconvene immediately because of the racial violence that erupted in more than 100 cities after Dr. King's death. But he said there was no basic disagreement between himself and Gov. Otto Kerner of Illinois, the commission's chairman, who has said that he sees no need for an emergency meeting.

"It's a question of timing," the Mayor said when asked about the confusion that followed his announcement last week that Mr. Kerner had agreed to an emergency meeting. "The chairman didn't say the commission would not meet at any time."

The Republican Mayor's criticism of Mayor Daley of Chicago, a Democrat, coincided with the comments from two prominent Democrats, Governo Hughes and Mr. Wagner.

While Mr. Hughes discussed 'the sanctity of human life" at a Tenton news conference, Mr. Wagner told New York reporters he wuld "perhaps handle it differently."

"I have a high regard for Dick Daley," the former Mayor said, "but I think to persuade and try to keep things from getting out of hand is perhaps the best way to handle it .. . I don't lean to Lindsay's philosophy but to my own."

In discussing the charges made by merchants in areas here hit by violence, Mr. Lindsay said he believed those making the charges were trying to put pressure on the Small Business Administration to provide" disaster" aid.

"We have consulted with the Administration," the Mayor said, "they don't regard any part of New York City as a disaster area."

Hughes's Statement

By RONALD SULLIVAN

Special to The New York Times

TRENTON, April 16—Governor Hughes said today that he was opposed to the outright shooting of looters and arsonists in a riot.

"My own judgment," the Governor told the New Jersey Conference of Mayors, "is that the sanctity of human life is such that an intelligent response by the police will result in arrests rather than shootings."

"In the atmosphere of fever and carelessness, indiscriminate shooting often results in the killing of the police and innocent people," the Governor said.

Governor Hughes, who gained nationwide attention last July by his initial get-tough attitude against rioting in Newark, contended today in a speech at the War Memorial Building near the State House that massive police action — and not shooting — was the best weapon against rioting.

The Governor said also that massive police force should be backed up by "very stern sentencing" by the courts.

The Governor apparently was influenced himself by the February report of his select commission on civil disorder which condemned the indiscriminate shooting by law enforcement forces in Newark.

The Democratic Governor appeared today before almost 200 mayors to seek support for the special urban aid program that he will propose to the Legislature next week. Last week, during a tour of a Trenton neighborhood that was hit by looting and fires, the Governor said he planned to recommend that the state assume most of the local costs of public welfare programs.

The Governor refused to give any specific details today except to say that an outright take-over of local costs by the state would exceed $100-million a year. He said that New Jersey local property taxes, which are the third highest per capita of any state in the nation, could no longer adequately finance local schools.

Mr. Hughes is understood to be giving serious consideration to a variety of tax programs, including the possibility of increasing the current 3 per cent state sales tax, or proposing a state income tax. The overwhelming Republican majorities in both houses of the Legislature have generally reacted coolly to the possibility of any major tax increase.

structed to "shoot to kill" arsonists and to "shoot to maim or cripple" looters when necessary to arrest them.

In rioting that reached its peak the weekend of April 5-7, more than 200 buildings were destroyed or badly damaged here with loss estimated by insurers at $9-million. At least seven persons were killed, several hundred were injured, and about 3,000 persons were arrested.

Five thousand Federal troops and 6,700 Illinois National Guardsmen were called in to help restore order.

Order Called Biased

Today, Robert Lucas, chairman of the Chicago Chapter of the Congress on Racial Equality said that Mr. Daley was giving a "racist" police department full power to be judge, jury and executioner. He said the orders were obviously aimed at Negroes.

Sydney H. Finley, regional director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, said the orders would bring "massive frustration in the black communities" and tend to separate further the black and white societies.

Jerome J. Friedman, a member of the Chicago Commission of Human Relations, a city government agency, said reports from the commission's staff indicated that the police had done a creditable job during the recent disorders.

Mr. Friedman added, "I do not believe in extreme or drastic measures except to prevent loss of life."

William H. Robinson, a Negro who is Cook County Public Aid Director, praised the police for restraint during the rioting.

He terms Mr. Daley's orders too harsh. Under these orders, he said, policemen would be "regarded as potential killers, and relations between police and the community then may become further irritated."

No Kerner Comment

At a news conference in Springfield, Gov. Otto Kerner of Illinois, who headed the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, sidestepped questions regarding Mr. Daley's orders. He said he was not in position to comment and would not attempt to tell the Mayor how to run the city.

Governor Kerner said he did not know whether such shooting would lead to more rioting or what effect Mr. Daley's announcement would have on the Negro community. The Kerner commission had urged that police not "over-react" in disorders.

Police Supt. James B. Conlisk, who late yesterday issued instructions to policemen in accordance with Mr. Daley's orders, canceled his scheduled weekly news conference today.

But his predecessor, Orlando W. Wilson, of Poway, Calif., who retired last July after seven years as superintendent, said in a telephone interview that vestigation cautioned against overresponding to disturbances. There were incidents last summer when persons thought to be looters were killed, but it turned out upon later investigation that they were not looters."

Mr. Lindsay then dismissed as "simply not true" charges by merchants that he was minimizing the damage caused by looters and arsonists. He said the city had made no estimates and was stil gathering information on how much damage was done during the violence after Dr. King's death.

if Mr. Daley's "shoot" orders were carried out they would be effective.

Stern Action Asked

ST. LOUIS, April 16 (UPI)—Mayor Alfonso J. Cervantes said in a state of the city message today that "this is no time to treat confirmed criminals with kid gloves."

"The time has come to not only respect the civil rights of those accused of crime but also to deal sternly with those who are found guilty," he said.

Fund for Land Purchase In Indiana Dunes Granted

WASHINGTON, April 16 (UPI)—Congress has given $2-million to the Interior Department for emergency land purchases within the boundaries of the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore.

Senator Birch Bayh and Representative J. Edward Rouch, Indiana Democrats, announced today the approval of the Senate and House Interior Appropriations subcommittees, the only move necessary to release the funds to the department.

The National Park Service, which requested the funds, will use $755,000 to buy land in the west branch area where sand mining companies threatened the removal of three large sand dunes. The balance, $1,-245,000, will finance the purchase of private property in the corridor of the Indiana dunes.

week that Mr. Kerner had agreed to an emergency meeting. "The chairman didn't say the commission would not meet at any time."

The Republican Mayor's criticism of Mayor Daley of Chicago, a Democrat, coincided with the comments from two prominent Democrats, Governo Hughes and Mr. Wagner.

While Mr. Hughes discussed 'the sanctity of human life" at a Tenton news conference, Mr. Wagner told New York re-such that an intelligent response by the police will result in arrests rather than shootings."

"In the atmosphere of fever and carelessness, indiscriminate shooting often results in the killing of the police and innocent people," the Governor said.

Governor Hughes, who gained nationwide attention last July by his initial get-tough attitude against rioting in Newark, contended today in capita of any state in the nation, could no longer adequately finance local schools.

Mr. Hughes is understood to be giving serious consideration to a variety of tax programs, including the possibility of increasing the current 3 per cent state sales tax, or proposing a state income tax. The overwhelming Republican majorities in both houses of the Legislature have generally reacted coolly to the possibility of any major tax increase.

Shot Kills Texas Policeman In Riot at a Negro College

RIOTS

5/18/67

By MARTIN WALDRON

Special to The New York Times

HOUSTON, May 17—A policeman was killed and two other policemen and a student were wounded early today in an exchange of rifle fire during a five-hour riot at Texas Southern University, a predominantly Negro school.

The Houston police, assisted by sheriff's deputies, fired rifles and carbines into Lanier Hall, an L-shaped freshmen's dormitory, for almost three-quarters of an hour this morning. The officers who were hit by bullets were in a group advancing on the dormitory.

The police said shots had been fired at them from the third floor of Lanier Hall after a student rally on the campus marked by rock throwing. They said they rushed the building to seize the gunmen.

The police arrested 488 students, five of whom were charged with inciting a riot, a felony in Texas, which carries penalties of up to 40 years' imprisonment.

Some Are Released

Early tonight, some of the students had been released without being charged, but more than 450 of them were still in jail, which helped create more unrest on the campus.

Ken Fairchild, an aide to Mayor Louie Welch, said the other students would be charged or released after they had been fingerprinted, photographed and questioned.

"This is by its nature a slow process," Mr. Fairchild said.

A number of the students were being questioned by homicide detectives trying to find out who had fired the shots that struck the three police officers.

The officer who was killed

Continued on Page 46, Column 1

POLICEMAN KILLED IN A HOUSTON RIOT

Continued From Page 1, Col. 3

in the exchange of gunfire was identified as Louis Kuba, 24 years old, who had been on the force 34 days.

Students on the campus this morning said they were incensed at the damage done to the personal belongings of the students who were arrested in Lanier Hall.

The walls and ceilings of the dormitory had been ripped apart by officers looking for rifles and pistols and shotguns. They reported later that they had found one shotgun, one rifle and a pistol. Doors to the rooms of the sutdents had been chopped open with axes or locks had been shot open.

Blood was smeared on the third floor corridor of the dormitory wing that faced the police line along the street.

"The police carried out five or six as bloody as beef," siad Mrs. Mattie Harbert, the Lanier Hall house mother.

Screens on television sets had been broken. Radios were thrown against the wall and smashed. A watch on one table had been hit with some object. Clothes were torn and ripped.

The windows facing Wheeler Avenue — a thoroumghfare students have demanded that the city close — were pockmarked with dozens of bullet holes.

Mrs. Harbert, who lived in the dormitory, said "most of the students hadn't been doing anything except hiding from the bullets."

When the officers rushed the dormitory and began to arrest the students about 3:15 this morning, most of them were in pajamas or underwear.

'Made Me Lie on Floor'

"When the police broke in here they made me lie on the floor and two or three of them walked on me," Mrs. Harbert said.

Using rifle butts and nightsticks, the officers went through the dormitory systematically smashing the television sets and other objects belonging to the students, Mrs. Harbert said.

"One of them kicked in the screen of my TV set and even dropped my flower pots on the floor," she said. "I don't know what they were looking for. I guess they thought I had some pistols underneath those flowers."

Mayor Welch said this afternoon that he had ordered an investigation "to find out who did the damage" in the dormitories.

"There is a good bit of resentment over it," said one student, George A. Pierce, a psychology major.

A woman student said that the white police officers, who were joined last night by a number of Negro officers and

Mass Arrests Follow Violence on a Campus in Texas

Students being loaded into van in Houston yesterday after riot at Texas Southern

United Press International Telephoto

Patrolman Louis Kuba lies mortally wounded from gunfire

ported univresity with about 4,400 students, was the scene floor," she said. "I don't know what they were looking for. I guess they thought I had some pistols underneath those flowers."

Mayor Welch said this afternoon that he had ordered an investigation "to find out who did the damage" in the dormitories.

"There is a good bit of resentment over it," said one student, George A. Pierce, a psychology major.

A woman student said that the white police officers, who were joined last night by a number of Negro officers and Negro deputies, searched the women students this morning as they left their dormitories for classes.

"But what can you expect?" another woman student shouted. "We're nothing but niggers. To them we're just apes."

"I'm sorry there wasn't but one of them killed," said a student who identified himself as "Madison."

Root sat High School

The riot apparently had its roots in an incident at Norwood School, a junior high school, where a number of white and Negro students had been suspended for fighting. The Negro students, who were suspended for the remainder of the semester, complained that the white tudents had been suspended for only three days.

Yesterday morning, 19 Texas Southern students demonstrated utside Norwood School and were arrested for disturbing classes. In the afternoon, they were fined $1 and released after promising not to picket the school again.

Last night, in a rally on the Texas Southern campus, other students were asked to picket the Norwood school. During the rally, someone threw a watermelon at two police officers who were watching nearby.

The officers arrested a student from the group that threw the melon and said the student was wearing a pistol. The officers sent for reinforcements after the students broke up the rally and began throwing rocks at automobiles passing down Wheeler Avenue, a common occurrence during recent weeks.

Patrolman Robert G. Blaylock, 31, said that during the rock-throwing incidents, some shots were fired from Lanier Hall, one of the bullets striking him in the leg. The face of his partner, Allen D. Dugger, 32, was cut in several places by flying fragments of some object.

Wait a Block Away

About 300 policemen gathered about a block from the dormitory and waited while sutdent leaders tried to break up a group that was throwing rocks and to urge the students with rifles to turn themselves in.

After about three hours of uneasy quiet, several Negroes moved from the dormitory and set fire to some barrels of tar in Wheeler Avenue and began to erect a barricade across the avenue, using pieces of metal from a building under construction nearby.

After conferring by phone with Mayor Welch, Police Chief Herman Short ordered the police men on the scene to clean up "this damned mess."

The police then began shooting into Lanier Hall with rifls and carebines. An Associated Press reporter on the scene, Larry Lee, estimated that the polic fired 2,000 eor more shots. One student, identified as Morris English, 22, was wounded in the back. The firing lasted 40 minutes before police rushed the building to arrest the students, Mr. Lee said.

Th poliece said Mr. Kuba apparently received his fatal wounds during the rush to the dormitory.

Texas Southern, a state-supported univresity with about 4,400 students, was the scene of a number of demonstrations this spring. In April, about 100 students boycotted classes for sveeral days after the university administration said that Stokley Charmichael, black power advocate, would not be allowed to speak on campus.

Mr. Carmichael later spoke at the school and at the Univrsity of Houston, a predominantly white univrsiety several bolocks from Texas Southern.

Students on campus this morning were almost unanimous in their opinion that the riot could not be classed as a "black power" movement.

"But what Carmichael told us made sense," said Mr. Pierce, the psychology major, as a larg group of students nodded in agreement. "He made us feel a new worth in ourselves, telling us that we had much to be proud of."

New Jackson Protest

JACKSON, Miss., May 17 (UPI)—Students at predominantly Negro Tougaloo College continued today to bar cars from the campus in a protest over disciplinary action against two students in connection with riots last week at Jackson State College.

A spokesman said people were allowed to walk through the gates of the campus but could not ride through.

Wisconsin Demonstration

PLATTEVILLE, Wis., May 17 (AP)—For the second consecutive night, several thousand Platteville State University students demonstrated last night against the city's 21-year minimum beer drinking age.

The demonstrators, estimated at about 2,000, swarmed through the downtown business section, and pelted police squad cars with rocks, bottles and eggs. Policemen and firemen used tear bas and sprayed the crowd with fire hoses in an attempt to break up the disturbance.

United Press International Telephoto

Patrolman Louis Kuba lies mortally wounded from gunfire

ANNUAL NATIO
of the
UNION OF ORTHO CONGREGATIONS
SUNDAY, MAY 21, 1967
Americana Hotel, N
Guest of Honor and KETHER SHEM T
ABRAHAM M. D
Recipients of UOJCA PRE
Ephraim Berliner — Mic
Teodor Braun — Sam
Donald B. Butler — Juli
Lipman S. Gerber — Dav
Irving Kaye — Ben
Abraham M. Kopelka — Har
Guest Speaker: The Hon
Governo
For information call AL
MARVIN HERSKOWITZ, Chairman
NATIONAL DINNER COMMITTEE

THE NEW YORK TIMES, FRIDAY, MAY 19, 1967

Student Links Riot on Negro Campus to Frustration and Hatred

By MARTIN WALDRON
Special to The New York Times

HOUSTON, May 18—A student leader said today that "hate" caused Tuesday night's riot at Texas Southern University, where a Houston policeman was killed and two policemen and a student were wounded by gunfire.

Frustrations at being treated as "second-class citizens" gave rise to feelings of hate that exploded, said F. D. Kirkpatrick, a graduate student in secondary education at Texas Southern and an associate of Stokely Carmichael, a leading black power advocate.

Mr. Kirkpatrick helped lead civil right demonstrations in Bogalusa, La.

The Rev. W. D. Salisbury, a Roman Catholic chaplain at the predominantly Negro university, said that the Houston police had acted out of "revenge" Tuesday night by tearing up personal belongings of the students while arresting 488 of them.

In recent weeks, city policemen have been kept off the campus by the city administration despite numerous incidents. In some cases police cars were pelted with rocks by the students.

'Hit One With Fire Ax'

It would seem that there was "fury" in the minds of the police on Tuesday night, said Father Salisbury, a chaplain at the university for eight years.

The Dean of Students, James B. Jones, said that police officers beat 20 or 25 of the students whom they arrested yesterday morning.

Frederick Hill, a 20-year-old sophomore, said that the police had struck the students in the hallway of the dormitory as they made arrests.

A member of the Houston police rescue squad told reporters last night that after he had helped rescue one of the dents] in the head with a fire ax."

"My sergeant said he liked that and asked me to lend him the ax," he remarked.

However, no student reported being struck with an ax.

City officials attempted to attribute part of the cause of the disturbance to the university administration.

Mayor Louie B. Welsh said that the school maintained "absolutely no control over the students" and had allowed outsiders full range of the campus.

Students congregated last night at the scene of the early morning gunfire denounced police and city officials and the school administration while speaking of their "bitter feelings" to reporters.

One student said that "all the faculty is interested in is a pay raise, and they are fearful that this incident is going to keep them from getting their raise."

Faculty members stood near the gathering, but made no move to disband the crowd.

No Further Violence

The evening passed with no further reports of violence, while 150 policemen waited all night about six blocks away, ready to act if any new incident should occur.

Father Salisbury contended that the destruction of property in the men's dormitory after the arrests had cost the city police a chance to instill respect for law in the minds of the students.

"For years we have been trying to instill within these students a respect for personal property," he said. "It took some policemen, who are supposed to represent law and order, to destroy all that we've been doing."

Mayor Welch and District Attorney Carol Vance said they were not convinced that the police had destroyed the television sets, radios, watches, clothing, records, guitars, electronic equipment and pictures that were found smashed in the dormitories after the police left yesterday morning.

"In my opinion, any rumor that police destroyed the personal effects of the students was spread mainly for the purpose of trying to incite another riot," said the district attorney.

The house mother at the freshmen dormitory, Mrs. Mattie M. Harbert, has testified that she saw police officers breaking students' television sets and radios.

After questioning the 488 persons arrested on the campus, the police released 472 without placing charges against them. Sixteen were held for further investigation.

"They were trying to find out who fired the shot that killed the policeman," said one student. "Nobody seemed interested in trying to find out why all the trouble happened."

The student was referring to the racial tensions in the city that led to the rioting on the campus.

A police spokesman said the bullet that fatally wounded Patrolman Louis Kuba had apparently ricocheted before striking him, making it difficult to tell whether it was a .32 or a .38-caliber slug.

The police said they had confiscated a pistol, a rifle and a shotgun while searching the men's dormitories yesterday morning. A search of the women's dormitories did not turn up any weapons.

A number of students withdrew from the university today. The registrar's office said that for the current semester the university had an enrollment of 4,325. About 1,000 live on campus.

Mr. Jones estimated that up to half the students who live on campus had left school by today. Last night, dozens of parents showed up to take their children home.

Final examinations for seniors were scheduled to start today. Exams for other classes will start on Monday. A university spokesman said that the examinations were still scheduled.

Wisconsin Students in Court

PLATTEVILLE, Wis. May 18 (UPI)—Four Platteville State University students who were arrested during a demonstration marked by violence, went to court today while authorities stayed alert for a possible fourth consecutive night of disturbances.

The students are angry because those under 21 years of age are barred from drinking beer in Platteville by a local-option law. They also said they were upset by several university policies.

Close-Up AC 6/26/67 RIOTS

Learning from Snick

"Responsible" Negro leaders, said Atlanta NAACP President Dr. Albert Davis, worked for months without success for city construction of recreational facilities in Dixie Hills. Then, he added, "in a period of 12 hours, outsiders came in and developed a program of riotous activity, and the city reacted immediately.

"If you lived in Dixie Hills, would you not assume that Stokely Carmichael has a better program than we have?"

You can quibble over details. City officials, for example, say plans for the playground were well developed long before the rioting.

You also can argue that the "better way" cost the life of an innocent bystander and the critical injury of a 9-year-old boy.

But Dr. Davis' point still is valid enough in Dixie Hills and many another trouble spot to cause reflection.

If rioting can produce such immediate results, then does it not encourage rioting? And does it not seem to equate "responsibility" of Negro leadership with ineffectiveness?

In condemning Snck's racism and incitement to violence, we should not overlook its achievements. Snick people speak the language of the Negro poor. They communicate.

They go into communities seething with frustrations—of joblessness, poor housing, inadequate recreation, poor public services—and teach the basic democratic principle that bad conditions will never improve unless you say something about it. Surprising as it seems, public officials and "leaders" hear nothing from some communities where conditions are worse simply because no leadership has emerged and no one knows how to articulate grievances.

Snick has taught them to speak. And though we find the voice raucous and alarming, we at least owe it to ourselves to ponder the lesson in grassroots leadership.

It is my opinion that no substantial improvement can be imposed on people or a community from the outside: by government, by the white power structure, by "responsible" Negro leadership, or by Snick, for that matter. It must come from within the individual and within the community.

If Snick in many instances has done a better job of organizing communities and developing local leadership, and if we deplore the attendant racism and violence of its preachments, then we must study its methods and offer nonracist, nonviolent alternatives.

BRUCE GALPHIN.

RIOTS 6/27/67

Eugene Patterson

~~ADVERTISEMENT~~

Dr. King Warns Against the Riots

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. is standing up strongly now in opposition to the use of riots and violence in pursuit of racial change. Not for him, the fearful equivocations that too often follow disorders such as Atlanta endured last week. That kind of black power, he says in a new book, "will not work."

"Occasionally Negroes contend that the 1965 Watts riot and the other riots in various cities represented effective civil rights action," writes Dr. King, in Where Do We Go From Here: Chaos or Community? (Harper & Row).

"But those who express this view always end up with stumbling words when asked what concrete gains have been won as a result.

"At best the riots have produced a little additional antipoverty money, allotted by frightened government officials, and a few water sprinklers to cool the children of the ghettos. It is something like improving the food in a prison while the people remain securely incarcerated behind bars. Nowhere have the riots won any concrete improvement such as have the organized protest demonstrations."

Dr. King might have enumerated some concrete things the riots have helped to lose, such as much racial liberalism in Congress. But he chose the constructive course of listing concrete achievements that Negro nonviolence did win. And, he noted, "fewer people have been killed in 10 years of nonviolent demonstrations across the South than were killed in one night of rioting in Watts."

"This is no time for romantic illusions and empty philosophical debates about freedom," Dr. King goes on bluntly. "This is a time for action. What is needed is a strategy for change, a tactical program that will bring the Negro into the mainstream of American life as quickly as possible. So far, this has only been offered by the nonviolent movement.

"Beyond the pragmatic invalidity of violence is its inability to appeal to conscience . . . Nonviolence is power, but it is the right and good use of power. . . .

"One of the main questions that the Negro must confront in his pursuit of freedom is that of effectiveness. . . . If a method is not effective, no matter how much steam it releases, it is an expression of weakness, not of strength. . . . Only through our adherence to nonviolence—which also means love in its strong and commanding sense—will the fear in the white community be mitigated."

Choosing to be a man of conviction rather than conformity, Dr. King repeated, in the teeth of this summer's gale of violence, "If every Negro in the United States turns to violence, I will choose to be that one lone voice preaching that this is the wrong way."

With this respected Negro voice raised, so uncompromisingly, there is some hope for the salvage of Negro aspirations from the hands of the Black Power wrecking crews.

RURAL PROBLEMS

Published as an information service in the War on Poverty by the Community Action Program of the Office of Economic Opportunity

RURAL Opportunities

December, 1966
Vol. 1, No. 8
Washington, D. C. 20506

WHAT IS AHEAD FOR RURAL COMMUNITY ACTION?

Don Hess —Director, Office of Program Planning, OEO/CAP

In a program such as CAP, where so much depends on the actions of committed people in hundreds of communities, generalizations are risky. However, as Director of CAP's Office of Program Planning, I would like to suggest to you some of the implications of the new Amendments to the Economic Opportunity Act as enacted by the 89th Congress.

The net judgment in OPP is that this year's Congressional action will make it easier for CAP to do some of the things which we have wanted to do, and should have been doing, since the program began. Let me single out three of these:

- The further development of programs of community action against poverty in rural areas
- Building some new reality into the concept of maximum feasible participation of those who are to benefit from the Economic Opportunity programs
- Targeting in on projects and programs which yield demonstrable benefits in terms of eliminating the causes of poverty

Community Action memoranda and program guidance material will be issued to help rural communities implement specific new programs and Amendments to the Act.

I will try, without going into any great detail here, to fit some of the new features into the framework of the three major objectives listed above.

1. Community Action in Rural Areas

The 89th Congress in its first session charged the Director of the Office of Economic Opportunity to ensure that poor people living in rural areas have equal access to the benefits of all Economic Opportunity programs, the Community Action Program included. This mandate was affirmed many times in the course of the long and searching discussions which resulted in the 1966 Amendments to the Act.

One of the priorities for CAP in the coming year will be to provide encouragement to local community action efforts in those States which were unable to utilize all of the Title II funds allocated to them in Fiscal Year 1966 under the statutory formula of Section 203. For this to be accomplished within the Title II appropriation, which was somewhat below the figure proposed in the bill supported by the Administration, some of the communities which went well over their guideline allocations in Fiscal Year 1966 may receive a smaller proportionate share of the total. However, very few rural Community Action Agencies fall in this category.

A large proportion of the Federal funds appropriated for Fiscal Year 1967 Community Action were designated by Congress for specific programs:

- $73 million for special training and employment programs
- $8 million for small emergency loans to low-income families
- $352 million for Head Start
- $22 million for Legal Services programs
- $61 million for the establishment of comprehensive health services and narcotics rehabilitation programs
- $7 million for special adult basic education programs.

THE OEO BILL HIGHLIGHTS

Total CAP authorization: $846 million

Earmarked funds:

| | |
|---|---|
| Head Start | 352 |
| Legal Services | 22 |
| Adult Work Training and Employment | 73 |
| Health | 49 |
| Narcotics | 12 |
| Emergency Family Loans | 8 |
| Adult Basic Education | 7 |

One-third of board membership must comprise representatives of the poor, selected by the poor.

CAA's may pay "reasonable allowance" in addition to expenses for attending meetings, to members of boards and committees.

Level of research and demonstration programs reduced from 15% to 5% of total CAP dollars.

Provision for new programs of comprehensive health services.

Provision for funding of independent agencies in rural areas where CAA's are not feasible.

Rural family loan maximum (Title III) raised from $2,500 to $3,500.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20250

Ed - would you discuss with Al & let's talk, Paul

January 23 1967

Mr. Paul Anthony, Director
Southern Regional Council
5 Forsyth Street, N. W., Room 201
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Mr. Anthony:

I need your help. The Department of Agriculture wants low-income and minority-group people to know about its programs. Because of your work with disadvantaged people and your contacts with grass-roots leaders, we hope you can use information on the Department's programs to help more people to understand the programs and to encourage more people to participate in them.

I am enclosing the packet "So All May Share" which tells about the Federal food programs for both urban and rural people. The programs are for low-income families, children in schools and in orphanages, unemployed and partially employed people, and many others. They help improve people's health through better diets, and they are for everyone who needs them without regard to race, color, or national origin.

The Consumer and Marketing Service, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., 20250, will be glad to give you as many copies as you need to send to your field staff or, if you will supply a mailing list, they will mail the packets directly. They will be happy to work out any arrangement with you that will help bring their programs to more people.

I hope that the Department can send out information on other programs during the year. I would like to send this packet and any other information we have to everyone who can use it, so if you know of other groups or community leaders that might be interested, would you please send me their names and addresses.

Sincerely,

Wm M Seabron

William M. Seabron
Assistant to the Secretary

Enclosure

Rural Problems

SO ALL MAY SHARE

Food Help From the U.S. Department of Agriculture

RURAL PROBLEMS

U.S. Accused of Shortchanging Rural Poor in Aid Programs

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30—The rural poor are being shortchanged by Federal programs to combat poverty, a national conference on rural poverty was told today.

Neither the Office of Economic Opportunity nor the Department of Agriculture are geared to help the rural poor, said Dr. C. Edwin Gilmour, professor of political science at Grinnell College in Iowa.

The Department of Agriculture, he said, has been more concerned with corn than with people" and is "by no means the master of its own programs and actions."

The department is dominated, he said, by the House and Senate Agriculture and Appropriations Committees. He said some of the members of these panels had power that "rivals or exceeds that" of Secretary of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman.

Furthermore, he said, they are conservatives "in outlook and actions."

"How, then, can we expect to have progressive, promising, and people-oriented programs for rural America from Congressional committees with such orientation?" he asked.

The conference is sponsored by the National Association for Community Development, a nonprofit professional organization, which was founded in 1965 to assist in the national effort to combat poverty and give antipoverty workers a meeting ground. The meeting is being held at the Twin Bridges Motor Hotel across the Potomac River.

Dr. Gilmour was preceded as a speaker by Mr. Freeman, who conceded that his department had a tough task.

"Measured by what needs to be done, it is apparent that we have only scratched the surface," he said. "But we are making the attempt."

The new attempt, he went on, "points up a basic change in the department thinking, a change from nearly exclusive concern with agriculture and a beginning on the problems of the other rural America."

This other rural America, he said, is where "poverty is ingrained, opportunity is lacking and basic community growth facilities are sometimes nonexistent."

$33-Million in Loans

Mr. Freeman said his department this year would provide $33-million in economic opportunity loans to help 13,000 low-income rural families and about 390 rural cooperatives made up of low-income families.

There will also be $435-million in rural housing loans for 48,000 families, $304-million in loans and grants for construction or improvement of water and waste disposal systems in rural areas and financing for nearly 200 rural community recreation centers. These funds will come through the Farmers Home Administration.

Dr. Gilmour characterized the Farmers Home Administration as a "very bankerish and banker-oriented loan agency" that makes loans to "financially sound farmers."

He also said that the department's Rural Community Development Service, which Mr. Freeman established as a clearing house for all Government services to the rural poor, had been hampered by money troubles. Dr. Gilmour said its budget had been $600,000 but that it was cut in the Presidents budget last week to $450,000 out of more than $6-billion allocated to the department.

Dr. Gilmour was the first director of the Iowa Office of Economic Opportunity.

He praised Sargent Shriver for an "admirable job" in bringing the antipoverty office into being, but he criticized the agency for "less than satisfactory" operations in fighting rural poverty.

Mr. Shriver, he said, has no "top assistant to advise him on rural realities and programs or to plan and execute rural phases of the Community Action Program." This program is run by and for local communities.

". . . The urban bias of the C.A.P. has become increasingly evident," he said. "Prepackaged programs are designed with urban resources and realities in mind. . .'

RURAL PROBLEMS

STATEMENT PRESENTED BY
A. PHILIP RANDOLPH
TO THE NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON RURAL POVERTY
WASHINGTON, D. C. FEBRUARY 15, 1967

I appreciate the invitation to appear before this National Commission on Rural Poverty, as I always welcome the opportunity to testify against the shameful injustice of endemic poverty in the richest society the world has ever known. Yet I must confess my discouragement in appearing again before still one more commission when the facts are obvious and the need is for action.

Everyone knows the unrivaled productive capacity and the magnificent natural resources of the United States. And nearly everyone knows now, if they did not a few years ago, that while 30 per cent of our people live in the rural areas, 43 per cent of our poverty is there; and while 25 per cent of our people live in the Southeastern states, about half the poverty is there. The President has deplored it. The Secretary of Agriculture has documented it. Only two weeks ago, in this very city, outstanding citizens assembled from all parts of this nation under the auspices of the National Association for Community Development and gave three days to discussion of rural poverty. I am relying on the National Sharecroppers Fund, of which I am proud to be Vice-Chairman, for many of the facts and figures I will present in my statement here today.

Gentlemen, we have had enough committees, enough commissions, and enough conferences. We need action. In the generation from 1940 to 1965, some 25 million people (in terms of change of residence and net migration) left agriculture. Is this not one of the great migrations in all the world's history? Yet in all that quarter of a century we have seen no coherent plan or program or social purpose either to help those millions remain on the land or to prepare them for the changed environment of the cities into which they thronged.

Now there is concern and testimony and legislation to deal with the great crises of American cities. How could there not be a crisis in our cities? But it starts in the countryside where, even today, new thousands are being dispossessed and starting the long involuntary trek away from their homes.

In the great depression of the thirties, when poverty blighted the land, evictions and forced sale of farmlands were stopped by desperate farmers with guns on their shoulders. Auctions found no buyers. Government listened, at least for a few years, when the Farm Security Administration experimented with programs to keep land in the hands of small farmers. But the programs died under pressures on Washington, and the Department of Agriculture went back to its usual services to commercial agriculture, helping the big grow bigger as the little were forced to the wall. A major speaker at the Community Development conference I have mentioned, speaking of the current neglect of the rural areas, suggested: "Perhaps if there had been a few demonstrations out in the country, the OEO might have responded with more demonstration projects. I'm not suggesting that sharecroppers rampage along the cotton rows or start burning cornfields," he said, "but it does appear that the action is where the action is."

The "tent cities" of Alabama and Mississippi, housing the dispossessed who have nowhere to go and nothing to do, are vivid testimony to the pressures behind the great migration to the cities. Last year, the cutback in cotton acreage was the rationale for the dispossessions; before that, it was mechanization and efficiency. There were evictions in Alabama because tenant farmers would not sign over their ASCS checks to the plantation owners. In Hinds County, Mississippi, evictions are directly related to the tenant farmers' attempt to share in federal programs; to their asking for receipts in business dealings; to the election of Negro members to ASCS committees. Some evictions can be attributed to voter registration drives, and the fear of the growing Negro vote in the black-belt counties is certainly a factor in the desire of the white power structure to see Negroes leave the area.

And now there are reports from Mississippi that the minimum wage for farm workers is a new reason given for evictions. Two explanations are made: first, the minimum wage applies only if there are seven or more employees; this stipulation is an incentive to avoid coverage by getting rid of many who have been working as day laborers and who have continued to live in the plantation shacks. Second, some plantation owners are shifting from cotton to cattle; they want to clear the land now occupied by tenant housing and truck crop patches,and turn it into pasture. The latest word is that the Governor of North Carolina has declared sharecroppers "independent contractors" in order to prevent them from qualifying for the federal minimum wage.

We strongly urge that the federal government respond to this emergency with programs to rescue these impoverished people who have been kept in a state of dependency and who are now once again being made the victims of the very legislation that should be helping them.

Discrimination in Agriculture

The large local landowners are still the dominant voice in the control of federal programs that ought to be helping small farmers, black and white alike, to remain on the land. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights' report in 1965 revealed that the Department of Agriculture's practice was to follow local patterns of racial segregation and discrimination in providing assistance. White farmers were trained in the new technology while Negroes were not; white farmers were encouraged to diversify, to acquire more acreage, and to make their land more productive. Negroes for the most part received only subsistence loans with limited supervision from the Farmers Home Administration, while white farmers received supervised loans for capital expenditures. Other services were similarly limited.

Two years later, there have been changes in form, but not in substance. Average loans to whites are still substantially greater than to Negroes. Only half the number of Negroes, proportionately to whites, benefit from the Soil Conservation Service. Widespread irregularities have been reported in this year's ASCS elections, because procedures are still controlled by the large landowners. (Appendix 1, attached.)

Although discrimination is most blatant against Negro farmers, all small farmers suffer. The Department of Agriculture has, throughout its history, served commercial agriculture, and not rural people. Its FHA, for instance, is more interested in its loan repayment record than in the survival of farmers. The aim of federal agricultural programs has been to add value to things -- primarily land -- and not to people. Thus the benefits of farm programs go to the larger farmers who produce the most, who earn the highest incomes from the market, and who hold the most physical assets.

The Exodus

It is thus understandable that the continuing exodus from the rural areas includes white and nonwhite farmers alike -- tenants, part-owners, and owners -- and that the small individual farmers are hardest hit.

Nearly 20 per cent of the farms disappeared in the five-year period 1959-64 in nine Southern states: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee. In 1959, the total number of tenants, part-owners, and owners amounted to 995,857 farm operators, 765,130 white and 230,727 nonwhite. By 1964, the over-all figure had dropped to 802,180 of whom 648,448 were white and 153,732 were nonwhite. (Appendix 2, attached.)

Many more whites than Negroes are affected, but the percentage of the Negro population migrating is much greater. Studies by the Census Bureau and the Department of Labor show that more than two million Negroes left the South in the years from 1960 to 1965.

In Alabama, the National Sharecroppers Fund has been working with other concerned groups and individuals to try to secure a surplus food program for needy people. Out of 67 Alabama counties, the 30 richest counties have food programs and the 37 poorest do not. When the attempt was made to organize food distribution as a single-purpose project under the Community Action Program, white citizens previously opposed to a food program announced they would cooperate but suggested setting up an integrated CAP. The result was that the single-purpose project did not go through, and there is still no food distribution in the poorest counties.

The food stamp program was expected to provide both more food and more choice for poor people than surplus commodity distribution, but in practice it means that those who are too poor to make the cash payment required to buy stamps are cut off from food altogether. A survey of eight Mississippi counties where the change was made from direct surplus food distribution to food stamps last summer, showed a drop from 54,395 to 33,307 participants. (Appendix 3, attached.)

> Government administrators seem not to understand that the poorest people simply don't have money, and once again a program intended to help the most impoverished people is actually working against them. We strongly urge that workable food surplus programs be immediately initiated and carried through from the federal level to see that all needy persons receive adequate food to prevent widespread malnutrition and even starvation.

For some months last fall, the National Sharecroppers Fund and other organizations worked with South West Alabama farmers on plans for a Farmers Cooperative Association (SWAFCA). It was found that Extension personnel were advising the Negro farmers to plant soybeans for the local market, to secure the credit they needed from local buyers, and to hire harvesting machines from the same people. Yet the farmers were trying to organize, and had come for advice, primarily to escape this local monopoly control which had always kept incomes low. When pressed, the county agent mentioned other crops, but always directed them to the same local market.

> The functions of the Extension Service should not be to preserve the status quo or to aid only the well-established commercial farmers (who are now apparently their main concern). County agents should be helping low-income farmers survive by improving their agricultural techniques, raising income levels, organizing co-ops, and finding new crops and markets.
>
> Because the county agents receive some of their funds locally and are locally controlled, the Federal Extension Service should either revise its regulations governing its cooperative extension programs with the states, or it should establish a new educational arm which can do the job of bringing poor farmers and other rural poor, both Negro and white, the help they desperately need.

A day-long conference was held in Selma, Alabama, in January, 1967, attended by local farmers, members of co-ops, and local and national representatives of OEO and the Department of Agriculture. After the government representatives had consulted together, their spokesman called the efforts of the group "premature" and suggested that they go back and organize themselves more effectively, and perhaps next year they could have a vegetable marketing operation.

> Perhaps the farmers were not well organized -- after all, they had met to ask for help in organizing. Is this the best the government can do, to say, "Come back next year, any of you who are still farming"?

The South Needs More, Gets Less

The South, defined as the states of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia, had 25.9 per cent of the nation's population in the 1960 census, and nearly half its poverty. But its share in the programs that might relieve that poverty is, at best, only near the population proportion, and far from the extent of need. For instance, only 21.8 per cent of public assistance payments in the United States in fiscal 1965 were made in the South. Public assistance payments there are below the national average in total funds, coverage, and average payments.

The heart of the President's proposals for the war on poverty in 1967 centers on needed increases in social security benefits. But what about those -- many among the rural poor -- who are not covered by social security?

Nearly two-thirds of the payments in Southern states go to the aged, even though the average payment is around $60 a month. This means that less than a fifth of the funds are available for children in need; few of them are covered, and monthly payments range from $9.13 in Mississippi to $25.55 in Kentucky. (Appendix 4, attached.)

The proportion of substandard and deteriorating housing is twice as high in rural as in urban areas. Yet, since 1950, the federal government has built more than 36 homes in cities and their suburbs for each one built with the assistance of FHA in rural communities.

> Why is not the government moving to aid the thousands being dispossessed in Mississippi today, for instance, and giving them work at the same time, by helping them to build new homes for themselves?

Even under the antipoverty program itself, the rural areas get less than they should. In fiscal year 1966, less than one-seventh of total CAP funds went into rural program development and the conduct and administration of rural community action agencies and programs. CAP, like the whole antipoverty program, is urban oriented and is only beginning to understand the close relationship between rural needs and urban problems.

In Department of Labor programs, only 20 per cent of Manpower Development and Training Act funds went for projects in rural areas, where the need is enormous. In 1964, the Rural Community Development Service found that only 3.4 per cent of MDTA training projects were conducted in small towns under 10,000 population and in the rural areas they serve, and only 3.1 per cent of the number of trainees who participated were in rural and small-town training projects.

The lack of assistance is nowhere exposed more starkly than in the support for the land-grant colleges in the South. The total budget for the 16 Negro agricultural colleges was $32 million in 1962 while that for the four white land-grant colleges in the same area, with somewhat fewer students, was $72 million.

Only $600,000 of the Department of Agriculture's $6 billion budget has been allocated to the Rural Community Development Service whose function is to serve rural people and to help them take advantage of federal programs. That is 1/100 of 1 per cent.

> Where is the federal help that is necessary if people are to survive and prosper in their home communities rather than flee to unaccommodating cities?

It Can Be Done

The fact is that something can be done about rural poverty. Small farmers who want to remain on the land can be helped to do so. The great exodus can be stemmed -- although there will always be some who want to migrate and who should be given help to ease the transition. But the rural areas can be rebuilt.

The proof of this lies in many pilot projects -- a kind of tokenism that has repeatedly demonstrated success and hope, and then been forgotten. But the demonstrations have been made and the need now is not for "pilot" but for massive economic programs which only the federal government with its resources can accomplish.

The Tennessee Division of Vocational Education, working with county school boards, developed a program under MDTA to try to raise the income of farmer participants from 20 to 40 per cent in the first year, and by 60 per cent over a three-year period. Subjects taught in this training course were specifically geared to the farming operations of each individual trainee. Most attention was given to soils, crop production, livestock production, and farm plans. The course started with a visit to each farm to develop a realistic plan for it. Other subjects farmers need to know about, such as keeping records, taxation, electricity, were included. Information was given about government programs and services; and in this case the local agencies cooperated enthusiastically.

The first pilot program, the Yorkville Management class, began on July 15, 1963. Attendance averaged 97.4 per cent. Average net income for the trainees, both white and nonwhite, in 1962 had been $343, but by 1964 it was $1,285. Of the 19 men in the class who completed the course, 14 increased their incomes by more than 100 per cent, and all know that their returns will continue to grow. When Employment Service representatives asked the trainees if they would now take a job in town, each program graduate answered, "No." (Appendix 5, attached.)

The experience of the Southern Rural Training Project of the National Sharecroppers Fund proved the possibilities once again. Local leadership in Southern communities was helped to secure funding for 12 programs providing education and training for more than 2,100 low-income adults. Sixteen additional projects, to serve more than 3,000 trainees, were ready for 1967 funding when the Project ended. For SRTP was a demonstration program, and when the demonstration of success had been made, the Project was over and, ironically, could not be refinanced, according to Labor Department officials. (Appendix 6, attached.)

Title III-B of the Economic Opportunity Act was found to be the most fruitful for developing projects in rural areas. In developing these projects, SRTP field staff encouraged indigenous people to take an active part in the planning and processing. Bi-racial advisory committees were organized, allowing seasonal farm workers to meet on an equal basis with their employers and with government agency personnel. These committees, it is hoped, will become permanent organizations to apply for other programs to meet their community needs. Out of twelve projects funded by the time SRTP ended, seven were III-B projects; out of fourteen projects submitted but not yet funded, nine were III-B's.

Obviously, a great deal more of OEO funds should be channeled through Title III-B programs, which have the flexibility to meet directly the needs of the rural poor. They can provide basic education, prevocational training, medical and counseling services, and assistance in job placement or in obtaining advanced training.

Moreover, OEO's Title III-B is eminently suited for getting the work done, since it is a young agency and not bound by outworn bureaucratic practices, nor is it subject to veto by vested interests; it has the commitment and the knowledge of the real needs of the rural poor which make it one of the best equipped agencies to get this job done.

All over the South, poor rural farmers -- like those in Alabama -- are trying to help themselves by developing cooperatives that will stretch their incomes further and add to their net returns. One example of this is the MidSouth Oil Cooperative organized in Fayette and Haywood Counties, in Tennessee, with the help of an OEO loan for $49,000. Another is in Kershaw County, South Carolina, where a group of Negro farmers secured an FHA loan of $13,000 to buy a one-row mechanical cotton picker mounted on a tractor, and two cotton wagons. A third is in Mississippi, and I should like to tell its story.

Panola County, Mississippi, is a county which lost one in four of its residents in the decade between 1950 and 1960. In 1964, a group of struggling small farmers were desperate about the price they were getting for their okra -- only 4 cents a pound. A single local broker had monopoly control of the market and wouldn't even discuss the price with the farmers. NSF's Mississippi field representative advised them about forming a cooperative. They learned to buy seed wholesale and pass the saving along to members. They learned to sort and grade the okra, and how prices varied on the Memphis market. At first the county FHA agent was discouraging, but after they surveyed the county themselves and found out how many farmers would join, he changed his mind. The co-op obtained a $113,000 OEO loan which covered not only the okra operation but two cotton pickers -- this meant that their children were freed to go to school instead of having to help with the harvest. The co-op also bought bean combines and a bulldozer. Now they are planning expansion to buy fertilizer, insecticide, and farm equipment for the members, and talking about a cotton gin. These farmers are staying in Panola, and they are meeting with farmers in neighboring counties to help them get started the same way. (Appendix 7, attached.)

> Yet farmers in Alabama are still told to come back next year. Why should the rural poor have to fight so many obstacles to get help to which they are entitled?

The way up from poverty should be easier in the rural areas, far less costly. The maximum loan to a farmer under OEO -- which reaches those too poor to be helped by FHA -- is $2,500. One of the trainees in the Tennessee program bought a second-hand walk-in cooler and constructed a slaughterhouse with a loan for that amount.

Measure against this the cost of maintaining a family on welfare in the city -- a cost which does nothing to help the family become self-sufficient, and which mounts up, year after year, and perpetuates the cycle of poverty. The basic monthly welfare allowance for a family of five in New York City was given as $289.85 in the New York Times for December 19, 1966. That is $3,478.20 for a year without including overhead and personnel expenses. The city distributes $42 million a month to welfare clients, more than half a billion dollars a year.

J. P. Lyford, author of a well-known study of urban slums, has asked:

> Why, for instance, must huge concentrations of unemployed and untrained human beings continue to pile up in financially unstable cities that no longer have the jobs, the housing, the educational opportunities, or any of the other prerequisites for a healthy and productive life? Why do we treat the consequences and ignore the causes of massive and purposeless migration to the city? Why are we not developing new uses for those rural areas that are rapidly becoming depopulated? Why do we still instinctively deal with urban and rural America as if they were separate, conflicting interests when in fact neither can be served independently of the other?

A crash program for the rural areas is overdue and must be given priority. Just as an example, why should it not be stipulated, when government contracts are awarded, that preference shall be given to subcontractors in underdeveloped areas with surplus manpower? This would begin to move jobs and industries into the rural areas without extra expenditures. Why not a massive housing program, with new, inexpensive building materials and techniques, using the labor of the dispossessed under the direction of skilled craftsmen, first to build the homes they need themselves; then, with acquired skills, to repair or to build for the thousands nearby who are miserably sheltered now? Why not say YES to the groups of farmers struggling to build co-ops, and share with them the knowledge of crops, techniques, and markets that has been developed by our agricultural specialists? Federal initiative should reach out in every county. Why not make adult literacy and skill training as universal as the public school system?

Granted, public investment is needed: roads, schools, hospitals, water systems -- everything is lacking in the rural areas. But it is equally true that every dollar spent will come back multiplied. Rising incomes mean both reduced welfare costs and a growing tax base. Money spent locally means the revitalization of small towns, small businesses, and community services, growing trade, each an expanded tax base. All this will encourage industry to move in; and the local market created for truck crops will stimulate the small farms. The cycle of poverty can be reversed into a cycle of prosperity. (Appendix 8, attached.)

A great deal has been said, and studied, and resolved, in the course of the war on poverty, on the question of adequately motivating the poor -- the under-achievers, the hopeless.

It is time that question was turned back on the developers and administrators of federal poverty policy. Too many of them are without hope -- they take the view that nothing can be done for the marginal farmers and the rural poor, despite the evidence of demonstration projects that prove the opposite.

It is the government bureaucrats who are the under-achievers. Having the authority and the resources, they have been unable, and sometimes unwilling, to bring these to bear in a creative and massive program of rural redevelopment that could end rural poverty.

Government officials need to be motivated. We can end rural poverty. Let's tell our public servants to stop shortchanging the rural areas and to get on with the job.

Appendix 3

SURPLUS FOOD AND FOOD STAMP PROGRAM PARTICIPATION

Mississippi

| County | Food Stamp (Sept. 1966) | Direct Distribution (Date Indicated) | | Change |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Chickasaw | 2,628 | 2,546 | (Aug. 65) | + 82 |
| Clay | 3,395 | 5,075 | (Jun. 66) | -1,680 |
| Coahoma | 9,233 | 6,592 | (Oct. 65) | +2,641 |
| Forrest | 2,566 | 5,958 | (Mar. 66) | -3,392 |
| Harrison | 2,201 | 9,500 | (Jun. 65) | -7,299 |
| Jones | 4,646 | 9,923 | (Jun. 65) | -5,277 |
| Lowndes | 2,687 | 3,557 | (Aug. 65) | - 870 |
| Madison | 5,951 | 11,244 | (Sept. 65) | -5,293 |
| Total | 33,307 | 54,395 | | -21,088 |

NOTE: Chickasaw and Lowndes counties distributed food to public assistance recipients only prior to shifting to food stamps. All but 51 of Coahoma County's participants in direct distribution were also public assistance recipients.

RURAL PROBLEMS

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON FARM LABOR

Interim Activities Report
February, 1967

The National Advisory Committee on Farm Labor has concentrated its efforts in two main areas since its last report in May, 1966. First, a major effort was made to build support for the minimum wage bill including farm workers. Second, NACFL strengthened its support of farm worker organizing efforts, particularly among the grape workers in California. We are now working on a major pamphlet on farm labor unionization, to be widely distributed as part of a concerted drive to include farm workers under collective bargaining legislation.

Minimum Wage

After the House had passed a minimum wage bill, it encountered unexpected opposition in the Senate, and in July and August, 1966, NACFL sent out action mailings to its entire mailing list urging letters to members of the Senate supporting coverage for agricultural labor. When in September the Senate-House conferees agreed on most of the better provisions of the two different versions, NACFL sent a personal letter to every Senator and Representative who voted for the conference report. The letter stated that while coverage was too low and too limited in scope, this was a major step forward for farm workers. It also expressed hope that this was a promise of future action, including coverage of farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act.

NACFL will continue to press for increased minimum wage coverage for farm workers at every opportunity, and will support efforts to improve state minimum wage laws.

Farm Worker Organizing

By October, 20,000 copies of NACFL's pamphlet, The Grape Strike, had been distributed in response to requests from all over the country (a few copies were also requested from foreign countries). Our supply is now exhausted, and we hope to reprint the pamphlet, adding a few pages to bring the story up to date with an account of the resounding victories since the pamphlet was printed in February, 1966. Of major importance was the merger of the two striking unions -- the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee (AFL-CIO) and the National Farm Workers Association -- into the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee under a charter from the AFL-CIO. Requests for The Grape Strike are still coming in, and we trust that funds can be obtained to permit us to meet this continuing demand for the pamphlet.

To assist in the boycott efforts that were instrumental in winning the struggle of the union for recognition by the DiGiorgio Corporation, an NACFL representative participated in several meetings held by the New York City boycott organizers, and NACFL sent a special mailing to its New York list urging support of the workers through joining the consumer boycott, marching on the picket lines, and sending contributions to the union. In response to a request from a Chicago boycott organizer, NACFL sent names of key people there and thus aided in the setting up of the Citizens Committee to Aid Delano Farm Workers in that city.

In its basic work of bringing education and information about farm labor to the public, NACFL devoted its last two Information Letters (Numbers 31 and 32) almost entirely to reports on organizing efforts in various parts of the country. Many requests for additional quantities of these publications have come in, and the number of concerned individuals asking to receive our Information Letters and other publications grows steadily. Several Information Letters have been printed in their entirety in labor newspapers and other organizational publications.

Governmental Hearings

Sugar Wages. In June, NACFL presented testimony for a sugar cane wage hearing in Florida and alerted other groups that should also be represented. In January, the Department of Agriculture held seven hearings around the country on sugar beet wages for the 1967 crop; NACFL not only presented its own testimony but also located a number of other witnesses, thus assuring significantly more representation on behalf of farm workers at this series of hearings than ever before. Several of the state labor bodies were apparently not informed of the hearings, and NACFL was responsible for alerting them so that their representatives could appear. Each contact was sent NACFL's carefully documented background material.

Importation of Foreign Workers. In December, the Department of Labor held four regional hearings on the subject of standards for aliens performing temporary labor in the U.S. Again, NACFL presented its own testimony and also contacted other groups to make sure the interests of domestic farm labor would be represented. NACFL's statement strongly urged that the same standards be applied to all employers' requests for farm labor, whether domestic or foreign; that tax-supported facilities such as the federal-state employment services be denied any growers who would not meet basic standards of a living wage and decent working and living conditions.

In both these series of hearings, NACFL played a vital role in seeing that farm workers have a voice in matters that affect them so directly -- their wages and working conditions. In previous years, these hearings have often been a mere formality, giving growers a forum to present their views unopposed, since the government has made little effort to secure representation of workers themselves. But NACFL has gradually built up a group of contacts across the country -- organizations and individuals who can be counted upon to appear at hearings and for other needed action -- so that farm workers can be assured of having a voice to speak for them while they are still struggling to build their own strong organization to fill this vital role.

Food and Fiber. The President's National Advisory Commission on Food and Fiber invited NACFL to present testimony at two hearings in a series being held around the country. In December, we presented a statement on Natural Resources, calling once more for enforcement of the 160-acre limitation on lands irrigated by federal water projects, as a means of encouraging competition of small farmers with the giant corporations, which would also benefit hired farm workers. In January, NACFL made a statement on National Policies for Farm Labor, and laid the greatest stress on the need for national legislation if agricultural workers are to be freed from their cycle of poverty.

Other Activities

In September, two farm workers were burned to death and another critically burned when a wood-burning stove ignited the wooden shack in which they were living on a western New York farm. NACFL wrote to the Governor, as it has on similar disastrous occasions in the past, protesting the state's poor enforcement of the inadequate housing laws that do exist. A press release was issued, and contact was made with a college student who had been working to help organize the local farm workers. NACFL informed the Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO, of the situation, and they sent an organizer to the area. NACFL also contacted an editor of the New York Times who sent a reporter to do a feature story on the fire and the general conditions in the area. We hope to work closely with the New York State AFL-CIO and to reactivate the New York State Committee on Migratory Labor in order to bring about action and legislation to aid farm workers in New York State.

NACFL sent an action mailing in June asking for letters to Congress in support of an amendment to the Wagner-Peyser Act which would prohibit Federal-State Employment Services from referring workers not covered by the National Labor Relations Act (e.g., farm workers) to jobs where a labor dispute exists.

In August, the NACFL Activities Report of May, 1966, was sent to the entire mailing list along with a form requesting a response from individuals who would be willing to write their legislators on urgent issues and who wanted to receive all our action mailings. The response was most gratifying, and now NACFL has a sizeable file of action-minded individuals in almost every state upon whom we can call as issues arise.

NACFL continues its assistance to writers, photographers, students, and others. NACFL also provides many personal contacts to persons organizing local action groups, preparing proposals for government or foundation funding, or seeking specialized information. Requests for general and specific factual materials on farm labor issues continue to grow in number. This reflects a heartening increase in public awareness and concern. This means increased demands on NACFL's small staff and points to the need for expanded financial support so that NACFL can respond to the growing demands and opportunities for its services.

NACFL assists interested groups by suggesting speakers or by sending a staff member whenever possible. NACFL's field representative makes frequent presentations at meetings and informal discussions in the Midwestern states and in Florida. Members of the New York staff have given talks recently to groups including a Columbia Law School Seminar which is studying legal aspects of the farm labor problem, and a Sunday school session of some 200 junior high school students.

Collective Bargaining: The Role of NACFL

The NACFL staff is presently preparing a major pamphlet which will cover the past history of farm labor organizing, current efforts, and future prospects. It is planned as a piece of basic ammunition in the coming struggle to gain coverage for hired farm workers under the National Labor Relations Act. NACFL is joining with a broad coalition of labor, religious, and civic organizations in a massive campaign to educate the public at large to the need for this legislation, thereby creating the necessary pressure on Congress to enact it. An initial printing of 50,000 copies of the pamphlet is planned, with quantities to be made available to other organizations that will distribute it to their own memberships in this concerted educational and legislative campaign. One-page fact sheets, action memos, and Information Letters on this issue are also planned.

RURAL PROBLEMS

POVERTY WAR WILL BE VIEWED

Times-Picayune

LAFAYETTE, La. (AP) — A joint committee of the Louisiana Legislature will take a look at the manner in which Southwest Louisiana has waged its anti-poverty campaign Wednesday and Thursday.

The two-day hearing is the outgrowth of The Daily Advertiser identifying a key anti-poverty worker here as a former member of a New York-based policy committee recruiting young people for a Communist-dominated World Youth Festival.

Lafayette Parish legislators asked for a probe of the six-parish poverty program. And the Louisiana Legislature unanimously adopted a resolution directing the Joint Legislative Committee on Un-American Activities to investigate.

The hearing will open in the War Memorial Building here at 8 a.m. Wednesday. Sen Jesse Knowles of Lake Charles is committee chairman.

Knowles said the auditorium doors will be closed when the 100 seats inside are filled.

ANTI-POVERTY RECORDS EYED

Pov. La.

Dist. Atty. DeBlanc Subpenas Books

Times-Picayune 4-12-67

LAFAYETTE, La. (AP) — Dist. Atty. Bertrand DeBlanc Tuesday subpenaed the records of three controversial anti-poverty groups in southwest Louisiana.

The 15th Judicial District attorney said he would order an overall audit of the agencies. DeBlanc said any misconduct of financial activities will be prosecuted.

DeBlanc said he took his action on the findings made by a certified public accounting firm. He said he would use a CPA firm that has not been identified with the war on poverty.

The three agencies are Acadiana Neuf, Southern Consumers Cooperative and Southern Consumers Education Foundation.

The education foundation handles Head Start operations in five parishes, a sweet potato project, three remedial reading groups in St. Landry Parish and a credit union in Vermilion Parish.

Acadiana Neuf has been audited periodically by a firm in Lafayette and Southern Consumers engages another CPA firm.

There has been no single overall accounting of the financial transaction of the three agencies.

In a partial audit of SCEF by the New Orleans CPA firm of Marwick, Mitchell and Co., SCEF was cited with having general ledgers out of balance, questionable entries on travel expenses, and lack of final executive approval in cash disbursements.

Operations of Acadiana Neuf are being phased out by the Office of Economic Opportunity. The OEO ordered the agency to shut down for failure to give the poor a bigger voice in administration.

DeBlanc's study comes on the heels of a two-day hearing by the Joint Legislative Committee on Un-American Activities. The committee looked in the poverty programs and said it would issue a report to the legislature this May.

4-13-67

RURAL PROBLEMS

This grant was made finally!

Leaders of Negro Farm Co-op in Alabama Go to Washington to Seek Funds

By ROY REED

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 12—A dozen leaders of a Negro farmers' cooperative in Alabama came to Washington today to try to shake loose a Federal grant that is being opposed by the concerted political power of their state.

The farmers drove here in two cars to try to put over their new organization, the Southwest Alabama Farmers Cooperative Association, as a practical way for low-income farmers to save on the purchase of supplies and get higher prices for their peas, okra and cucumbers.

The Office of Economic Opportunity is considering a $503,540 demonstration grant to the cooperative as part of its effort to find new ways of fighting poverty.

The grant reportedly was almost ready for approval until Alabama's two Senators and four of its eight Representatives descended on the Office of [illegible] Opportunity last [illegible] ex[illegible]

Spokesmen for the antipoverty agency declined to speculate today on the status of the proposed grant [illegible] to say that a decision would be made shortly. One said the proposal was on the desk of Sargent Shriver, the director, and was being closely studied by the agency's economic advisers.

The cooperative is being opposed not only in Washington but also by powerful white leaders in Alabama. The opposition there includes many of the county and city officials in the 10 Black Belt counties that the cooperative covers, as well as the owners of at least one packing company, a pickle manufacturer who stands to pay higher prices for cucumbers if the cooperative succeeds.

Fears of a Negro political take-over are being aroused as the opposition campaign is pressed in the Black Belt, a region that contains rich, dark soil and is dominated by a white minority that is outnumbered in some counties by as much as four to one.

A spokesman for one of the Congressmen said today that the cooperative was controlled by "Black Panther people." Black Panther is a name applied to certain militant Negro political groups that were organized in a few Alabama counties prior to the 1966 elections in Alabama. The organizations showed little electoral strength and some have disintegrated since then.

Link Denied by Moderates

Moderate civil rights leaders in Alabama deny that the Panthers control the cooperative or have any substantial connection with it.

Joe R. Johnson, leader of the delegation of farmers, said today at the antipoverty agency that the cooperative needed the Federal money now, during spring planting, if it was to do any good.

"I'd like to take it home with me today," he said.

Mr. Johnson's group met with half a dozen antipoverty officials led by Bertrand Harding, deputy director.

The farmers brought with them several nonfarmer friends, including representatives of two well-known Negro schools, Tuskegee Institute at Tuskegee, Ala., and Southern University at Baton Rouge, La.

Dr. Asa C. Sims, professor of horticulture at Southern, and the Rev. Robert Smith, director of religious extension service at Tuskegee, told the Federal officials that the cooperative was needed and was feasible.

The white political leaders who met with the Federal officials last week argued, along with white business leaders from Alabama, that the cooperative would duplicate services already provided by Federal, state and local agencies. They also questioned the economic feasibility of the cooperative, saying that group marketing might just as easily lower the price of prod-

About 850 families belong to the cooperative. Mr. Johnson said they formed it more than a year ago but had not yet begun full operation.

An 80,000-pound purchase of fertilizer this year demonstrated that the cooperative can save money for the farmers, a spokesman for the antipoverty agency said. The spokesman did not know the amount saved but it had been substantial.

The cooperative hopes to get higher prices for its vegetables by controlling the time of selling and by bargaining with packers.

The members live in 10 counties once dominated by cotton but now well down the road toward agricultural diversification. The counties are Choctaw, Dallas (Selma), Greene, Hale, Lowndes (where Mrs. Viola Liuzzo, the civil rights worker, was murdered in 1965), Marengo, Monroe, Perry, Sumter and Wilcox.

Jack Venable, administrative assistant to Representative Bill Nichols of Alabama, said the cooperative had been organized mainly by Miss Shirley Mesher, a 37-year-old white civil rights worker. Miss Mesher first went to Alabama in 1965 to help manage the Selma-to-Montgomery march headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.

She helped organize the militant Negro political organization in Selma and Dallas County last year. The group is referred to as "Black Panther" by whites in Selma.

Miss Mesher now is an unpaid, volunteer coordinator for the Office of Economic Opportunity. Her efforts for the farmers' cooperative coupled with her past political work are the basis for the charge that the cooperative is controlled by Black Panthers. Mr. Venable said that Miss Mesher's hand-picked candidates were elected to the governing board of the cooperative in each of the 10 counties.

Mrs. Albert Turner of Marion, Ala., the wife of the Alabama director of Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, said today in a telephone interview that she and her husband were members of the cooperative and that she knew of no Black Panthers connected with it in their county. The Turners have steered clear of the Panther organizations.

Fred Gray, a lawyer in Tuskegee, is the cooperative's lawyer. He accompanied the delegation to Washington and helped argue its case. Mr. Gray is influential in the moderate element of Negro politics in Alabama.

The grant would be for one year. The money would be used mainly to hire a staff and buy equipment, such as 10 small trucks for carrying produce.

Mr. Venable said the budget included money for two-way radio communications systems in the trucks. He said the assumption among white Alabamians was that radios would be used to help organize Black Panther political groups.

Shafer Asks Record Budget

HARRISBURG, Pa., April 11 (AP)—Gov. Raymond P. Shafer submitted a record $1,861,061,787 budget for the fiscal year 1967-68 to the General Assembly Tuesday but deferred all tax recommendations until a later date.

Atlanta Constitution
4/24/67

RALPH

McGILL

RURAL PROB.

It Makes One Curious!

WASHINGTON—Ten counties in Southeast Alabama contain a total of 14,848 farms. Of these, 4,697 produce incomes under $500 per year.

A project to bring a carefully screened number of operators of these farms into a cooperative group has made a request to the Office of Economic Opportunity for a loan. It is estimated that of the 4,697 operators of these small farms, about 1,500, give or take a few, would be able to keep their farms and make them successful family farms.

The really small farmer, by himself, is helpless in today's agricultural competition. But as members of a well managed cooperative, able to share in cooperative purchase of seed, fertilizers, oil, gas, tractor parts, and so on, they could make a go of things. The cooperative manager can make available agricultural technology on crops, fertilizers, irrigation, farm equipment, eligibility for loans, insurance programs, and many other services open to farmers.

A Handicap

One of the handicaps of the small farmer is that the average county agent is too busy with the large operators who know of all the services available to give much, if any, attention to the small struggling farmers who are, in general, on the way out.

In a great many areas there are large operators with an eye on the small, subsistence farmer's land. It is pretty sure to be for sale. Farm land is more and more difficult to come by. The small farmers and their families who annually are farmers.

A Handicap

One of the handicaps of the small farmer is that the average county agent is too busy with the large operators who know of all the services available to give much, if any, attention to the small struggling farmers who are, in general, on the way out.

In a great many areas there are large operators with an eye on the small, subsistence farmer's land. It is pretty sure to be for sale. Farm land is more and more difficult to come by. The small farmers and their families who annually are forced off the land move on to the cities to seek jobs for which they have no skills. They become, soon or late, applicants for welfare. They become medical problems. Their children, ill-prepared for schools, contribute to educational dilemmas. Half the nation's 35 million poor are rural Americans.

Cooperatives have an honorable history. There are many today, doing millions of dolars of business each year, whose businesses were created with government loans during the 1930-40 depression years. Some of these now operate not merely on a national scale, but do an international business.

Rags to Riches

The stories of some of these are fiction-like in their rags-to-riches success. The writer recalls being present at some of the meetings of one such cooperative of small poor farmers. It was lucky in getting a manager of superior abilities. The writer recalls the cooperative's first daring purchase—a great gamble—of an old, near dilapidated fertilizer plant. That was not too many years ago. Today this same cooperative, with the same manager, operates literally around the world. Good management is an essential—as in all other go enterprises. Coops have an honorable history. They are in no sense un-American. The contrary is true.

It is against this background that the plan of small farmers in Southeast Alabama to obtain good management and form a cooperative must be weighed.

Congressmen from the area involved oppose it. Spokesmen for the farmers say the storekeepers who sell to these farmers—usually with high mark-ups and credit rates—are violent in their opposition. So, spokesmen say, are the big farm operators.

Why?

One becomes curious.

Is it not in the American tradition to have those who have the ability to "stay on the land?" Isn't it proper to help the little man help himself?

Is there in this story, as the farmers' spokesmen believe, the smell of greed and prejudice?

It is a fight—and the final chapter is not yet written.

RURAL PROBLEMS

Alabama Co-op Gets Poverty Aid Despite Opposition in Congress

NYT 5/12/67

By JOSEPH A. LOFTUS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 11 — The Office of Economic Opportunity has decided to grant $399,967 to an Alabama cooperative of Negro farmers despite the opposition of the state's concerted political power.

The antipoverty agency, which announced the grant last night, was caught for more than a month in a political pressure squeeze between the Alabama politicians on one side and liberal, union, and church-oriented groups, such as the Citizens' Crusade Against Poverty.

Gov. Lurleen B. Wallace of Alabama has authority under the Economic Opportunity Act to veto the grant and thus force the poverty agency director to reconsider it. The director has the authority, however, to override such a veto.

The area was once devoted predominantly to cotton, but the cooperative's leading crops now are cucumbers, okra, and peas.

The conflict was analogous to last winter's long fight over refunding the Child Development Group of Mississippi, a Head Start project opposed by Mississippi political power. The project was cut off in September, then refunded on a smaller scale after months of cross fire.

The Mississippi fight strained relations between Sargent Shriver, the poverty agency director, and the Citizens' Crusade. Today, however, Richard W. Boone, executive director of the crusade, said in a statement:

"Mr. Shriver and his staff are to be congratulated on making this grant. In doing so, the O.E.O. has displayed the kind of leadership and imagination that have been too often lacking in other departments of the Government in the recent past."

Unidentified Targets

Mr. Boone did not identify his targets but was believed to mean old-line agencies that are reluctant to tackle grass roots problems that could lead to political recriminations. A recent example was the Agriculture Department's refusal to provide emergency food for Mississippi persons who, a Senate subcommittee had found, were hungry, if not starving.

The recipient of the grant is the Southwest Alabama Farmers Cooperative Association operating in Dallas, Lowndes, Wilcox, Perry, Hale, Greene, Monroe, Marengo, Choctaw, and Sumter counties.

The grant is designed to test ways by which poor farmers can significantly raise their income and become self-sufficient. With organization and capital, for example, they can buy fertilizer and other supplies at savings. By cooperative selling they can bargain with the larger buyers for higher prices.

Congressional Opposition

Representative William Nichols, a Democrat, who is one of six members of the Alabama Congressional delegation that went to the poverty agency offices and argued for three hours against the project, said in a statement today:

"I stringently oppose this grant along with other local and state officials on the ground that the leadership of the cooperative was insufficient to handle such a project. We felt along with other members of the Alabama delegation that if the project were to be funded the leadership should be strengthened to include directly members of the State Extension Service and other Agriculture officials."

Donald M. Baker, general counsel for the poverty agency, was in Selma, Dallas County, today for talks with Sheriff Wilson Baker and Mayor Joel Smitherman in connection with the grant.

The O.E.O. public affairs office said the agency was not expecting harassment of the cooperative and that Mr. Baker's trip was a courtesy to explain to local officials the rationale of the grant.

RURAL PROBLEMS

Freeman Hears 300 Negro Farmers in Alabama Complain of Food Stamp Costs and Bias

By WILLIAM M. BLAIR

Special to The New York Times

EUTAW, Ala., June 28 — Nearly 300 bitter and frustrated Negro farmers and farm wives confronted Secretary of Agriculture Orville L. Freeman today with complaints of discrimination in farm programs and demands for food aid.

The Negroes jammed into the First Baptist Church in sweltering heat for an unscheduled meeting with Mr. Freeman. It was his first mass confrontation with poverty-ridden farmers and their families on a tour billed as an inspection of rural redevelopment projects.

Quietly but forcefully, they asked Mr. Freeman questions that ranged over a host of problems, including the lack of economic opportunity loans, the inadequate service from the local committees that administer farm programs, and the inability of poor farmers to buy food stamps.

The New York Times June 29, 1967

Negroes in Eutaw (cross) seeking Federal food aid.

Their cardboard fans moved faster to ward off the heat and they murmured "yes, yes," as he promised to see that they got a fair shake in all agricultural programs.

The first question came from a middle-aged woman in the middle of the audience.

She told of trying to sign up for the recently inaugurated Federal food stamp program in Green County in Alabama's Black Belt. "I was told it would cost me $62," she said. "I don't have enough money to buy food stamps."

The food stamp program is one of Mr. Freeman's toughest problems. The stamps are purchased by the poor according to their income. Families then use the stamps to buy food in their local food stores. The Government pays the difference between the amount each family pays for the stamps and the value of the coupons.

Controversy over the programs is rising, however, because families without any income cannot purchase stamps. The minimum payment has been $2 per person a month for stamps.

Mr. Freeman has ordered a cut in the minimum for Mississippi, which he visited yesterday. He is reducing the minimum from $2 to $.50 cents per person per month. He also hopes to get county officials to establish funds to pay for the stamps for persons who cannot afford even 50 cents. He also expects to extend the reductions to other states and to cut the payments of those who have some income.

Rights Aide Outspoken

Some members of Congress have opposed the reduction, arguing that anyone can earn $2 to get stamps.

After a half-hour in shirtsleeves, Mr. Freeman departed, but he left behind his special assistant for civil rights, William A. Seaborn, a Negro, who invited more questions.

Unlike Mr. Freeman, who has been playing his Southern trip in a low key and talking little, Mr. Seaborn has been more outspoken.

In Alabama, only six of 67 counties take part in the food stamp program. "Our problem here is with the probate judges and county supervisors who say they don't want the program," Mr. Seaborn told the Negroes. "They say Negroes are lazy."

One farmer complained that the poor farmers could not get adequate advice on producing cucumbers, a new crop in this area started after tenant cotton farmers were evicted and replaced by machinery. "Farming has gotten to be very technical," he said.

Mr. Seaborn replied: "The man who is supposed to do that is your county agent. And I don't mean the Negro agent. I mean that office."

The meeting with Mr. Freeman was arranged by the Rev. Thomas E. Gilmore, a young civil rights leader. A flyer distributed when the Secretary's tour was announced called on the Negroes to come to the church.

"All we want him to do is give these people some inspiration," Mr. Gilmore told the Secretary's aides. The Rev. John L. Ryce, pastor of the church, who presided, drew approving "amens" when he said that the Negroes were not fighting against the machine. "We're just fighting for our place in the world," he said.

Four Pentagon Promotions Approved by Senate Panel

WASHINGTON, June 28 (AP) —The promotions of four civilian officials of the Defense Department were approved today by the Senate Armed Services Committee.

They were:

Paul H. Nitze, now Secretary of the Navy, to succeed Cyrus R. Vance, who resigned as Deputy Secretary of Defense; John T. McNaughton to be Secretary of the Navy; Paul C. Warnke to be Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Affairs, to succeed Mr. McNaughton; Charles F. Baird to be Under Secretary of the Navy, succeeding Robert H. B. Baldwin, who resigned.

Mr. Baird is an Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Mr. Warnke has been general counsel of the Defense Department.

Reprinted by special permission of
THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

© 1967 by The Curtis Publishing Company

This article, reproduced in convenient form for filing and future reference, has been authorized by The Saturday Evening Post under the following conditions: (1) that it may not be used for advertising under any circumstances; (2) that no one outside The Curtis Publishing Company may affix an organization name or any other matter to it; (3) that no solicitation may accompany it.

RURAL PROBLEMS

THE BLACK IMMIGRANTS

The Negroes of the northern ghettos are not simply colored people or poor people. They are also the new immigrants—foreigners within their own country. Here is the story of Walter Austin of Merigold, Mississippi, and the millions like him: why they leave the South, how they go to the alien land, and what they find.

By Ben H. Bagdikian

Photographs by Matt Herron

At 6:40 on the evening of March 4, 1967, Walter Austin, who had lived for almost half a century within 60 miles of the Mississippi, actually saw the river for the first time. Still wearing his four-dollar overalls, he was sitting in the back seat of an automobile, jammed in with four other members of his family, crossing a high bridge. His eyes were red with the fatigue of the last 38 sleepless hours. But he stared down through the dusk at the aluminum reflection of the greatest body of water he had ever seen, and he said the same thing that rose out of him earlier when someone told him that in New York City there is a building 102 stories high: a low, slow, "Good gracious!" The car moved across the bridge, its occupants turning to keep in sight the massive river that had been the source of life and of suffering for five generations of Austin families. And then the river was gone, and they turned forward again to look uncertainly into the darkness ahead.

It was the most momentous crossing of their lives. From that time on their experiences would be like nothing they or their

reprinted from THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, July 15, 1967

The day the Austin family is to go North, young Wendell takes one last run in the yard by the Mississippi cotton field his father worked. But Wendell will never be a sharecropper.

ancestors had ever known. That morning they had been just another impoverished Negro family working the fields on a remote Mississippi plantation. But at noon, with hardly a backward glance, they had slammed the doors of the two cars driven by a relative and a friend and headed north for a new life in the city. They carried all they could from the last hog they would ever butcher—the salted jaw, a slab of salt pork, two hams, 100 pounds of lard—stashed in the car like sacred objects. Riding with them as well was a new and confusing collection of hopes and fears.

That day the Austins—father, mother, five children aged 17 to 6, and one grandchild—added their eight lives to a flow of Americans that is one of the great unsung sagas of human history. It is an uprooting of more people in a shorter period of time than almost any peacetime migration known to man, a vast transfer that is changing America.

In a wicked moment Franklin Roosevelt once put a chill on a convention of the Daughters of the American Revolution by greeting them, "My fellow immigrants," and it is true enough that one thing all Americans share is a background of migration. The American Indians were immigrants, probably from Asia; the forebears of most white Americans came from Europe in the largest intercontinental human movement in history; the ancestors of most American Negroes were the 400,000 Africans brought into the South as slaves between 1619 and 1808. Now the descendants of these Negro immigrants are making another mass move, this time within the United States.

In this generation, some four million Negroes have left the South, most of them for six states: California, Illinois, Michigan, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania. Where 50 years ago three quarters of Negro Americans were in rural areas, today three quarters are in cities. And the tide still runs strong. In 1960 there were four American cities that were 40 percent Negro; by 1970 there will be 14, and practically every city of any size will have a core of migrant Negroes, piling up, desperate. Like previous migrants, they are truly aliens, used to different customs, a different climate, essentially a different language, different everything. Their ghettos are countries within countries, in which nearly every inhabitant feels foreign to what surrounds him. But what surrounds the city Negroes is more hostile than anything any white alien has ever encountered. For them the ghetto perimeters are closed as tightly as foreign borders.

This exodus of southern Negroes is one of the most dramatic demographic events of the mid-century, yet it is a clandestine operation. When the Negro goes, he goes suddenly and secretly, because he is afraid of the white man. Generally, the Negro is a sharecropper, living in a feudal, noncash economy—his plantation owner provides him land and credit. When the harvest is over, the plantation owner announces that, after deducting the cost of food, fuel, seed, fertilizer and other things the sharecropper has obtained on credit, the sharecropper's profit is such and such. Or, much more likely, the owner tells him he owes the plantation as much as $100 or $500.

To the Negro this kind of debt is so astronomical that no one, laborer or landlord, expects that it will ever be paid off in cash. Only by working off the debt can the Negro family be clear. As manual farm work gives way to huge machines, the means of paying back the debt disappears. When that happens, most plantation owners are resigned to seeing their tenants leave.

Even so, there is often a question of who gets the paid-for television or kitchen range, in light of the debt, the landlord or the departing family's friends and relatives? And the rural Negro has been taught in the harshest way never to make an important decision without the approval of his landlord. So when he moves North, the Negro usually goes unannounced, a final gesture of rebellion and fear.

The families themselves seldom know when they will go until the moment comes. Moving vans are unknown to the dirt roads of the rural South, and departure frequently depends on the car of a visiting relative. Thus the times of greatest population loss in the South are the holidays—Christmas, New Year's, Memorial Day, July 4, Labor Day, any long weekend when city relatives can make the long trip down from the North. And at funerals. The South loses more than the dead at funerals. A brother from Chicago who comes down for the ceremony, having driven the 12 hours since work let out on Friday, arrives Saturday morning before dawn, and suddenly some of the youngsters, or the whole family, decide to go back with him.

Sometimes the mail arrives with the awaited passport: bus tickets sent by older children in the city. The next day the younger children drop out of school, and after dark that night the family heads for the station, carrying in their hands everything with which they will start their new life.

Or a mother takes the youngest children to "visit my sick aunty in the city," where she gets a job and sends the tickets back for her husband and the older children, and the next Saturday night the husband pays a neighbor $1.50 to drive him and his children and their suitcases to the station. Morning on the plantation finds the shack abandoned, and another rural family has entered the central mass of an American metropolis.

The decision to abandon a way of life, even one you love, can seem very simple.

"Christmas morning, last Christmas morning," Walter Austin said in his deep and vibrant voice, "I got up and I cried." Weeping did not seem to go with the dark, weather-beaten face. Austin is 48, has black hair without gray and a black moustache, and wears rugged-looking overalls and rubber boots clotted with mud. "I cried, and then I thanked the Lord to be living, because I could have been gone, and I was glad to be here, and all my children well. And the children had food. It put me in debt, but they had food, special Christmas food. For Christmas I saw to it that they had fresh apples and oranges."

Over and over he returned to the subject of moving to the city where, he knew, it takes even more money than in the country.

"Yes, yes, but you need some money here. You need some money here. I can't sit here with eight children"—he kept referring to eight children, though his two oldest sons had left for the city within the last two months—"I can't have my children around me and nothing to give them to eat. I feel bad in the morning. I feel bad in the morning, hearing the kids get up crying because they want something to eat and I can't find enough for them to eat. Then I feel bad. Then I feel like crying."

So the easy decision is really whether to eat or not. But there is a harder question for older people who know only their rural life and who love it. Walter Austin and his wife, Bessie, who is also 48, were born in Holmes County, Miss., but 10 years ago moved the 50 miles to Merigold, Miss., in Bolivar County.

Suddenly the painful decision is made, and the Austin family flees North.

"I don't want to leave Mississippi," Austin said. "I never been out of Mississippi except one time in my whole life, and that was only one week. Tell you the truth, up to the sixteenth day of March, 19 and 57, I never been out of Holmes County. I never been in no kind of trouble, never paid a fine, never been to court. I'll peck on wood"—he reached over the torn leatherette arm of the chair in his living room and rapped the bare wood floor of the shack with his knuckles—"I've been just plain Walter all my life."

We had spent hours talking country-versus-city, and there wasn't much doubt where he stood, given a free choice and enough food.

"I likes to farm. I loves it. I can raise my chickens, raise my hog, I have my garden with peas and beans and potatoes and squash and cucumbers and onions and greens. You can't do that in town. You can't raise a hog in town. I'm just a home child. I just don't want to leave home unless I have to. I'll be frank with you, I like the country."

He lifted his leather cap and scratched his hair.

"I know in the city you's supposed to have an education. If you got me a job in the morning and I was supposed to separate the salt from the sugar, I couldn't do it, not if they was in the same kind of bag. I couldn't do it, Cap'n, because I can't read."

His wife, with a soft face drawn with worry, and a blurry right eye blinded by a stroke seven years ago, told about a visit she made once to Chicago.

"I stayed with my husband's brother. I didn't even walk on the outside. That's all I know, what I saw from his place. I just couldn't stand that noise.

"I'd be satisfied working right here. If we had work. If I had enough to live on and be comfortable, oh, I'd stay. I'd stay."

What did she mean, "comfortable"?

"Nothing extra. You come into this world with nothing, and when you leave you can't carry anything away. I need some covers—quilts, you know—comfortable mattresses, some beds don't need to be propped up. I would like some clothes."

She thought for a moment and then worried that I might misunderstand her desire for clothes. She didn't mean for herself (she bought her last dress in 1956, her husband had never bought a suit and limited his new clothes to a four-dollar pair of overalls each year).

"I mean for the children. And nothing fancy, just not all sewed up. Not half-priced or leftovers but good common clothes, you know? Not eight-dollar dresses, just good three-dollar dresses. What I need most is extra underclothes and socks. We have enough outerclothes so the kids can wear clean things to school, but the children have to wash their underwear and socks every night so they'll be clean in the morning. If they had extra sets they wouldn't have to wash them every night."

Walter Austin looked in mock severity at the apple of his eye, his 10-year-old daughter, Bessie.

"I gets up at four o'clock every morning. At four o'clock I'm up, Sunday, Saturday, rain, sleet or snow. I put on my clothes, wash my face, go out and feed my hog, feed my chickens, and then I come back in and see if the kids has washed their clothes before they went to bed, and if they didn't, then I gets them up early so they can do it before schooltime and give their underclothes and socks a chance to dry in time. Ain't that so, Bessie?"

Bessie obviously was the most recent transgressor, and she smiled sheepishly and said to her father, "Suh?" By "early," Austin explained, he meant the backsliding child rose at 5 A.M. instead of the usual 6.

To Mrs. Austin the prospect of the city held out the deadly danger that the children would learn to drink. Walter Austin would miss his farming and would no longer experience the pride of running and repairing a large combine. But the children had different thoughts. Frances, 17, whose formal, bland expression masked a quick and taunting wit, was fatalistic—"I think things would be just the same whether I go or stay"—but she looked excited when she described how well-dressed her girl friends and relatives were when they returned from the city. David, 14, also wore an outer mask of solemnity, but his black-cloth visor cap worn at a rakish angle hinted at the adolescent itch. "I just don't want to farm. No, suh. I just don't want to be a farmer." Hearing about the city, Bessie simply glowed wordlessly. Her younger sister, Zettie Mae, 8, and brother, Wendell, 6, looked bewildered and polite.

But their parents kept reminding themselves how much better off they are now than they were in their youth. Neither of them had ever lived in so good a house as this one. It had a tight roof, the five rooms were lined with wallboard. There was a cold-water faucet in the kitchen and a privy out back (some plantation shacks lack even a privy). Three open gas grates heated the place in winter, and they had some chairs, bedsteads, and from a few good years in the early 1960's a television set and a freezer, all paid for.

"My mother's house back in Holmes County," Walter Austin said, "you could see the chickens through the floor and the blue sky through the roof. And when I was a kid, what I had to eat for the whole day was one slice of hog jaw and corn bread with flour gravy, sometimes not even that.

"Now here's David here, fourteen years old and he's in—what grade is it? Eighth—yes, the eighth grade. When I was seven years old I was trying to go to school but, Lordy, I just had to work. When I was seven years old I had to walk three miles before sunup, get a mule and feed it and then work that mule in the fields until dark, all of that for only eight dollars a month.

"I married Bessie, here, the only wife I've ever known, when we were both seventeen, and the day we got married we ate corn bread and flour gravy. We started with an old wood stove, a bed, a pig and a calf my mother-in-law give me."

The family worked for 20 years on a plantation in Holmes County. At the end of that time, Austin was driving a tractor for $4.50 a day, during the season and when weather was good. Mrs. Austin and the children did sharecropping for the same plantation, planting, chopping (weeding) and picking a cotton crop. They provided the labor and the landlord provided the land and their rent-free house. The landlord also gave them credit for their share of the cost of their seed and fertilizer and lent them $40 a month for food until the crop was harvested and sold.

"The four kids and I," Mrs. Austin said, "that last year, did twenty-six bales. We had to keep the kids out of school to do it. But I got tired, just tired going with the crops, weighing my own cotton, tromping it, putting it on the trailer. I got so tired. As a woman, I couldn't farm no more." At that time she had seven living children, ages 19 to 4, the older ones working in the field, the younger ones brought out in boxes to play all day near the cotton rows. Two infants died early, and a daughter later died of leukemia at the age of 16. "And all we got for that year and twenty-six bales of cotton was a hundred and fifty dollars. The four kids and I, from May to October. When I told the boss man I just couldn't sharecrop with the four kids no more, he told us we'd have to move. That's when we come down here."

Top: With no cotton fields to romp in, Wendell now plays in a back alley in Springfield, in a Negro ghetto he may spend his whole life trying vainly to escape. At right, Frances works as a presser in a Springfield laundry which likes to hire the industrious Negro migrants. Already she earns more than her father ever did as a sharecropper.

Newly arrived in Springfield, Ill., the biggest city they have ever seen, the Austins encounter a tempting new standard of living—and all the pressures and confusions of urban life.

(The average price farmers received for cotton in 1956 was $152 a bale, so the Austins' half share apparently was $1,976, minus $480 lent for food and their share of seed and fertilizer; neither they nor anyone they knew ever saw an accounting.)

Walter's brother heard of an empty house in Bolivar County, and they moved, and though they loved Holmes County better than anyplace else on earth, they considered themselves much improved. People had a little bit more. In Holmes, median income for the rural Negro family was $895 a year; in Bolivar it was $1,198. The Austins didn't know that, but they sensed it, and they sensed that their new plantation owner and agent were more benign. And the house was better.

Life was not easy, of course. They had more children. Their daughter, Jean, had leukemia and spent the last six weeks of her life in University Hospital in Jackson, 100 miles away, where her father lived, penniless, in a chair in her room, fed by compassionate nurses. After she died, he returned home to find that his daughter, Bessie, had been born, and his wife was back in another hospital with the shock that blinded her right eye. But, then, life had never been easy, and their family kept its strong bonds and Walter Austin his mastery within the family.

The world of the Austins in Mississippi was simultaneously enormous and tiny. Their little home was a dot in the Mississippi delta, a flat ocean of land made from the silt of centuries of flooding, land as rich as any on earth. Square mile after square mile of cotton fields stretch out, in the winter a rusty sea with here and there a scrap of windblown paper snagged on a dry stalk like a whitecap. The huge landscape is punctuated by an occasional small town, a cotton gin, a stand of oaks, and the clusters of Negro shacks in the fields. Like most southern rural Negroes, the Austins lived on a dirt road without a name, in a house without a number. But though the view seems endless, their neighbors were few, their life concentrated around their own family.

"Watch for a burned-out house on the highway," a relative instructed me, "turn left and go in three miles and look for a brown house with a tan 1959 Chevy that's broke down."

I was lucky to have met the Austins before they decided to move and to be with them when they changed their minds, for their experience told much about the thoughts and emotions of families facing the great migration. Before he knew he would go, Walter Austin had uppermost in his mind the improvements he had seen since his youth and all the things he liked in the country and feared in the city. He was genuinely undecided. The plantation owner had told him there would be no guaranteed work the next year because their cotton acreage was being rented to a big agricultural operator. But the owner held out the possibility of a job in a machine shop in a nearby town, or, at least, some days of casual labor in the fields.

The pressure increased, especially during the winter, when work ceases in the delta fields. Merchants knew at once that Austin had been put in the doubtful category. Where credit for food, bottled gas and doctors had once been immediate, everyone wanted cash. Families around them were going away. Ten years earlier 50 families worked and lived on that plantation. Now there were six. Within the last year the two houses on either side of the Austins had been vacated and torn down, and the skies of the delta now were regularly streaked with smoke from empty shanties being burned down to clear the ground for growing. The smoke got thicker after a one-dollar-an-hour wages-and-hours law for agricultural workers began last winter. When motorists stopped one day to watch a spectacular fire consuming a plantation shack, the agent in charge called out, "Wages and hours got that one."

Yet the Austins hung on. He was a good worker. His plantation agent, within the limits of feudalistic white supremacy, was a decent man. Each day Austin rose at 4, went to the plantation headquarters at 7. If there was work, he returned after dark, $10-minus-debts the richer. If there was no work, as was most often the case, he went home and worked in his yard and garden.

Mrs. Austin rose at 5:30 to start breakfast of sausage and corn bread, if they had it. The children rose at 6 and got ready for the 7:20 school bus, if they all had shoes. After school they played with the children of the few remaining neighbors, did homework, had supper of greens and salt pork, and were in bed around 8.

The end of the week was different. On a typical Saturday, David lighted a fire in the backyard under an ancient iron pot and heated water for the washing. Frances did the wash in a round, wringer-style washing machine on the back stoop and hung it on the "clothesline"—two strands, one old electrical cable, the other old barbed wire. David helped his father clean up the backyard. The hog grunted, and Walter Austin rubbed its head with his glove—"Baby, you want your breakfast?"—and told David to fetch the slops. Instantly at the trough were the pig, three puppies, two cats, four kittens and two roosters.

The three younger children, bundled in bright donated clothes, played hopscotch on packed earth at the end of some cotton rows, tiny scarlet figures under a huge sky, chased by their puppies, Frisco, Fuzzy and Alaska.

In the evening they look at television. "I cain't read," Walter Austin explained, "so I have to get the news and weather on the TV."

And they sang, Bessie leading and her mother and the others following. They coaxed David to do his imitation of a local preacher. His father called gaily to his children in the living room, using the private names he dreams up at their birth, and he alone uses: "Preacher" for Wendell, "Chicken" for Zettie Mae, "Barbie" for Bessie, "Ben" for David, and "Root" for Frances.

"Ben," he said, "Let's hear the one, 'Your God and My Love.'"

During the singing, the three youngest children played school with the most magnificent Christmas gift any Austin ever got, a plastic-and-chrome children's table-and-chair set from two years ago. As always, Bessie was the teacher, sitting at the table, facing Zettie Mae and Wendell in chairs.

"Wendell," she said imperiously, "spell . . . ." and she said what sounded like, "gown."

Wendell, puzzled: "Gown?"

Bessie, impatiently, "Yes, 'gown.'"

Wendell, timidly, "Like, 'machine gown'?"

Bessie, outraged, "No, Wendell, no! Like,

'Yesterday they went. Now they is gown.'"

Everyone laughed, though teachers know that this kind of misunderstanding is significant in explaining the difficulties in reading and learning among children whose natural tongue is not standard English.

Later there were baths, in a galvanized washtub put in Frances's room, the most private one, with a heater.

During the evenings the Austins constantly churned over their view of the future. "I wants to stay, I wants to stay," Walter Austin said. "If I could just get that machine-shop job or work in the boss man's pig farm where they works rain or shine. But how in the world am I going to feed eight kids on fifteen dollars a week?"

Periodically he'd resign himself to moving. "But after the snow is off up there. I is naked here, and up north I'm going to freeze."

None of us was prepared for what happened. One Sunday, photographer Matt Herron and I decided to visit the Austins' small church in the fields. Eight years ago 70 people would attend but now, with the migration, only 20. As we drove we were surprised to see Walter Austin and David out on the road, flagging us down. Walter Austin looked grave, his face gray with tension.

"They don't want you to go to the church because they's afraid it'll get burned down. The deacons, they ask would you please not go."

He explained that the day before, the plantation agent announced that Austin would have to move, telling him angrily, "Those white men kept coming and coming and coming to your place, and that's more than I can take. I know what they're doing. They're down here organizing a union. The state's full of them. So you better leave." Austin could take some time, the agent said, but he had to go.

The concern in Walter Austin's face was justified: To fall out of favor, angrily and catastrophically, with the boss man, especially for unauthorized dealings with outsiders, implied peril to life and limb.

The nearest public phone was six miles away. We drove to it, and Austin called a married daughter in Springfield, Ill. She was alarmed. She urged her father to come that night "before something happens, please, Daddy." But Austin's voice was calm as he spoke on the phone. "No, baby, I need a week to sell my freezer and my hog and take care of things."

We drove Walter and David Austin back to their home and went to see the plantation agent, a round-faced man in his 60's. He and his wife, the plantation bookkeeper, were civil though they were often angry. They recited our movements in the state for the last week; it is not difficult for plantation operators in Mississippi to keep track of suspicious strangers. They told us they knew we were stirring up "our people" and forming a union. Furthermore, we had violated common rules of courtesy. "You can drive down that road," he said, "and you can maybe stop at a house once. But to keep coming and coming and coming and staying after dark—that's too much."

After about an hour we persuaded him we were not organizers, and we parted in a friendly way. In a sense, this was unusual, but what the agent did was even more so. The next day he went to Walter Austin and apologized for falsely accusing him and said he could stay. Austin says he thanked the agent, but he had decided to move, and so he told the agent that he was going through with it. "Boss Man, you was dissatisfied with Walter, so Walter's going to move."

The agent told him he didn't have to sneak off like all the others. And Walter Austin didn't.

The next Saturday morning the Austin place looked like the center of a carnival. A total of 23 neighbors and friends were in and out of the house, up on the roof dismantling the motorized television antenna (bought for $149 four years ago and now sold for $5), carrying out the freezer (bought for $400 and now sold for $50). There was gaiety and almost no sentimentality.

Walter Austin, quietly, calmly, and with humor, left no doubt who was in charge. At 7 he had gone to the agent's house, returned a ladder, a set of wrenches, and paid back $7 the agent had lent him last fall so David could have shoes for school. Neither one said anything, but they both knew Walter Austin was leaving that day.

Austin quietly directed his son-in-law and his oldest son, who had driven down in the night from Springfield. Wandering through the yard was Walter's 29-year-old brother, who worked on the same plantation, and toward the end he said almost to himself, "I'm the only one left." When the time came, Walter and his brother looked at each other briefly, and Walter said, "Good-bye, son."

Frances and her boyfriend talked constantly, arms linked. An old parlor chair, the one with the torn leatherette covering, couldn't be taken, and they gave it to Frances's boyfriend, who carried it out. Walter said, "You get to keep the chair, Robert, but you'd like to keep Frances."

A recent plantation acquaintance tried too often to engage Walter's attention, and finally in exasperation Walter said to him politely, "Well, good-bye and come see me."

"How will I know where you'll be?" the acquaintance said too eagerly. "I don't even know where you're going."

Austin: "I'm going yonder."

Acquaintance: "Where's yonder?"

Austin, nodding northward: "Up."

Finally, Walter Austin walked through his stripped house. Gone from the living-room walls were the photographs of his children and some of his 15 grandchildren; the shadowbox of Jesus with the burned-out electric bulb; the pink plastic cross with the chrome crucifix; the small window frame containing postcards of Cherokee Indians and a table of decimal equivalents; and the too-bright picture of a romantic thatched-roof cottage surrounded by seed-catalogue flowers with the legend, GOD SHALL SUPPLY ALL YOUR NEEDS.

Walter Austin looked around and saw one remaining artifact on the faded blue wall—a calendar of the "Delta Burial Corporation, Seldom Equaled, Never Excelled," the society to which they paid $3.75 a month to guarantee them a decent Mississippi funeral. He hesitated a moment, then lifted the calendar off its nail and handed it to Bessie. "Barbie, in the green car."

In the kitchen he looked at the stove he had just bought on time but not made any payments on, at two lamps he had long paid for, the wringer washing machine for which he paid $200 and owed only $95 more, all left behind to be picked up by the dealer in town. Asked why he was leaving behind the lamps and the half-paid-for machine, he said, "I'm not looking for trouble. I'm just looking for a little peace and a little love."

And then he left, and when the car engines were started, Walter Austin never looked back.

As the cars moved rapidly northward, one could almost feel the arguments for staying sinking out of sight and the ones for going coming to the top. Before, the need for food and money had dominated conversation. Now, deeper things, long repressed, came to the surface. I asked if he had any fear of facing the strange life in the city at his age.

"Well, I guess so. But it had to come. It had to come. Back in Mississippi I was forty-eight years old, but I was still like a child. I needed the white man for protection. If the colored man had that he could keep out of lots of trouble. He could get credit. He could do lots of things, lots of things. But he just had to have that protection. If you didn't have that protection all kinds of things could happen, all kinds of things, just like could happen to a child without a daddy."

His eyes were red and tired, but he talked on.

"You'd get up every morning, and you'd ask the boss man what to do, and every morning he'd tell you, just like you was a child. When you got your pay, he'd take out of it what he wanted for what you owed. He didn't ask you. Now I had a good boss man, for Mississippi, and if I had something special now and then, I could ask him to let me have all my pay, and he'd let me have it. But usual thing, he'd take out what he wanted. He handled most of your bills.

"Now I figure in the North one man pays you, and then you got to take care of your bills yourself. I know a man can get into a mess of trouble handling his own bills, but I reckon that ought to be up to him, to learn and decide himself. But not on a Mississippi plantation. They figured I was a child."

He described the tensions and treacheries on a plantation where all are struggling for approval and survival, and helped explain the too-eager acquaintance that morning. "You always had to watch those other boys on the plantation and be careful who you trusted and who you didn't."

You knew Walter Austin had not been caught up in the civil-rights movement because he still referred to Negroes in the white supremacists' term, "boys," and called all white men "boss man" or "captain."

"If the boss man was always giving the easy jobs to a boy, and he and The Man always had their heads together, then you better be careful with that boy, 'cause he's probably telling the boss everything he knows about you. So on the plantation you learn to be careful what you say, what you do, and who you speaks to. And if the boss man asks you about somebody else, and you don't want to be telling him no lies, you got to tell him you just don't know nothing."

The cars were still in Mississippi, but in Walter Austin's mind already "here" was North.

"Here you can be with who you wants and ride with who you wants."

The Sunday before, while we rode to the phone booth, we had to stop for gas. It was what is known in Mississippi as an "integrated car," and the white gas-station proprietor had a common reaction: He fixed a menacing, unblinking stare at Walter Austin and kept it on him as he deliberately and slowly wiped every window of the car. To a Negro this stare, whether in an integrated car or behind a voting table, is a serious threat.

As the landscape streamed by, it caught different eyes at different times. Walter Austin would turn whenever we passed a small farm on its own plot of land. When we began to pass large used-car lots, a small smile leaked onto David's solemn face. Frances watched the increasingly large neighborhoods of ranch houses with their lawns, the largest number of middle-class houses she had ever seen, and the first not associated with the plantation hierarchy. "I'd like a house like that," she said once, "with one of those checkerboard tiles on the floor." Did she think she'd ever live in one? She thought about it seriously and then said, "Yes. I think I will."

Walter Austin and I joked a little over his calling me "Captain," which I had asked him not to do. At the time, two weeks earlier, he had said, "I know, but it's hard to stop. Up north you say, 'yas suh,' and they looks at you like you was crazy. But when you're brought up from the time you can talk, and your mammy makes you go back and say it every time you forgets to say 'yas suh,' then it's hard to stop all of a sudden."

Periodically, he would lapse into "captain" or "boss man" when we talked. But after we crossed the Mississippi River, he never did it again.

The cars went into the foggy night toward Springfield, Ill., with a homing instinct that affects almost every migrant. It was common during the foreign immigrations to have whole villages—from Sicily, Russia, Poland, Germany, Ireland—be transplanted to some particular American city. The same thing now happens within the country. There are counties in West Virginia from which most departing people go to Cincinnati, others from which they go to Cleveland. In Chicago there are two blocks made up largely of Holmes County Mississippians. The compass of the migrating poor is seldom fixed by a job already arranged and waiting, but by the presence of close relatives and friends.

In his youth, Walter Austin cut wood with a friend in Holmes County. During World War II the friend got a job on the Illinois Central Railroad, and took a room in Springfield. Later he bought a couple of rooming houses there and retired. From time to time the railroad man would return to Holmes County. Once he came to attend a wedding of his cousin with Walter Austin's cousin. When the cousins were evicted from their plantation, they moved to Springfield into a flat owned by the railroad man. In 1956 Austin's sister was told by her plantation owner that her family had to move, so the sister went to Springfield where she stayed with her cousin and got a job in Kennedy's Laundry. Four years later Austin's oldest daughter, Etoyre, decided there was no future in Mississippi, so when her aunt came from Springfield for a funeral, the daughter took her older children and rode back to Springfield. She also got a job in Kennedy's Laundry and found a flat, saved some money and sent bus tickets to her husband. They both saved some more money and sent tickets for their remaining small children and a full-fare ticket for the next oldest daughter, Mae Jessie, to accompany them. So Mae Jessie did this, taking her own daughter, an infant (no fare), and leaving her other children behind with her mother. She, too, got a job in Kennedy's Laundry, found a flat, and sent down tickets for her children and one for her mother to accompany them and visit.

Last winter Mae Jessie drove down for a New Year's visit, and the oldest Austin son, Walter Jr., decided to ride back with her. Walter Jr., unmarried, got a job sorting hides. A month later, Etoyre, the other married daughter in Springfield, drove down for a visit with her parents. Walter Austin's second oldest son, Jimmy Lee, who was married and had three children, was telling his parents he just didn't see how he could get enough work to support his family in Mississippi when the sister's car unexpectedly drew up in front. Jimmy Lee rushed to the window, saw who it was and said, "Daddy, I'm gone." He drove back to Springfield and got a job washing dishes, staying with his sister. A week later he drove down with his brother-in-law and fetched his wife and children. His wife got a job in Kennedy's Laundry.

Like an endless chain, whole tribes go link by link to some city where a base has been established. When the crisis came to Walter Austin, there was never any doubt where he would go, and when he got there, there were suddenly a total of 36 Austins within a scant half mile.

It was a scene of joy and relief, at 2 o'clock of a Sunday morning, when the two cars finally arrived at their destination, and the Austins of Merigold, Miss., became the Austins of Springfield, Ill., sharecroppers no longer but city dwellers now. Standing wearily on the sidewalk, they looked up with awe at Jimmy Lee's house, a neat, white clapboard with five spacious rooms and its own bathtub and toilet. Waiting inside were the older daughters who had come North earlier, and they helped sort the newcomers and send them to nearby homes to sleep the remaining hours of the night.

That day Walter Austin's family made the rounds of the relatives' homes. At Walter's sister's there were guitars, singing and joshing. The older women put on their wigs and urged Frances to try one. Bashfully, she put one on and imitated the modeling she had seen on television. Suddenly she was changed. One moment she was the shy country girl, the next a poised young woman. She lifted off the wig and said quietly, "I'm going to get one."

The next morning Jimmy Lee's wife took Frances with her to Kennedy's Laundry and introduced her to the boss, George Boehmer. He said, "I like to hire Mississippi people. They're good workers." So 29 hours after her arrival in the city, Frances Austin, working beside white women, was feeding flatwork into a presser and earning more than her father ever did in his 41 years of labor.

That same morning Mrs. Austin and her older daughter went out looking for a flat. In Jimmy Lee's house there were seven preschool children, crying, running, fighting, all tended by a new baby sitter, Walter Austin. He was no longer in overalls. Someone had lent him a white shirt, a pair of slacks and a too-large suit jacket. He stood in the middle of the kitchen with an open carton of milk. He cried out, "Hush, child," to one girl, and tried to restrain another one who was pounding a nail file into the linoleum with a hairbrush. "Soon as they find a place for us to stay, I'm hoping to find a job. Some kind of a job." Then, milk carton still in hand, he looked with bewilderment at the children. "This is one job I do not like."

The Austins had a small start. Four days later they found a pinched five-room flat for $65, where the whole family sleeps in just three beds and the beds are the only furniture in the place. The day after that, Walter Austin got a job that his son Jimmy Lee first had when he moved—mopping floors and washing dishes in a restaurant at $40 a week. His 17-year-old daughter earns $5 more than he does.

The Austins are in real need. They require medical attention, furniture, city clothes, and Walter Austin needs a job that will buy these things. But in some ways they are luckier than many migrants. For one thing, almost by chance, they followed the newer, less hopeless migratory routes from the rural South—more and more to the West and more and more to the medium-size cities. In the smaller cities the rate of growth is often better than in the huge ones, the Negro districts are distinct but lack the oppressiveness of square miles of squalor, and in a smaller community it is easier to match available men with available jobs.

Walter Austin had just left Merigold, Miss., which has a population of 602. When he heard that his new home, Springfield, had 86,000 people, of whom 5,000 are Negroes, he opened his eyes wide and said, "Good gracious!"

In Chicago there are a million Negroes.

II

The fact that migrants move means they hope for something better. The hope lasts remarkably long, so long that it seems a miracle in such places as the ghettos of cities like Chicago. Alice Perkins has been there almost two years now; she is wiser to the struggle than the Austins, harder to the squalor, but she still hopes for something better, hopes in the diminishing optimism that time and the ghetto steadily wear away.

She is a statuesque woman of 27 with a husky voice and a sardonic expression, and she lives in a second-floor flat on Van Buren Street in the middle of Chicago's West Side ghetto. Official statistics show that in 1960, eighty percent of all dwellings in her block were substandard and 30 percent lacked normal plumbing, but you don't need statistics to get the message: rubble and garbage is spread in vacant lots, the stairways are dark and dirty. Her door is untypically painted a fresh green, and on it her husband has used gay, red Christmas tape to letter out most of his name: HARRY PERKI—. But the door, typically, is locked several different ways and shows wounds from having been forced open several different ways. Inside there are rats the size of cats, and the children sleep crossways, usually four to a bed. The younger ones are normally barefoot and half bare-bodied so that the three older children can be properly dressed for school. Yet Alice Perkins and her husband have no doubt about the decision she made in the middle of a cotton field two years ago.

That day in August, 1965, she had, as usual, got up at 5:30 in their three-room shack, washed her face in a pail in the kitchen and, without breakfast, gone out to get on the back of a truck. In the field a mile away she dragged a bag nine feet long, putting in cotton balls, the ones a machine left behind. Early in the day the plantation agent started yelling that the cotton she and the others had picked was full of burrs and sticks. At noon she walked a half mile to a store and ate 10 Saltines, five pieces of baloney and a soda pop. Back in the field, The Man kept after them. "You-all are pullin' this goddamn cotton. I'm paying you to pick it, and you're just pullin' the goddamn stuff."

Toward the end of the afternoon he was still at it, and Alice Perkins said, "I don't have to take this no more I'm going." She said it to herself.

She got back home that night at 6 o'clock. She had picked 84 pounds and made $2.10 minus lunch, for 11 hours. She cooked turnip greens and a pound of salt pork for her five children and her husband, who came home after dark from driving a tractor at $6 a day. The children went to bed, the oldest one, Beatrice, then 7, in a cot in their front room, the infant in the double bed she and her husband used, also in the front room. Her husband and two neighbors played a game of cards, pit-a-pat, also in the front room.

Without telling Harry about it, she found two pieces of lined paper and a short pencil, and she wrote a letter to her aunt in Chicago. "I can't stand it no more," she wrote, "please, Aunty, send me a ticket." She walked in the dark across the dirt road to a neighbor's house where she got an envelope and put the letter and a nickel in her rural mailbox. This was a Wednesday. Tuesday the tickets arrived. Then she told her husband she wanted to take their three youngest children and go. If she found no job in two weeks she would return. He listened quietly and said, "OK, baby."

So Alice Perkins joined the silent tide that goes by car, by bus, and still by that old reliable carrier of the cotton Negro, the Illinois Central Railroad.

On the platforms of the South they are there every day. The toothless old Negro woman in men's trousers, rubbers over slippers, a ragged coat, scarf over her head, a cardboard box tied with twine, the last tenacious root of a family gone earlier.

The neatly dressed woman in her 30's comforting her weeping teen-age daughter, "Don't cry, baby. Take care of Daddy and the kids and I'll be back when I find a place."

The young woman in her 20's, so like Alice Perkins, with three wide-eyed preschool children, hugging older people on the platform and then, as the locomotive sounds its mournful southern cry, mounting the steps with her children, her eyes moist.

The old Negro porter watches the flat countryside stream monotonously by, as he has for 32 years on this run.

"It started in 1947. This train went through the delta, and there was nothing but black faces, for years and years and years. I used to wonder, 'Where are they coming from? How can there be anybody left? My God, they must be coming right out of the ground. They got to stop sometime.'

"Well, couple of years ago it seemed to slack off. You begin to see some whites now. Used to be twenty-thirty Negroes for every white on this train. Now it's more like three-to-one."

But there are still Negroes. At Durant, the station stop nearest the heart of the delta, more country people get on with boxes and old suitcases. As the train pulls out, it leaves others behind. Through the rain-splattered window you see the lonely Negro shack with three tiny children frozen in place, one boy hanging clothes on a line, his hand stopped in the act as he stares, another boy with a water pail in his hand, and at the pump a skinny-legged girl, her arm high on the motionless pump handle as the water shrivels to a trickle—all watching the speeding persimmon-and-brown cars with the big picture windows bearing dry, warm people holding passports.

Fires, like this one near Merigold, Miss., symbolize the flight of Negroes to the North: When a sharecropper goes, his shack is often burned.

The passport is a yellow ticket one-and-a-half-inches long that reads, "Illinois Central R.R. Co., coach ticket, Durant, Miss., to CHICAGO, ILL. Good in coaches only, for one passage. . . ." It costs $23.65 for adults, $11.83 for young children, and for the people who got on in Durant with a typical family, if they earned average Negro wages, it took every cent they earned for six weeks. To collect that much money, when food is scarce, and to decide to migrate is a decision that has torn millions of families in this generation.

Alice Perkins took that other mode of the Underground Railroad—the bus. On a Wednesday before the Christmas holidays, Harry Perkins got a letter from Alice in Chicago. He had to quit school in the fifth grade and can't read (Alice went through ninth grade), so he paid a neighbor 50 cents to drive him the two miles to his mother-in-law's house where she read the letter. Tickets for him and the two older children were inside. The next day the children turned in their school books. Saturday morning Harry went to work as usual. That night he got his week's pay, $36 minus $10 taken out toward his debts. By now it was dark. He walked home, pulled out a footlocker he had quietly bought in Clarksdale for $7.95 two weeks ago, put in two bedspreads, one quilt, two sheets, three pairs of pants, two shirts and three hats for the children. He paid the neighbor 50 cents again to drive him and the children to his mother-in-law's, where her son drove them to the 9:30 night bus from Clarksdale.

The children had never been to Clarksdale (population, 21,000), and when they saw it Harry Jr., 6, said, "Daddy, is this Chicago?"

On the bus was a man named Willie, brother of a friend, returning after a visit. Willie lived in Chicago and worked in a barrel factory where he thought there was an opening. Three days later Harry Perkins was stacking steel rings for $1.55 an hour, and three days after that he was running an automatic welder. He now makes $2.00 an hour with six or seven hours' overtime for about $100 a week.

Harry Perkins is a boyish, handsome, open-faced man who can't read but knows letters and remembers street signs and bus routes. At Christmas time he used the holiday tape to make letters on the wall over the double bed where he and his wife and their new infant sleep: ALICE.

Both of them insist on an unrelieved list of advantages Chicago has over their old life: Now they eat together at the same table because they have enough dinner plates; they have milk and fresh fruits and meats they never ate before; instead of a cold-water tub and washboard she gets the week's laundry delivered for $9; the school doctor and dentist examine their children regularly; instead of paying a neighbor $1 to take them shopping she can walk to a local market or take the rapid transit for 30 cents downtown; there the children often stayed out of school for lack of clothes but never here; down there Christmas meant at best a piece of simple clothing for each child, but here they have turkey and fur-lined jackets and guitars for the children.

"Look," Harry Perkins said as he sat in his tiny blue-and-pink kitchen, "for the first time in my life I own an innerspring mattress, three of them, a gas oven, a dinette, a TV, a stereo set. They treat me like a grown man. Down there the police killed colored men, two I knew just in the last couple of years we were there."

Alice Perkins shook her head slowly. "There ain't nothing I miss down there."

He nodded, "That goes for me."

Did that mean they would be happy to continue just as they are?

Alice Perkins looked surprised and said, "No, of course not."

And then she and her husband began a new recital that told the story of why families who move hopefully into the big cities then turn bitter and apathetic. Compared to the desperate poverty and endemic violence of the rural South, the city is obviously better in pay, in food, in material goods. But as the years go by, it becomes plain that the city makes demands the family never before had to meet: more education to get ahead, better clothes to enter the better world, participation in the vague and remote territory outside the ghetto in order to succeed. Food and a tight roof are no longer the focus of life. Simple survival is no longer enough; they must meet the requirements of high-speed urban life. Typically, the families enter eager and striving and then in three or four years get stalled. The Perkinses were still ambitious.

Now, the children want a bicycle, a piano, some new clothes like the ones they see on TV in American Bandstand. Harry Perkins would like to get a car. Mrs. Perkins has fallen in love with sectional couches. But she then described what they want more than anything else. With her husband's solemn nod of approval, she said softly, "A better house with no rats, in a better neighborhood, you know, some space for the kids to play in their own yard, with some grass in the back and in the front."

A nice house in a nice neighborhood is the conventional American family dream, but it has a special meaning in the ghetto, where most families are enclosed in a triple prison. The first is their own home. Slum-tenement doors are locked. The knock is answered, if at all, by a voice, "Who's there? What you want?" Unless the voice is familiar and the message safe, that may be the last communication from the other side. Young children are forbidden to go out alone, and hundreds of thousands of them spend all their time, except for a few hours a week, locked inside their rooms, often with the harshest discipline to quell their restlessness. Only when they go to school is there freedom. When the three Perkins schoolchildren go, they run like rabbits released from cages. The fear is real, for outside there is the second prison: the neighborhood.

The range of movement of most slum dwellers is measured in yards and, at most, a few blocks. The density is enormous, the possibilities for play and relaxation almost nil. A 50-by-100-foot playground operated by the Marillac settlement house near the Perkinses' flat is the only one available to 4,000 children. One result of this merciless compaction is the teen-age gang, which follows a territorial imperative that includes murder of teen-agers who intrude from other neighborhoods. For all of them are trapped in the larger prison, the ghetto itself.

In Chicago the ghetto is divided in two territories, the West Side, with more than 300,000 Negroes, and the South Side, with more than 600,000. Each is a vast black island surrounded by whites. In 1950 there were only 500,000 Negroes in the city, in about five smaller islands interspersed among white neighborhoods. But now the spaces between the islands have been abandoned by whites who moved to the suburbs. So now the West Side is almost 9 square miles of black territory, the South Side, 30 square miles. On the South Side there remain a few white ethnic neighborhoods, resentful and belligerent, and some middle- and even upper-income blocks. But the mass is black and poor, the former rows of white homes partitioned and bringing in as much as 200 per cent of their old rents. In 1950 it was possible in any given ghetto to walk five blocks to a white neighborhood; now on the South Side a man can walk ten miles almost in a straight line, and never pass a home occupied by whites.

Inside the ghetto the schools are wretched, the unemployment rate three times the outside rate, the municipal services minimal, the landscape demoralizing. The uneducated parents get stalled in their climb up the work ladder, trapped in their ghetto. They produce new generations of the defeated.

So Alice Perkins, her large brown eyes longing, says, "I want a house of my own. Out in the suburbs. Like Maywood. A friend of mine drove me out there once and, oh, I want to move to a place like Maywood."

Maywood is about nine miles out on the expressway that goes by the Perkinses' flat, an "industrial suburb" in the metropolitan sprawl. It has its own character, a pleasant place of 27,000 working-class people with small one-family houses with small lawns front and back, children on swings in the yard or skipping rope on the side walks. There are 5,000 Negroes in Maywood, and they average $1,500 a year more than Negroes in the central city.

What are the odds of the Perkinses, or any ghetto family, making it out to a Maywood? About 1-in-11. In 1960 Chicago had 813,000 Negroes in its central city, the ghetto, and only 77,000 in the suburbs. In 1950 the ratio was about the same.

III

Elijah is a child of migrants, a child of the ghetto. He is Negro, thin, 126 pounds, five-foot-four, narrow-headed with slicked-down black hair, and he walks slightly stooped. If you didn't look closely you wouldn't pay attention to him in a group of six. But he is now 18, and has shot a few people. He has been involved in more burglaries and robberies than is wise to recall, and has had two personal friends murdered and countless others badly wounded. He has recently emerged from jail, where he was sent for shooting another boy in the stomach.

Elijah isn't his real name, though he insisted that his real name be used.

"Listen, I want people to understand, I want people to believe that these things happen, really, man, not just to a few oddballs but every kid I knew, every kid I grew up with on the South Side of Chicago. I don't mean they all went to jail. Two kids I knew well got killed. But some never went to jail, even. But this is what they grew up with. I want to help my people, and I want other people to know what's going on."

But it would be unfair to him, to his family and to his pregnant girlfriend to use real names. They are all struggling to repair their lives.

His parents came from Mississippi in 1952, but his mother came briefly to Chicago in 1949 for Elijah to be born. So since the age of three he has been in the ghetto. His training ground has been the tenement and the massive public-housing project.

The tenements are typified by one building in the ghetto, a grimy red-brick three-story place with three carved granite archways that tell you this was once a respectable neighborhood. Today there are 18 families in the building, and except for one that arrived last year from Texas, all have been in Chicago seven years or more. There are large signs all over the outside of the building, ordering trash to be thrown in barrels. Under the signs are glaciers and foothills of garbage that harbor huge rats. The children play among them with easy familiarity. (Landlords, by law, are required to provide private trash collections, but few of them ever bother; if an intense campaign by tenants and the settlement houses puts pressure on them, some will bribe city trash crews to collect the accumulation.) The tenement hallways are uriniferous, the walls covered with badly spelled obscenities ("thomas muther is a hoe"). In one corridor there is loose garbage, some feces in a corner and a raw egg broken on the floor. Out of one flat come two children less than four years old, one wearing only a dirty diaper, the other only a tiny T-shirt. Behind them comes a very old woman flailing at them with a leather strap. The children laugh and run down the corridor, one stepping in the egg, the other in the feces.

Ten of the 18 families are on welfare. Only five of the 18 families have a man as head of the household. There are 123 human beings who live in the old wreck of a building, of whom 98 are dependent children, 73 of them without a father at home. Eight of the households, despite great poverty, illness and other difficulties, have a tidy flat and a complete family. The landlord is considered better than average; the building has a market value of $25,000, and his gross rents are $24,000 a year.

Elijah spent the first part of his life growing up in such a building, and the rest in the other kind of ghetto dwelling, the large public-housing project. For most tenement residents, the project is a highly desired escape from what they have. Rents are lower—in Chicago they run from $40 to $90 a month for modern, well-equipped flats, with space enough to avoid having children of different sexes sleeping in the same beds and the same rooms. There are no rats. So just as the old tenements are better than the leaky three-room shacks of the South, "the projects" are deliverance from the chaos and squalor of the tenements. But after a few years in the projects their tenants begin to suffer their drawbacks, and many pray harder than ever for deliverance to the suburbs, or any place that is clean and airy and not packed with an incredible density of human beings.

Cities like Chicago turned to high-rise projects to house as many families as cheaply as possible as quickly as possible and, in many cases, to keep Negroes within the bounds of the ghetto. On a strip of land two blocks wide and less than four miles long, the Chicago Public Housing Authority built 65 buildings, 38 of them 16 stories or higher. In these buildings, in less than half a square mile, live 42,800 people. Little was done in surrounding areas to provide for the cliff-dwellers when they came out of the project. Boredom and noise are constant. In the summer the young who are still innocent wait for the event of the night—the turning on of the outside lights of the stairwells, and as each building does it a great soft wind seems to blow through the projects as thousands of watching children go, "Ah."

It is not surprising that territorial warfare and delinquency grow in such places. One wonders what would happen if a place of the same population, like Rapid City, S. Dak., instead of having its slightly more than 42,000 citizens spread over its present 16 square miles, had them all—including the sturdy, hard-working, middle-class folk—jammed into one quarter of a square mile. The people of Rapid City live 2,701 to the square mile; the project dwellers in Chicago's South Side live 170,000 to the square mile.

Elijah is the unhappy product, first of the horizontal and then of the vertical ghetto.

He is the oldest of 10 children, and he remembers that when his family came from Mississippi his father worked in the stockyards. The children kept coming, but work at the stockyards got scarcer. First there was no more lunch money, then no breakfasts. His father spent more days at home, then began to drink. When Elijah was 7, his father disappeared.

At the age of 11, Elijah joined the Cobras, a street gang that dominated his neighborhood. They fought rival gangs who intruded in their territory, or tried to date their girls, or uttered real or imagined insults. Avenging honor and protecting territory were the motivations for gang fights, the justifications for maiming and murder. Looking back and explaining it, Elijah often uses the word, "recognition."

"The poor people were the dumbest people because they didn't have any backing, they didn't push, nobody gave them any recognition. So most of us started gang fighting because of that. With the knowledge I've acquired since then it seems like I would never dream of going back to a life like that. But before I got the knowledge, it seemed fine, it seemed right, it was an art. The things you did you didn't mind telling about because you were trying to get more recognition with the bunch. You would meet girls, girls you never could have otherwise, the ones who dressed nice and looked nice. When your name was mentioned, everyone's eyes and ears opened."

After he joined the gang he began skipping school, attending parties in empty flats, drinking wine, having girls, smoking marijuana. He thinks his father's absence made a difference. "When your father is there, there are things you wouldn't dare bring into the house because your father would give you a whipping. I could do lots of things I could get by with, things my father would know about because he's a man and I'm a man, stealing, drinking, girls, smoking reefers."

As he moved into his teens, Elijah became more violent. "I could see I wasn't going to become anybody. All this was hitting me at the same time as the gang fighting, and it made me even harder because I knew this, I knew I wasn't going to become anybody, and I hated the whole world then.

"I began to use the gun more frequently, and in a gang fight I'd be the first to swing, the first to shoot. I hated conditions. I hated everything. I hated people around me because they had more than I had. I hated it when the kids were supposed to go to school and only had torn or dirty pants, and after you got to school there wasn't any lunch money, and you stood outside and got laughed at, and when you got home there was hardly anything to eat there, either."

Three things made a difference in Elijah's life. He went to jail for shooting a boy and read a book whose dust jacket in the prison library caught his eye: "I Dare You to Explore the Powers of Your Mind." With the help of a prison worker he began to read and to look into his own emotions.

He got five years' probation and came out to discover that his father had returned home, dried out, and was working at a good job in construction.

And he met Jim Taylor, a Y.M.C.A. street-gang worker who lives and works with teen-agers in the tougher neighborhoods, a schoolteacher who realized he wasn't reaching his students and quit to go where they lived. With Taylor's help Elijah signed up for a Y.M.C.A. study program where he works half a day and goes to school, combining the last years of high school and the first two years of college.

This will take until 1971. His work during that time will be with street gangs. "You've got to have something for these kids to do," Elijah said. "You've got to have someone who cares about them. Not just spending a few hours like most schoolteachers and then, zip, out of the neighborhood. But really caring, man.

"And you need new prizes, new rewards. Now it's the kid who fights the hardest, drinks the most, has the most girls, kills best. I'd like to make the big man, the one who's top of his class, and give him a special prize, a real good prize that would make people open up their eyes and ears. It would help. I know it would."

Elijah speaks with a combination of the soft Mississippi accent of his parents and the hip talk of the ghetto. He has studied and thought a great deal lately about the Negro American in the ghetto.

"When the Negro is born in the South, he grows up with hatred for the white man, but in the South they kill him if he shows it. So he comes to Chicago, and he lives here on the South Side, and he takes out his hatred on other Negroes. You get born with hatred because you see the white man in his Cadillac, and you see your father walking. The hate is in you, and when someone attacks you, the hate is going to come out, no matter if it comes out against your own people."

Elijah and his fellow migrants are mysteries. In the face of endless defeat, first on the farms and now in the ghetto, they have recurring hope. It is often expressed in riots and demonstrations, but it is there. The newest arrivals continue to work hard at the lowest pay in the expectation that it will lead to something better. The history books claim that the American genius has been to collect ethnic minorities at the bottom and then let them disperse up through the surrounding society. But the American Negro continues to be more densely packed, more hemmed in, and more confined to the bottom than any other migrant minority. And yet he continues to hope.

Elijah had been standing at a window through which I could hear the level roar of boisterous children, their sounds echoing between the 16-story buildings. He turned around, his brow wrinkled with concentration, and said with passion:

"The thing is that you grow up and, you know, you know, man . . . " He paused and said slowly and quietly, "No-body cares! Mothers are screaming at babies, there's no father, teachers are screaming at the students, and when the bell rings they leave the building before the kids do. And when you're dropping out of school, you know very well that they're really glad to see you go. You're glad to go, too, but you remember afterward that they were glad to see you go."

Elijah sat down, and after a time he spoke again.

"Nobody cares. Nobody. That's what you grow up with. The people on the outside, they have their own immediate problems, so they got no time for our problems. The ones here who get anywhere, they don't care about anybody else once they get up on their pedestal. They look down on their own people, and they say, 'They're fools' and then go on about their business."

And then the incredible hope and resilience:

"My kids, someday, are going to finish school—a good school. They're going to have a set of goals, to think ahead, to make sense. But most of all, they got to have environment."

Environment?

"Live in a good house in a nice neighborhood with a real school. Out of . . ." and he pointed out the window to the tenements, the projects, the street with the squeal of the police siren receding. "Out of here. Period." □

For additional copies of this reprint, write: National Sharecroppers Fund, 112 East 19 Street, New York N.Y. 10003

RURAL PROBLEMS

Farm Labor Organizing 1905-1967

A Brief History

1-61

The Federal Executive and Civil Rights

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

THE FEDERAL EXECUTIVE

AND # CIVIL RIGHTS

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

January, 1961

This report was prepared by the staff and reviewed by the officers of the Southern Regional Council. In its preparation, the Council was assisted by advice and suggestions from some forty persons notably qualified by their study and experience in this field.

A special debt of gratitude is due Daniel H. Pollitt, Associate Professor of Law at the University of North Carolina, for preliminary legal research and analysis.

There are areas of social policy, such as welfare and farm programs, which basically affect race relations but do not directly raise questions of civil rights. These areas are not discussed.

Also omitted from discussion are personal as distinguished from official activities of the President. Their importance is in no degree minimized. Since the Presidency is a focal point of American interest, all of the acts of an occupant of that office receive national attention and thus set an example for millions of Americans. This is one of the fringe attributes of the office.

Presidential authority greatly exceeds constitutional or legal definition; much of it springs from the high personal regard and even affection in which the Chief Executive is held. Therefore, a President of robust conviction will lose no occasion, however trivial, to show by purely personal action his admiration of principles of equality. Such demonstration may be worth fully as much as executive orders and formal pronouncements.

THE PROPOSALS

Page (s)

I. THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

A. Internal Policies and Organization

1. An adviser on race relations could perform valuable services for the President, and could also participate helpfully in the program planning of the Commission on Civil Rights and the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice. There is, furthermore, a strong case for establishment of an office, with adequate staff, to review the execution of all governmental programs and expenditure of all government funds, for compliance with the policy of non-discrimination. ..... 1 - 5

B. National Leadership

2. National unity will be served best if the President speaks forthrightly to and of the South, and if he and his administration confine their statements of policy regarding racial discrimination to that which they are prepared to enforce. The President and his administration could specially contribute to the abatement of sectionalism by frequent conferences and consultations, publicized or not as they see fit, with Southern economic and political leaders, to the end of broadening the base of Southern support for civil rights and equal opportunities. ..... 5 - 8

II. THE POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT

A. Broad Policy

3. The President, by public statement, should set as a national goal the full and free development of all our human resources, and should pledge a painstaking effort by all federal departments and agencies to administer their programs in such ways as to hasten the end of discriminations. ..... 9 - 11

4. The effort of America to establish racial harmony and justice enables our people to understand the aspirations of formerly colonial peoples, and for them to identify their hopes with ours. Those who represent America abroad should interpret our racial strife and change with truthfulness and candor. ..... 11 - 12

Page (s)

B. Federal Employment

5. There should be overall review of federal employment practices, without waiting for complaints and with the aim of immediate compliance with the policy of non-discrimination. Agencies whose functions are critically related to civil rights have a pressing need for Negro staff. Mindful of the cumulative effects of past discrimination, the government could be a yardstick for private employers by careful experimentation with techniques for the measuring of job potential. ..... 12 - 15

6. Real advantages would accrue to the country from frequent appointment of competent Negroes to high level administrative posts. Negroes can be valuable assets in the representation of the United States abroad, but not if they are used primarily in non-white capitals. 15 - 16

C. Education

7. We urge upon the President that he

--publicly affirm his full support of the Supreme Court's 1954 decision and his intention to employ his executive powers as needed to assure orderly compliance with it;

--publicly affirm his administration's belief that segregation is an intolerable hindrance to the national goal of higher educational standards;

--direct the Attorney-General to look closely into the authorizations he has for initiating or intervening in school desegregation cases;

--direct the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare to assemble and disseminate, for the use of educators and the instruction of the public, educational facts related to the integration process. ..... 16 - 20

8. The vast federal outlays for public school education need to be administered with scrupulous regard for the basic federal policy against discrimination. At the present time, the two areas of vocational training and schooling for children of military personnel merit special attention to insure racial equality and fair-dealing. ..... 20 - 21

9. An announcement ought to be made that, at a date certain, no research funds will be granted by the federal government to any institution of higher learning (or its faculty), public or private, which refuses admission to anyone because of race, creed, color, or national origin. ..... 21 - 22

Page (s)

D. Security of Person and Property

10. While the present turmoil continues, the Department of Justice has an obligation to enforce vigilantly the existing statutes and precedents which protect personal security, and to discharge fully the federal government's duty to preserve the public peace; in particular, every available means should be used to assure orderly school desegregation and the right of peaceable assembly and protest. ..... 22 - 25

E. Voting

11. The Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice should be staffed with an adequate number of attorneys of first quality, and the Division's working relationships with the U. S. District Attorneys should be so defined as to permit widespread enforcement of the voting provisions of the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. ..... 25 - 28

12. A national registration drive, under the personal sponsorship of the President, should be launched, and supported by publications describing registration and voting qualifications and procedures in each state.... 27 - 28

F. Armed Services

13. The National Guard in Southern states is the remnant of segregation in the armed services; segregation in Southern colleges and universities, and the mode of selection of academy cadets and midshipmen, restrict the opportunities for Negroes to become military officers. All of these situations are within the power of the President to remedy or ameliorate. ..... 28 - 30

G. Health, Recreation

14. Health and recreational programs, both of which bring the government into close personal touch with people, need to be constantly audited for discriminatory effects. Continued observance of the "separate, but equal" clause in the Hill-Burton Act is Constitutionally dubious, and should be authoritatively examined.. 30 - 31

Page (s)

H. Transportation

15. Interstate travel is a field in which a final federal effort could decisively end segregation. The clearly established unconstitutionality of segregation in common carriers operated intra-state invites serious study by the Department of Justice of means to require observance of the Constitutional principle. ..... 31 - 32

I. Contractor Employment

16. There needs to be more effective enforcement of the bar against discriminatory employment by government contractors. Large contractors can be appropriately charged with a special responsibility for positive recruitment of Negroes; an appropriate means of requiring this would be prior certification as a condition for award of contract. ..... 32 - 36

17. Federal cooperation with discrimination should be ended at once in the apprenticeship and employment services.. 36

J. Housing

18. A declaration by the President that federal housing programs will be guided by a belief in the values of integration would be the soundest basis for an Executive Order prohibiting discrimination. Because the federal government has been a principal architect of housing segregation, there is special reason for it continuously to evaluate its success in reversing the process. Adverse reactions, especially in the South, are to be expected to firm policies; Presidential leadership can be decisive in allaying and overcoming them. ..... 36 - 47

III. CONCLUSION ..... 48

I. THE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

A. Internal Organization and Policies

The President holds power under the Constitution and existing statutes which, diligently exercised, could carry the country far toward racial relations that are sane and honorable. These powers should be examined and responsibly used.

As with many ideas that are much discussed, the words "Presidential leadership" sometime appear to be an abstraction, unhung from the life of the office and the man who must occupy it. We think that leadership in race relations means a showing of concern, in all the countless acts of the office, that America be a place where men live with each other in confidence, and society cooperates with each of its members in the fulfillment of his search for a good life.

Race relations is America's oldest unsolved problem. The problem is now at a stage of crisis, though certainly not for the first time. Crises of the past were resolved, by compromise, by war, and, during the long years from 1877 to 1933, by national avoidance of responsibility. The present crisis will be, somehow, overcome. What is important is that the nation dedicate itself this time to solutions that will endure, and that will not breed future conflict. This ancient and always divisive issue has a claim on us not only for settlement, but for a decisive resolution. It is a burden which national self-respect demands that we finally lay down.

Negroes are not the only disadvantaged minority, and the South is not the only locus of discrimination against Negroes. The racial problems of the South are, however, now and throughout our history the acute test of American ideals of liberty and equality. There is little in the record to encourage the belief that the situation in the South will improve unless recognized as the nation's failure, and properly subject therefore to national policy.

Because ours is a government under a Constitution, Negroes have secured through court action the enforcement of many of their rights. The judicial process is not, however, a valid substitute for political leadership. The courts can only guardedly look beyond the case at bar, and their decrees have limited application. Negro Americans, whose resources have been taxed severely in financing and manning what is in truth a defense of everybody's constitutional principles, have a just claim that the President and his administration give invigorating guidance toward real equality. The nation as a whole needs to feel the impulse of Presidential concern and activity. The free peoples of the world, who value the reputation of the United States, wait to see us act with fairness toward our own citizens.

Presidential action should not be so emphasized that it will blunt the drive for much needed remedial legislation. But the existing powers of the office should be used, and every governmental program ought to be administered in such ways as to move expeditiously to end discrimination and to open all careers to talent.

A new administration cannot give itself a civil rights policy, tie it together, and expect its unwinding over the years to satisfy the problems that will arise. Clarity of policy at the beginning is essential. But racial relations are human relations, and the government needs to equip itself, both organizationally and, more importantly, with inward commitment, to a steady alert, to a sensitivity for people, to a readiness for imaginative action. More is required, therefore, than broad policy decisions; there must also be solid organizational planning.

The federal government, besides being the country's largest employer, administers many programs affected by, and influencing, racial relations. In the preceding three administrations, various committees and advisers have been employed to represent and enforce the government's interest in non-discrimination. The committees, such as the President's Committee on Government Employment and the Government Contract Committee, have been understaffed and have had a disjointed status in the administrative structure; moreover, their enforcement authority has been meagre. The race relations advisers employed by several agencies have appeared to be concessions intended to allay pressures rather than integral figures in policy making and implementation. The time has come for the government to organize itself to do a necessary task. The principal elements of the problem seem to be the following:

Internal Consistency

The federal government's own operations need to be a model of just race relations, or else the credentials of the government to lead others are weak. This means that the government must hire, fire, and promote with obvious regard for racial equity; must eradicate segregation in its offices; must administer its vast affairs in scrupulous accord with its published statements of belief. It follows that every appointee to high office, whether or not he may personally endorse the goal of immediate non-discrimination, should be informed that in his official acts he is committed to that aim.

Staff Assistance

The President should seriously consider his need for a staff adviser. These are days of tension in the South. The President will from time to time have to react to specific developments, such as a school or a sit-in controversy. He may want to interpret these events to the country and he may want to assert the national viewpoint regarding them. He ought to have an aide whose judgment and experience he trusts. Moreover, in the normal course of his duties the President will on numerous other occasions meet questions where staff help will be beneficial. He will require assistance in the framing and supervision of Executive Orders.

Coordination

Both the Commission on Civil Rights and the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice are engaged in investigations of deprival of rights by state and local governments. Even though the aim of the Commission is reporting, and that of the Division is law enforcement, there should be intimate coordination between the two. To effect this could be another duty of the President's adviser.

Administrative Supervision

There is the unavoidable task of policing. This is a function unlike and apart from policy planning and coordination. The President should seriously consider creation of a single office to supervise and investigate the execution of all programs, including federal and contractor employment, which have consequences for race relations. The office would require an adequate staff or else it would not be effective; its director would need to be a person of stature sufficient to deal with departmental and agency heads; he should have access to the President.

The general function of the office would be as a watchdog over federal programs. It should be empowered to receive reports and to prescribe their nature; to receive complaints and to investigate them; and to counsel with the agencies. The clear responsibility for enforcement of non-discriminatory policies should remain with the agencies. There are practical difficulties in the establishment of such an office, but perhaps they are no greater than have been overcome in other cases. Conceivably, the staff could be on loan from other agencies, or could be located in some agency, such as the Bureau of the Budget (as President Truman's Committee on Civil Rights recommended). The usefulness of the office would be great enough to justify the administrative ingenuity needed for its formation. Equalization of citizenship is a paramount goal which justifies an extraordinary administrative tool, for use in behalf of that decisive resolution which an old dilemma requires.

1. An adviser on race relations could perform valuable services for the President, and could also participate helpfully in the program planning of the Commission on Civil Rights and the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice. There is, furthermore, a strong case for establishment of an office, with adequate staff, to review the execution of all governmental programs and the expenditure of all government funds, for compliance with the policy of non-discrimination.

B. National Leadership

To discuss federal policies for race relations without acknowledging the political vicissitudes surrounding energetic action is unrealistic. A declining but still formidable section of political strength, applied at both national and state levels, exists to combat any assertion of the national interest in civil rights. There are thousands of white Southerners who have shown a willingness, which may be expected to continue, to use their physical and economic strength to frustrate reform. There will be no advance without controversy, intense and sometimes bitter.

We believe we speak with knowledge of the South when we say that controversy and conflict are only worsened when there is any arguable doubt of the beliefs and intentions of the Chief Executive, when heated strife is followed by only slight and ambiguous victories for civil rights, or when the federal government and its agencies proclaim policies which are not enforced.

The President is and should be President of all the people. He has no higher duty than the maintenance and perfection of national unity. He is the representative of white men and Negroes, Northerners and Southerners, believers in equality and believers in segregation. He and his office are the focal point of the wills of all these, and it is no part of his Constitutional obligation to attack any legitimate group, interest, or body of opinion.

Yet the President of the United States in the 1960's ought carefully to decide what are the necessary conditions of national unity. We think they do not reside in the perpetuation of sectionalism. The white population of eleven Southern states is roughly 20% of the nation's total. These are people who, besides being numerous, have been a seed bed throughout our history of able statesmen, treasured writers, and valorous military men. They are not a people to be contemned or shunned. And there could be no greater mistake than to assume that this 20% is a monolith. A large proportion would welcome, or at least have no objection to, a broadening of civil rights because, more keenly than do persons in other regions, they want to be emancipated from the heavy, age-old weight. There are state governments which have given clear indication, in the language of political maneuver, of their willingness to be silent followers of a national consensus. There is, in short, within the ranks of white Southerners practical, effective support for reform which ought not to be undervalued.

Ours is a federal government under a Constitution of limited powers. That this is so is a great national inheritance. There is no reason, however, why we should continue to struggle over long overthrown political theories and long repudiated Constitutional principles.

The South should be informed where the President stands. Statements ought to be more, and not less, frequent than in the past and ought to be genuinely helpful to public understanding. That a state of near anarchy could exist for weeks in one of our largest cities without any public remark by the Chief Executive is well nigh incredible. At the same time, an earnest, informed, and tactful effort should be made to reduce antagonisms and enlist a maximum of Southern good will and cooperation. The millions of Southerners, white and Negro, who want to break loose from enfeebling customs would respond with gratitude to Presidential leadership. The economic and political leaders of the South who feel they need authoritative backing in order to act as their reason and self-interest tell them they should--and there are many in this position--would welcome Presidential support.

2. National unity will be served best if the President speaks forth- rightly to and of the South, and if he and his administration confine their statements of policy regarding racial discrimination to that which they are prepared to enforce. The President and his administration could specially contribute to the abatement of sectionalism by frequent conferences and consultations, publicized or not as they see fit, with Southern economic and political leaders, to the end of broadening the base of Southern support for civil rights and equal opportunities.

II. THE POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT

A. Broad Policy

Since slaves were first brought to our shores, and since 1865 when slavery was outlawed, Negro Americans have progressed far in material things and in social and legal status. This is not, however, the pertinent fact. What is relevant to our day is that Negroes are a disadvantaged tenth of Americans from, literally, the cradle to the grave. By American standards, the typical Negro is born without adequate prenatal care, of undereducated parents, who dwell in an unstable neighborhood permeated and surrounded by cultural and economic poverty. He is reared amid deprivation and discrimination. His schools are inferior. His contacts with influences which stimulate ambition and civility are few and infrequent. He learns early the handicaps of his color and his incentives are fashioned to fit the bleak reality. If he lives in the South he will work either in jobs white men disdain or within the limited range of the Negro community; if he lives in the North he will have to display superior skills in order to work at the same level with white men. He will be subject to slights, inequities, and ofttimes intimidation or violence. He will endure all his life the ignominy of having to wheedle, bargain, negotiate, or campaign for his elemental rights.

Unless we are recklessly to reject the findings of scientists, we must acknowledge to ourselves that these conditions are intolerable. The authoritative testimony of science is that there is no evidence of innate racial differences in intelligence; that unstable environments are an extravagance for the public economy and a menace to the public peace; that talents are not the hereditary property of racial groups, but individual capacities nourished by education and security and incentive; that destructive internal resentments and anxieties are the predictable lot of both the systematic oppressor and oppressed.

America has no undeveloped resource comparable to the reservoir of human talent which, in our Negro population, is going to waste. We need manpower and we leave it untrained. We need brains and talents and we allow them to lie fallow. We need to restore the social health of our cities and we do little to prevent their greater infection with the virus of disorganization and spiritual deadness. We need to deepen our sense of purpose and our confidence in our country and its cause, and we allow prejudice to be institutionalized and our national values to be layered with hypocrisy. We need the friendship of the non-white peoples of Africa and Asia, and we subject our own non-white citizens to indignity.

Moreover, unless we are heedlessly to ignore the ministry offered by the near unanimous voice of our Christian and Jewish religious leaders, we must acknowledge the enormous wrong involved in our present racial relations.

The President speaks the moral tone of America. He has an imcomparable position from which to define the problems of our polity and to indicate by word and example what needs to be done.

There would be inestimable value if the President gave, simply and clearly, a declaration of national intent to move vigorously to end all discrimination and disadvantages of race, and a pledge that the federal government in the conduct of its own affairs would show the way. The ensuing sections of this memorandum will suggest some of the specific things which the executive department can do toward this end.

3. The President, by public statement, should set as a national goal the full and free development of all our human resources, and should pledge a painstaking effort by all federal departments and agencies to administer their programs in such ways as to hasten the end of discriminations.

When a question has been before the country as long as this one of Negro discrimination, it is entitled to be treated with candor and open dealing. These same qualities should inspire our information work abroad. No one wants to "sell America short," but there is a practical value in being believed when you speak. The U. S. Information Agency should, of course, tell the story of Negro Americans' progress. But it and other officials who depict abroad American racial problems should do so with honesty, realism, and an explicit awareness of American involvement in a world-wide revolutionary movement. The peoples of Africa and Asia can understand our problems, which are very close to their own experience. We should relate them frankly, as a people mindful of its troubles and working, as are the former colonial nations themselves, to remove them. There are African and Asian countries struggling to erase caste discriminations, tribal antagonisms, and religious distrust. There are analogies here which ought to make it possible for them to understand our situation, but only if the government of the United States--far from being an agent of oppression--is and can be depicted as being the friend of equality and Negro advance.

Foreign Service officers when in Washington might well be instructed in the complexities of our racial relations and familiarized with the President's policies, in order that they can better explain developments abroad.

4. The effort of America to establish racial harmony and justice enables our people to understand the aspirations of formerly colonial peoples, and for them to identify their hopes with ours. Those who represent America abroad should interpret our racial strife and change with truthfulness and candor.

B. Federal Employment

The Third (and most recent) Report of the President's Committee on Government Employment Policy states that discrimination in federal employment unquestionably exists and that the practice is often deeply entrenched. There is little need to add to this official finding in order to conclude that the 1949 amendment to the Civil Service Act (5 U.S.C.A. sec. 1074), expressly prohibiting racial discrimination, is still being flouted. The bona fides of the federal government should not be left in doubt.

The President's Committee has operated with a hopelessly small staff. The procedures outlined by Executive Order 10590 require the filing of complaints by individuals and the investigation of these by the accused agency itself. The Committee has seen its primary task to be long range education rather than immediate compliance.

We have already stated our opinion that the Committee could well be one of the units replaced by a single office to oversee all the functions of the federal government.

While channels for receiving and investigating complaints are needful, the main enforcement effort ought to be shifted from the processing of complaints and focused on a continuing review of agency practices. Reports from the agencies, prescribed in detail, plus adequate investigators in the office designated to oversee federal practice (see above pages 4-5), would permit a firm check on the disposition of Civil Service Commission referrals and the upgrading of employees.

With all respect for the values of education, the government could, nevertheless, take instruction from its own policy in regard to the armed services, where compliance was the order of the day,and experience with non-discrimination provided its own educational results.

Another concern of the President's watchdog office would be the prompt suppression of segregation wherever it may be practiced in federal offices. Local custom cannot regulate federal conduct.

Beyond the policing role of enforcing non-discrimination, the federal government can, if it so wills, make positive contributions toward equal employment opportunities. One would be programs of positive recruitment of qualified Negroes by personnel officers of the agencies. Those agencies, for example, which recruit on college campuses should give full coverage to the Negro colleges. Another would be the development of new techniques for the evaluation of job candidates.

Some have said that federal hiring should be "color-blind." Others have argued that the nation owes a debt to an oppressed minority, and that the government, therefore, should take to itself a considerable part of the task of quick advancement of Negroes through a deliberate program of projecting Negroes into our public life; having been systematically excluded, Negroes should, from this point of view, be systematically included.

There are several things to be said regarding these differing premises. First, we do not believe that Negroes should be favored over better qualified white persons. Negroes do not want it; governmental efficiency would be harmed; favoritism toward any group has disturbing implications for our democracy. Because they have been the victims of exclusion, Negroes do, however, have a right that there be a systematic opening-up of opportunities for them to learn and develop skills which will enable them to compete fairly. If the powers of the federal government are squarely behind school integration and if the government is administering its educational programs with the objective of encouraging integration and equal opportunity, then the government will be doing its part.

Secondly, however, there is a considerable enough body of research by now for the employment officers of the government to take cognizance of the finding that the potential of persons from disadvantaged groups is not accurately measured by aptitude and achievement criteria derived solely from the experience of the majority groups within our society. This does not necessarily suggest that Negro applicants for federal jobs should be given, for example, a "10 point preference." But it does suggest that federal employment officers could set a valuable example for private employers by studying, in consultation with outside testing specialists, the best known means of estimating potential, and by careful trial of individuals--white and Negro--select for hire or promotion on the basis of estimated potential rather than solely past record.

Thirdly, there are certain offices which are involved closely in questions of race relations. Because of this, it is essential that they have the trust of Negro citizens. There would be good reason, therefore, to make a special effort to recruit qualified Negroes for their staffs. These offices include the U. S. Attorneys, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U. S. Marshalls, the Civil Rights Division, the Commission on Civil Rights, and the housing agencies.

5. There should be overall review of federal employment practices, without waiting for complaints and with the aim of immediate compliance with the policy of non-discrimination. Agencies whose functions are critically related to civil rights have a pressing need for Negro staff. Mindful of the cumulative effects of past discrimination, the government could be a yardstick for private employers by careful experimentation with techniques for the measuring of job potential.

Federal service includes both the merit system and appointive positions. In regard to the latter there is real justification for a policy by the President and other appointing officers of deliberately choosing competent Negroes. There would be nothing novel in such a practice. It has always been understood that the higher level posts of any administration will reflect a geographic, an occupational, even a religious distribution. The first administration to sprinkle the higher government positions with able Negroes will establish a practice taken for granted by subsequent administrations, and self-consciousness about such appointments will quickly end. The appointment of some Negroes to top regional or district positions in the South would not only be an important symbolic act, but would help establish patterns of deepened respect. To project Negroes into public office will be good for the race, because it will strengthen morale and sense of identification with America and will sharpen Negro incentive. It will be good for the South, which needs to get used to the idea of Negro competence and recognition. It will be good for the nation's world reputation.

There is the special situation of the Negro as American representative abroad. Negroes in diplomatic or consular positions in Africa and Asia are excellent representatives of our democracy. We believe that American prestige in these continents would be far more enhanced if Negroes are also regularly sent to European and western hemisphere countries. Basically, what is to be desired is the appointment of Negroes to the Foreign Service, and their routine assignment and progression through the ranks.

6. Real advantages would accrue to the country from frequent appointment of competent Negroes to high level administrative posts. Negroes can be valuable assets in the representation of the United States abroad, but not if they are used primarily in non-white capitals.

C. Education

Pre-eminently the most compelling unfinished business is school integration. Here federal orders have been laid down and issues joined. Respect for law and federal authority requires a prompt resolution.

Six years after the Supreme Court's historic decision there are fewer than 800 Negro children in classes with whites in the states of the old Confederacy, outside of west Texas. There has been no desegregation at all in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and South Carolina, and in Louisiana the enrollment of four Negroes has been greeted with hysterical and virtually insurrectionary resistance. The Supreme Court declared a Constitutional right: yet throughout most of the South the entire burden of exercising that right has fallen on Negroes, while the public treasuries of Southern states are put at the service of denying it; it is an uneven fight. The basic problem is two-fold: to re-establish a climate of respect for law; and to move quickly beyond the pitiful beginnings and steadily toward an end to segregated public education.

The United States has a sovereign interest that there be obedience to its laws. Informed legal opinion suggests that there are valid precedents* for the United States, without asserting any pecuniary or statutory interest, either to initiate action or intervene in private actions in order to take care that its laws are observed; and that the government may also intervene in school desegregation cases under 5 U.S.C.A. sec. 316, which authorizes the Attorney-General to send any officer of his Department to "attend to the interests of the United States in any suit pending" in any court, federal or state. Resistance to the Supreme Court's decision is an assault on the Constitution, and the federal executive should take all authorized measures to bring it to an end.

On the other hand, there is wisdom in counting one's blessings. After numerous law suits and painful self-struggle, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia have given grudging and minimal acquiescence to the law. Crisis is past and these three states have, at least, shown their capacity for orderly adjustment. In whatever states or localities there is now or emerges in the future a willingness to acknowledge Constitutional rights, there is an immense opportunity for the President and his administration to offer quiet, tactful urging and persuasion in behalf of whole-hearted acceptance of the principle of integration.

---

*see In re Debs (158 US 564); S.E.C.v.U.S. Realty Improvement Co. (310 US 434).

The President should always be mindful of the probability that firm statements by him in advance of an initial desegregation might prevent or lessen such convulsions as those of Little Rock or New Orleans. His staff adviser could be of invaluable help in anticipating occasions when disorder threatens and Presidential influence would be useful.

The administration should also be aware that an advance in civil rights in any area tends to assist the cause of school integration. Every move which demonstrates determination to establish the principle of equality in other areas increases the feeling of inevitability of compliance with the Supreme Court's school order. Every move in recognition of Negro competence enhances in Southern eyes the acceptability of Negro children as schoolmates. While government cannot address itself directly to the erasure of the racial prejudice which exists in the hearts and minds of people, it can by its own example and efforts greatly reduce overt discrimination. The resulting respect for the law of the land will be more effective than anything else in helping us to outgrow our prejudices.

Fundamentally, school integration ought not be thought of primarily as a question of civil rights. We need to look at it in another framework as well. The nation needs better schools with higher standards, that will give every American child a training corresponding to the challenge of our times. This is a matter of vital national interest. This is the problem which the country must face, and in doing so think of the impediment of segregated schools. If the country has an interest that every one of its youth be educated to the limits of his potential, segregated schools are an indulgence which cannot be afforded, on grounds of educational practice, social values, or economy.

Consequently, there is an opportunity and, we think, an obligation for the U. S. Office of Education to provide information and counsel to school administrators and teachers engaged in the desegregation process. Attorneys before federal courts in desegregation cases need sources of professional advice. There ought to be analyses, widely disseminated, of the plans adopted in various places, and their success; factual studies of the academic effects of integration; and professional discussion of the technical problems of school administrations during the integration process. Such a publications program would not be unlike fact-finding and advisory services already performed by the Office. In particular, there would seem to be ample authorization in the Cooperative Research in Education Act, 20 U.S.C. secs. 331, 332; activities under this law would have the added advantage of involving universities and state educational agencies.

7. We urge upon the President that he

--publicly affirm his full support of the Supreme Court's 1954 decision and his intention to employ his executive powers as needed to assure orderly compliance with it;

--publicly affirm his administration's belief that segregation is an intolerable hindrance to the national goal of higher educational standards;

--direct the Attorney-General to look closely into the authorizations he has for initiating or intervening in school desegregation cases;

--direct the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare to assemble and disseminate, for the use of educators and the instruction of the public, educational facts related to the integration process.

Educational discrimination against Negroes is cumulative, and this affects with particular hardship the ability of Negroes to earn a living. The federal government has grant-in-aid programs for vocational (including agricultural) education, training in distributive occupations, and vocational rehabilitation; these are administered by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. The question of federal support for unequal and segregated education is raised by these programs in a form different from that of financial aid under P.L. 815 and P.L. 874 for federally affected schools, where the government is, in a sense, assuming the burdens of a tax-payer. The vocational programs must satisfy federal criteria in order to be aided, and are subject to federal regulation. The Department could appropriately require, as it does with the rehabilitation program, that benefits be without racial favoritism, and where classes are a part of the program that they be non-segregated in order to qualify for federal aid.

There is a special question involved in on-base and off-base schooling for children of military personnel. All on-base schools are now officially integrated, even though operated by state and local school authorities; the elementary school at Fort Benning (Ga.), for example, has been integrated for more than six years. A number of on-base schools are, however, all white because there are no Negro children in residence. Usually reliable sources have reported that "gentlemen's agreements" exist in some localities whereby Negro personnel are transferred or housed off-base when their children reach school age; there also are instances of the deeding or leasing of land for school sites to local school boards.

The federal government cannot be a party to evasion of the Constitution. Where off-base schools instruct none, or almost none, but children of military personnel the government has a special interest in seeing that they are non-segregated. In Pulaski County (Ark.), this interest was conscientiously served, even to the point of a Defense Department plan to condemn the school property and annex it to the base. The approach taken by the government in Pulaski County, and the arrangement finally worked out, set a pattern which the government can follow in similar situations.

8. The vast federal outlays for public school education need to be administered with scrupulous regard for the basic federal policy against discrimination. At the present time, the two areas of vocational training and schooling for children of military personnel merit special attention to insure racial equality and fair-dealing.

The executive department administers large grants to schools of higher education for research; the Department of Defense, the Atomic Energy Commission, and the National Science Foundation are probably the largest grantors. In addition, sizeable grants and loans for general support and capital development are made. Where the funds are given or loaned to any institution that applies and is eligible under the statute, it has been argued that the executive department should not, in the absence of legislation, make the award conditional upon a policy of non-discrimination. But with the huge sums distributed for research, the government has all discretion, and grants the money only to schools which it prefers. We think there can be no argument but that it is incongruous to favor any institution which denies admission to Negro students.

9. An announcement ought to be made that, at a date certain, no research funds will be granted by the federal government to any institution of higher learning (or its faculty), public or private, which refuses admission to anyone because of race, creed, color, or national origin.

D. Security of Person and Property

Discussions of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment often give little attention to the word "protection." There are good historical grounds for believing that this was a key concept in the thinking of the framers of the Amendment, and that their intent was to provide federal protection to individual Negroes of the South against inimical acts, official or officially tolerated.* Broadened to include all persons, this is still a high ideal.

*"First, despite differences of opinion concerning the scope of congressional power..., a majority of the members of the Thirty-ninth, Forty-second, and Forty-third Congresses...believed that the equal protection clause did more than condemn official or state action. They believed that it vested Congress at the very least with a primary power to set aside unequal state laws and a secondary power to afford protection to all persons in their enjoyment of constitutional rights when the states failed in their primary responsibility to do so

(cont'd next page)

Law enforcement questions are of two general types. First, there are the traditional questions of unjust police, court, or mob treatment of individual Negroes charged with crime. Instances are, happily, declining. To cope with those which still occur, we know of no remedy available to the executive department other than strict enforcement of, with all their shortcomings, secs. 241 and 242, 18 U.S.C. - the last remnants of the Civil Rights Acts passed in the 1860's and 70's for the protection of persons, and especially Negroes, against deprivation of civil rights.

Security of person and property have their severest present threat in the second problem area, which has to do with the violence, reprisals, and intimidations surrounding school desegregation and sit-in controversies, and Negro voting. There have been bombings and threats of bombings, riots, organized harassment, and threats to personal safety. Accompanying all, there has been for five or more years either by neglecting to enact laws or by refusal or impotence to enforce them...

---

"Second, a majority...regarded Congress as the primary organ for the implementation... This does not mean that the Radical Republicans intended to preclude judicial action...; they did not. ...

"A third principle that emerges from these debates is that the equal protection clause means absolute or perfect equality before the law and condemns every discrimination perpetrated by unequal laws, partial or maladministration of existing laws by courts or executives, or discriminations by quasi-public businesses or agencies possessing a peculiar status or privilege under the law, such as inns, public conveyances, and the like. With respect to whether the equal protection clause of its own force condemned antimiscegenation laws and segregation laws and customs, the evidence is inconclusive." R. J. Harris, The Quest for Equality. Louisiana State University Press, 1960. pp. 53-56.

encouragement of resistance to federal authority, delivered by high officials, the Citizens Councils, and their allies.

The number of Southerners who will resort to violence is small, but their mark is heavy on the region and the nation. When a school in the South is bombed the whole free world suffers. Congress has legislated, by Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1960, to put federal resources into the endeavor to prevent or punish bombings. The enforcement difficulties are obviously great, and appear so even to an outside agency. Nevertheless, the Department of Justice, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, has a larger range within which to act for the suppression of violence.

There is value also in linking the Department closely with the states in a concerted effort. The Attorney-General might appropriately convene a conference of the attorneys-general of the Southern states for the planning of mutual programs; one desirable result of the conference might be the establishment of regular liaison between the enforcement agents of the federal and state governments.

Underlying all policies and practices must be an awareness that the Negro Southerners' campaign for equality is a revolutionary movement. It must be, and can be, contained in non-violence. To this end, a staff adviser to the President, in close touch with events and working closely with the Civil Rights Division, would be invaluable in coordination of federal action to preserve the public peace.

The suggestion has been made that the United States could intervene in, or even initiate, school desegregation cases on the principle of the old Debs case (158 US 564). That case sustained an injunction issued by a federal court, without specific reference to any statute, against acts held to constitute a threat to the general welfare. Whether or not Debs affords a basis for federal intervention generally, the government might carefully consider, even to the point of taking a test case, the use of it as a precedent for the particular problem of threatened or actual violence. The signs of the times are not so difficult to read that an alert government could not anticipate the likelihood of disorder in a school desegregation controversy and be armed in advance to forestall it.

Similarly, the reaction to sit-ins has led to serious breakdowns in the public peace. The Department of Justice should observe local situations with the utmost vigilance for evidence of unlawful arrest, violations of Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1960, and deprivations of First Amendment liberties.

10. While the present turmoil continues, the Department of Justice has an obligation to enforce vigilantly the existing statutes and precedents which protect personal security, and to discharge fully the federal government's duty to preserve the public peace; in particular, every available means should be used to assure orderly school desegregation and the right of peaceable assembly and protest.

E. Voting

Twice in three years, Congress has legislated to protect voting rights. The Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 have to date been the basis of six suits* brought by the Department of Justice, one of which has been carried to the Supreme Court, and disposed of there. Acting under sec. 303 of the Act of 1960, the Department has also required from 17 counties* the production of voting records.

* Against Terrell County (Ga.), Macon County (Ala.), Bienville and Washington Parishes (La.), and Fayette and Haywood Counties (Tenn.). Two separate actions have been filed in each of the Tennessee Counties; technically, therefore, eight suits have been brought.

We think much more could be done. Since the Acts of 1957 and 1960 do not permit broad, sweeping attacks on discrimination, suits are confined to local situations. There must be, therefore, numerous investigations and, where justified, prosecutions.

In another respect, however, it is to be hoped that the new Attorney-General will continue a policy of his predecessor. The suits brought under sec. 131 against private persons and institutions in Fayette and Haywood Counties (Tenn.) show a sophisticated awareness, and a zeal for the actualization of rights, which are commendable.

The Acts of 1957 and 1960 can be enforced no more vigorously than the staffing of the Department's Civil Rights Division permits. In addition to giving immediate attention to the strengthening of this Division, the Attorney-General should look closely into the working relations between it and the U. S. District Attorneys, to the end that there be the fullest cooperation between them and the Division.

When all this has been said, there is much to add on another side. The fact is that throughout large areas of the South, registration and voting are as free as elsewhere in the country. In general, discrimination is today found mainly in the rural sections of the old Black Belt, and not everywhere there. This does not mean that the problem is not serious. It does mean that it is less a regional problem, and more one local to a particular cultural area within the region. The nation ought not to be misled by loud talk: the majority of Southerners will not oppose free access to the ballot. There will consequently be minimal popular resistance to federal actions in this field.

*Wilcox, Montgomery, and Sumter (Ala.); Union (Fla.); Webster, Early, Fayette, and Gwinnett (Ga.); East Carroll, Ouachita, and East Feliciana (La.); McCormick, Clarendon, and Hampton (S.C.); Bolivar, LeFlore, and Forrest (Miss.).

In regard to voting, as with schools, there are values other than civil rights at stake. Our democratic faith requires that there be full and responsible exercise of the franchise. Our record is not good. In the South, about 25% of Negroes of voting age are all that are registered; but only some 60% of whites of voting age are, and though the discrepancy is great the white standard itself is low. The Bureau of the Census has estimated that 107 million Americans are of voting age; yet only about 68 million, or less than 65%, voted in the Presidential election of 1960, and this was a record turn-out.

The government might well undertake a national campaign to educate people in their voting rights and to encourage them to vote. If this were done with vigor and sustained attention, a side result would almost certainly be an upsurge in Negro registration in the South, as well as a clear revelation of those areas where the cause of non-voting by Negroes is intimidation, either private or official. There are counties of the South where Negroes will not seek to register and vote unless assured in advance and unmistakably that their temerity will go unpunished. There are, and probably not only in the South, many people--white and Negro--who need education in their voting rights and responsibilities. To help them would seem as much the proper role of the federal government as is the offering of instruction about jobs, baby care, crop management, and a thousand other matters dealt with in government publications.

A registration drive, spurred by the prestige of the President and sustained by his subordinates, would have civic worth, especially if coupled with the printing of leaflets, disseminated through local Post Offices, on the qualifications and procedures for voting in every state.

11. The Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice should be staffed with an adequate number of attorneys of first quality, and the Division's working relationships with the U. S. District Attorneys should be so defined as to permit widespread enforcement of the voting provisions of the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960.

12. A national registration drive, under the personal sponsorship of the President, should be launched, and supported by publications describing registration and voting qualifications and procedures in each state.

F. Armed Services

Since the issuance in 1948 of Executive Order 8891, segregation in the armed services has been virtually eradicated. This has been an advance in civil rights comparable in importance to the outlawing of the white primary and public school segregation, and has been carried through to a satisfactory conclusion by the same force which originated it; i.e., Presidential authority.

The President can in the same way end discrimination in the National Guard, and the logic for doing so is compelling. The Guard is a part of the United States Army, and composition and organization of its units are required to be "the same as those prescribed for the Army" (32 U.S.C. sec. 104b). The state units are financed almost entirely by federal funds. Service in the Guard is a statutory substitute for service in the Army under the Selective Service Act. The President prescribes the regulations of the Guard, violations of which automatically forfeit federal support (32 U.S.C. secs. 108, 110).

National Guard units in the South are all-white. Thus, an important part of the Army is still segregated. Negro Southerners are denied an option which white Southerners have--to enlist in the Guard rather than be drafted. And, as the North Carolina Advisory Committee to the U. S. Commission on Civil Rights has said, "In times of racial tension, if the Guard should be called out, it would be reassuring to Negro citizens to observe that members of their own race were on duty. Thereby would be implanted the justified conviction that the sole duty of the Guard is to uphold the law."

The President is authorized to make a number of appointments of cadets and midshipmen to the service academies. As most appointments are in the keeping of Congressmen, and it is a matter of common knowledge that at least a third of the members, representing areas of high Negro population, do not appoint Negroes, the President can justifiably give special attention in his own selection to the merits of Negro candidates. According to the latest reports, there are seven Negroes enrolled at Annapolis, eight at West Point, and three at the Air Force Academy.

The President is directed by law to establish and maintain ROTC units, and may likewise terminate them. There would seem to be no legitimate grounds for operating an ROTC at universities, public or private, which refuse admission on racial grounds.

13. The National Guard in Southern states is the remnant of segregation in the armed services; segregation in Southern colleges and universities, and the mode of selection of academy cadets and midshipmen, restrict the opportunities for Negroes to become military officers. All of these situations are within the power of the President to remedy or ameliorate.

G. Health, Recreation

The federal government administers many and large health programs, involving hospital operation and medical research. It provides grants-in-aid to the states for mental health programs, maternal and child health service, aid to crippled children and the blind, and control of tuberculosis, cancer, heart disease, and venereal disease; and for hospital construction under the Hill-Burton Act. The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and the Veterans' Administration are the responsible agencies.

It may seem disproportionate to link recreation and health in the same discussion, except that the uses of leisure time becomes an increasingly urgent concern, with genuine effects on the well-being of the nation. The federal government provides some of the most valuable recreational opportunities people have, through the national parks, national forests, federal reservoir areas, and federal beach erosion projects. These are administered by the Department of the Interior, the Department of Agriculture, and the Army Corps of Engineers.

Most of the health and recreational activities are covered by seemingly adequate regulations against racial discrimination, although there have been instances of lack of enforcement. This is not true of the grant-in-aid programs, and especially not of the huge Hill-Burton hospital construction program which, by statutory authorization, approves separate-but-equal facilities (42 U.S.C. sec. 291e); the statute was enacted in 1946. The federal beach erosion projects carry no specific prohibitions on discrimination but, in a most interesting proceeding, the Department of Justice has brought suit against officials of Biloxi (Miss.) on grounds that discrimination is contrary to the legal requirement of "public use."

14. Health and recreational programs, both of which bring the government into close personal touch with people, need to be constantly audited for discriminatory effects. Continued observance of the "separate, but equal" clause in the Hill-Burton Act is Constitutionally dubious, and should be authoritatively examined.

H. Transportation

Through federal court action, heartening reforms have occurred since 1941 in interstate and intra-state travel. More recently, the independent regulatory agencies have added their force to the removal of discriminations affecting the dignity and convenience of Negro passengers; the Federal Aviation Agency has refused financial aid for construction of airports which will practice segregation. The chief remaining hardship is the condition of bus, train, and air line terminals, their waiting rooms, eating arrangements, and rest rooms. A problem so near solution is ripe for a decisive push. The President could communicate this opinion to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board, and the Federal Aviation Agency; and could instruct the Attorney-General to follow through on the conference held by the Department of Justice in 1956 with U. S. Attorneys in the Southern states to consider action against discrimination by common carriers.

15. Interstate travel is a field in which a final federal effort could decisively end segregation. The clearly established unconstitutionality of segregation in common carriers operated intrastate invites serious study by the Department of Justice of means to require observance of the Constitutional principle.

I. Contractor Employment

In the absence of Congressional enactment of a fair employment law, the grounds for executive imposition of an anti-discrimination clause in government contracts is the buyer's normal privilege of choosing his suppliers.

There are two fields--contractor employment and federal housing policy--where the executive department faces issues of unusual magnitude and difficulty. One aspect of the dilemma--for it is such--is that employment and housing are of basic importance, not only to Negro welfare but to American success in living up to principle; their effects ramify into every other problem of civil rights. Consequently, no fields are deserving of more imaginative, more constant attention. Another aspect, however, is that the task of opening up employment and housing consists of hard, practical difficulties so great as to make innocuous any governmental action that is not thorough and undertaken with firm resolve. A third aspect is that the stakes are so large, and the effects of decisive governmental action would be so directly felt by the people, that strong policies would almost certainly produce sharp political and popular controversies.

The Government Contract Committee and its predecessor seem to have accomplished little to arrest discrimination in employment. The Committee has devoted a good deal of its effort to education, and has processed complaints. Some educational activity is perhaps desirable, but the government needs to remember that performance and example are its best educational means.

President Truman's Committee on Government Contract Compliance made certain recommendations prior to leaving office. These included disqualification from future contracting of suppliers whose employment practices are found discriminatory; termination of contracts upon finding of discrimination; the use of a liquidated damages clause in contracts; and provisions for injunctive relief and arbitration. These are drastic remedies. Some of them, at least, could be used without further legislation, but reliance on any or all of them would require a considerable enlargement of staff and would probably result in litigations both numerous and vexing.

Yet the present posture of the government is intolerable. Every government contract and many sub-contracts contain an anti-discrimination clause, the text of which is posted in suppliers' shops and offices. The clause is, in effect, an oath. It has become another of the non-enforced declarations of principle and policy. We think there is real danger to public morals in this practice. The people need to know that the government takes its words seriously. For the government to lay down laws and orders which it does not intend, or is not prepared, to enforce is a practice which encourages social and individual indifference.

In the absence of a fair employment act, the executive department might well give serious exploration to other means as well as punitive sanctions for preventing discrimination. The approach described in the next two paragraphs is not intended as a blueprint or even a recommendation of a specific plan. Rather it is a suggestion intended to invite the government's consideration toward policies administratively simpler than punitive sanctions, and yet equally productive of results.

First, if there is to be any effective action the executive department must commit itself to definite and firm policies. Secondly, the executive department, in consideration of practical difficulties, might adopt as its first goal the ability to report to the people that all of the large contractors of the government practice fair employment. Thirdly, the method of attaining this goal could be certification by the Government Contract Committee (if it is continued), or by the new office proposed above on pages 4-5, that the bidder or proposed contractor is presently operating, in all of its plants and offices, without discrimination. Such certification could be made a prerequisite to the award of any contract above a specified sum (perhaps $1,000,000) or of any contract which would increase the total active orders of a company and its subsidiaries beyond that amount. (For lesser contracts the non-discrimination clause could still be inserted, and procedures made available for receiving and processing complaints.) Enforcement would not require litigation, and would be administratively far simpler than either sole reliance on the processing of individual complaints, or the proposed use of sanctions.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Bureau of Employment Security maintain copious data on the nation's work force, and can with minimum difficulty prepare and publish current information on the number of Negroes in various categories of the working force. These data could be taken into account in determining upon certification. The test would be the record of actual employment, including enrollment in the company's in-service training program, if it has one. The large contractors of the government would, in effect, be required to do more than pledge non-discrimination; they would be required to recruit Negroes throughout their operations.

This would be an undeniably arbitrary requirement. Its premise, however, would be clear cut; viz., that as a condition for doing business with the government above a certain amount, the company will cooperate with the government by a positive program of developing Negro talent and skills. It would be asked to assume partnership with the government in achieving a national goal.

As was stressed before, the above suggestion is not tendered as a finished proposal, but as a basis for study within the administration along the lines of non-punitive but nevertheless effective action. Another device worth evaluation is the use of an award, such as the war-time Navy "E", given to contractors whose employment practices meet governmental approval; the symbol could be displayed by the company in its advertising and elsewhere, as an indication that it is cooperating with the government in developing and utilizing our manpower resources.

Whatever methods are used, there would seem to be no reason why they should not apply both to contractors and to companies licensed to use government-held patents.

16. There needs to be more effective enforcement of the bar against discriminatory employment by government contractors. Large contractors can be appropriately charged with a special responsibility for positive recruitment of Negroes; an appropriate means of requiring this would be prior certification as a condition for award of contract.

Where the federal government's scope of action is narrow, it can still deny its services to others who discriminate. The Bureau of Apprenticeship could, upon advice from an office designated by the President, withdraw from participation in any apprenticeship program, whether under state or private auspices, which does not admit all applicants on an equal footing, and could withhold registration from apprentices in such programs. Similarly, the U. S. Employment Service could make refusal to process racially restricted job orders a condition for federal approval of a state program and financial assistance.

17. Federal cooperation with discrimination should be ended at once in the apprenticeship and employment services.

J. Housing

Rapid population growth, plus a steady population shift to the cities, plus an advancing standard of living have combined to keep high the demand for new housing. The movement of middle and upper income families out of the central cities and into suburban neighborhoods, together with the emphasis of the past several decades on home building in subdivisions, have accentuated the degree of racial segregation in American cities; this is especially pronounced in the South, where residential segregation was formerly less customary than in other regions.

The role of the federal government in relation to the spread of housing segregation has been succinctly described by the Commission on Race and Housing:

> The policies and actions of government agencies and public officials must be counted among the principal influences sustaining racial segregation in housing....
>
> The federal government, through its mortgage credit aids, public housing, and slum clearance programs, has come to exercise a large measure of control over housing. Both directly and indirectly, the federal housing programs have strongly influenced the racial patterns of residence, mainly in the direction of increasing racial segregation. During the first dozen years of its existence, the Federal Housing Administration operated explicitly on the real estate doctrine that mingling of racial groups in residence areas was socially undesirable and a threat to the financial stability of neighborhoods. Its appraisal manuals stressed the importance of protecting neighborhoods against invasion by "incompatible racial and social groups." For "surest protection" against such an eventuality, FHA recommended blanketing all land in the vicinity of a mortgage-insured housing development with race-restrictive covenants, particularly in undeveloped or partly developed areas. It is a fair judgment that FHA's influence contributed largely to the spread of race-restrictive covenants (subsequently declared unenforceable by the Supreme Court) and hence to the exclusion of minority groups from wide areas.

...The agency now officially encourages open occupancy in housing developments, but it does not attempt to control the discriminatory practices of private builders or lenders.

The public housing program has always insisted, and in the main successfully, on minority groups' receiving an equitable share of publicly subsidized dwellings. With respect to the racial pattern, federal policy has been to leave the decision for open or segregated occupancy to local housing authorities. The latter, in all sections of the country, elected initially for segregation, with one or two notable exceptions. In the South, compulsory segregation remains, but in the North and West, many local authorities have shifted to policies of open occupancy, some by their own decision, others under court order.... Notwithstanding open occupancy policies, however, the recent trend has been running strongly toward concentration of minority groups in public housing.

Among the major factors contributing to this trend are the frequent location of projects in areas mainly occupied by minorities, the wider opportunities of whites than of non-whites to obtain housing in the private market, and statutory preference in tenant selection to families, largely minority, displaced by slum clearance operations. ...the conclusion seems justified that public housing has served, on the whole, to sustain and probably intensify racial segregation.

Beginning during World War II, the federal government has become increasingly sensitive to the housing disadvantage and needs of the minority groups. It has moved to assist these groups to obtain housing but has tried to do so without interfering with the segregation practices of the private housing industry. .... Special credit assistance has been provided through the Federal National Mortgage Association and the Voluntary Home Mortgage Credit Program.... A high proportion of all postwar new dwellings built for minority use has been financed by mortgages purchased by the FNMA, that is, by government credit. These new houses have been built, with few exceptions, in segregated projects. The special assistance measures, ...like public housing, have been both a source of housing and a force for segregation.

> Indirectly, federal policies have stimulated segregation in two important ways. The changes in the housing industry which have so largely increased the power of private builders to determine community patterns, as described above, have been made possible by the federal mortgage insurance systems....
>
> The other indirect federal support of segregation has been the moral sanction given to the racial discrimination practices of private business.... Government, as an expression of the public will, is one of the sources of moral as well as legal authority. If the government sees nothing wrong in racial discrimination, how can private persons be censured for practicing it? ...In the housing field, the federal government, in recent years, has withdrawn from any explicit endorsement of housing segregation. Federal agencies, however, aside from verbal pronouncements for equality, continue to tolerate the discriminatory practices of those who distribute federal benefits.

Present housing trends are injurious not only to the dwellers in the vast city areas which it becomes increasingly accurate to call ghettoes. The harm is felt in at least two other ways as well. Too many middle class white families are separated from normal contacts with persons of other races and economic station. Municipal government and the cultural life of the cities are being weakened by shrinkage of revenue base and population imbalance.

A problem so largely the result of federal programs is a direct and pressing federal responsibility. It should be dealt with not specifically as a Negro, or a race relations, question, but as a task of helping disadvantaged citizens to become productive members of society and of restoring or guarding the health of our cities.

The question for the federal government to face is that of how it will direct the tremendous influence which it has through its huge involvement in the housing market. Will it use this influence, as it has in the past and as it still largely does, to strengthen and spread housing segregation?

The Supreme Court in Brown v. Topeka took judicial note of the sociological and psychological handicaps of segregation. We believe the President could well do likewise in an Executive Order which stated that the national housing policy is to encourage integration. This would be the strongest possible directive to the several housing agencies to examine meticulously the laws which they administer for opportunities to reverse present trends.

FHA policy now, as expressed through its regulations and practices, is to insure no mortgages on property whose deeds contain restrictive covenants; to rent or sell re-possessed housing on a non-segregated basis; to encourage "open occupancy" through private conferences with builders and others; and to refuse its services to any builder or developer found in violation of a state anti-discrimination law. The last could be an effective measure, except that it applies only to individuals or firms formally held against in a state proceeding--and this is extremely rare--, and it applies only in states with anti-discrimination laws and not in the others where the majority of the nation's Negroes live.

Similar orders have been issued applicable to land purchasers under urban renewal programs, and to builders under Veterans' Administration benefits. The VA has also strict regulations against restrictive covenants. Apparently no attention is given to questions of discrimination by the Army in selling or leasing utilities to housing developments in the vicinity of bases; nor by the Federal Highway Administration in the purchase of land necessitating relocation of families. The policies of PHA and FNMA are sufficiently indicated by the above quotation from the Commission on Race and Housing.

The administration of the housing and urban renewal laws is intricate and the mass of detail involved in framing and enforcing regulations affecting thousands of purchasers, builders, lending institutions, and municipal governments almost overwhelms the attempt to suggest realistic and effective methods of curbing racial inequities and segregation. The Commission on Race and Housing has made possible a better public understanding of the difficulties and the opportunities by its series of studies, and we commend them to the administration. In particular, we call attention to the Commission's Report (titled Where Shall We Live?) and the policy recommendations contained therein.

Certain general ideas have emerged from the literature on housing problems which we believe deserve sympathetic study by the administration. These are:

a) The practice of "scattering" projects. Especially with reference to public housing, this means the construction of several small projects rather than one large one, and their location in bi-racial or all-white neighborhoods, rather than in Negro or transition sections.

b) The policy of "benign quotas." We have anxious reservations about quotas in either public or private housing, from the standpoint of both good race relations and democratic values. Men live, nevertheless, in the real, and not the ideal, world. It is a fact that open occupancy frequently means, or comes to mean, Negro occupancy, and the project is an addition to segregated housing. To date, a system of "benign quotas" is virtually the only realistic suggestion made by responsible sources for combatting this condition. The housing agencies might well initiate discussions with developers, representatives of Negro organizations, and intergroup relations specialists for a thorough airing of the problem and of means for solving it.

c) The employment of Negroes on the staff of housing agencies. This, of course, is already being done, but to only a limited extent. It is not particularly important whether whites or Negroes occupy the positions of race relations advisers (if those positions are continued). What is important is that Negroes are taken on the regular staffs, and this would be especially desirable in the South. In this occupational field there is no scarcity of experienced Negro specialists, men trained in Urban League work or in Negro real estate or lending circles. To use them in the government would be to tap their insights, to leaven the thinking and attitudes of their colleagues, and to improve public confidence in the agencies.

d) A systematic analysis of the housing laws to determine what inducements are available to encourage real open occupancy housing. Here as elsewhere, preferments are better than sanctions. There undoubtedly are ways by which, for example, FHA and FNMA can give priorities to developers (including 221 developers) whose management will accord with the government's aim of integration.

e) Principal attention to the large builder. In view of the numerous home owners availing themselves of FHA or FNMA benefits, the job of enforcing a clause against discrimination in re-sale would be staggering. On the other hand, FHA could, with comparative ease, come to workable and sound agreements regarding open occupancy with large sub-dividers or apartment sponsors, prior to commitment.

Of all actions the executive department can take, the simplest administratively is the realization of open occupancy in public housing projects. This would be unquestionably desirable. Yet there is a danger in moving sternly in low-income housing, unless policies of equivalent sternness are applied across the board. There is no advantage to anyone in furthering the already existent suspicion, that integration is for the poor folks.

In 1954 and 1955, there was little realization throughout the country of the intensity of feeling in the South, and the degree to which the South would resist Court orders in the school cases. Neither the country nor its government was prepared for what followed. The President when developing policy has an obligation far greater than that of the courts when declaring rights to be prepared to react to the consequences. A strict non-discriminatory order for FHA (including 221) and PHA housing, with obvious intent to enforce, will in all likelihood lead to a diminution of starts in the South, at least for a time, and could hamper or halt urban renewal. This would not be a completely unfortunate happening, for it would at least slow the present trend toward firmer segregated patterns. Nevertheless, the basic interest of the country is to have a well housed people. Another almost certain consequence in the South would be ingenious methods of evasion. Another possible consequence which cannot be discounted is violence.

The probability of Southern opposition should not be a deterrent. Federal policy must be the same throughout the country, and must be enforced everywhere with equal firmness. If housing starts in the South are reduced, there is every reason to believe they will not be for long: the benefits of participation in federal programs have a powerful attraction.

Administrative firmness can, however, be helpfully supplemented by another approach. There have been many calls in recent years for the President to exert "moral leadership." This implies that the President should make clear where he stands, what he believes, and how he believes that America must act to be true to itself. We think such leadership to be an indispensable part of a firm housing policy, every bit as essential as the definition of such a policy itself. We would go further and suggest that here is an occasion for a sustained exercise of Presidential leadership through persuasion, carried on publicly or privately as seems best, both by the President and his subordinates.

The appointment of advisory committees is sometimes a substitute for acceptance of responsibility, but can also be a means for grounding new policies on strong, authoritative support. This would seem to be an occasion for utilizing a committee, composed of well-known figures representing the public and financial, building, and real estate circles; Negroes from these categories would, of course, be included. The function of the committee would be to review periodically the success of the housing programs in ameliorating the residential conditions of the disadvantaged minority of our citizens, and to report their findings to the President.

Finally, it should go without saying that the housing agencies should be headed by persons who believe in the value of integrated neighborhoods.

When all this is said, there remains the probable fact that the federal executive alone cannot reach some of the questions of land, appraisal, taxation, city and regional planning, credit, and others basic to the urban problems of the country. It would be unfortunate if executive actions or statements were to create a different impression.

The opportunities are, nevertheless, tremendous. The housing laws can be, and ought to be, administered to curb segregation. No exercise of Presidential discretion would be more beneficial.

18. A declaration by the President that federal housing programs will be guided by a belief in the values of integration would be the soundest basis for an Executive Order prohibiting discrimination. Because the federal government has been a principal architect of housing segregation, there is special reason for it continuously to evaluate its success in reversing the process. Adverse reactions, especially in the South, are to be expected to firm policies; Presidential leadership can be decisive in allaying and overcoming them.

III. CONCLUSION

This paper has sought to indicate and analyze actions which the executive department can take to secure civil rights and to help in the full realization of the nation's human resources. Six premises have run through our discussion. We would like to state them again, in conclusion.

Civil rights and liberties are the dignities of free men and the essential condition of a free country. In working for their enlargement, the government and we as a people do that which is closest to the core of our national purpose.

We have disadvantaged people in this country. Both fair play and national self-interest dictate that they be helped to become useful, and that their potential for talent be put at society's service.

National unity is a primary political value, and the views of the South should be part of the national consensus. There are, however, vast and largely untapped reservoirs of popular agreement and support in the South for national leadership that would ease from the South an ancient and uncomfortable burden.

Honest dealing by the government and the public toward our non-white citizens would strengthen immeasurably the international prestige of the United States; continued discrimination will just as surely weaken our standing abroad.

The Presidency is the center of American energy. What the President says and does will mark the direction and the speed with which the country moves to perfect its racial relations.

Racial relations is our oldest domestic trouble. It has the claim of age and priority for thorough, decisive action now.

SCHOOL DESEG.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, M

Southern Regional Panel Backs Education Office on Guidelines

By ROY REED
Special to The New York Times 12/19/66

ATLANTA, Dec. 18—The Southern Regional Council issued today a sharply worded report defending the Federal Office of Education against criticism that it has pushed Southern school desegregation too fast this year.

"Far from having been overzealous," the council said, "this agency has—if the law has any meaning at all—so far failed to achieve what the law demanded."

The council, an influential private agency devoted to racial equality, called for tougher school guidelines by the education office, not softer ones as demanded by many Southern officeholders and school officials.

The organization said "low-grade terror" was continuing against Negro students and their parents who insisted on desegregating schools in recalcitrant areas of the Deep South. The council said the terror was enough "to suggest a new national scandal brewing out of the South."

The report made public today is a 46-page study of the education office's school desegregation efforts this year. The office has taken on the major enforcement of school desegregation since the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibited discrimination in any program receiving Federal aid.

Desegregation Doubled

The education office announced last week that the number of Negroes in school with whites in the South had doubled since last year. On the average, it estimated, in the 11 states of the Confederacy 12.5 per cent of the Negro students were in desegregated schools this fall. The figure last year was about 6 per cent.

The council said its own figures—obtained with difficulty because of the reluctance of school officials to divulge them—showed slightly smaller gains in Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi and Louisiana than the education office reported.

Over-all, the council did not challenge the Federal agency's Southwide figures. However, it said some civil rights proponents had begun to question the use of percentages in measuring desegregation progress.

"By building gradualism into its guidelines by the use of minimum percentages, the U.S.O.E. perhaps unwittingly allowed attention to shift from the illegitimacy of dual schools and the need to end them," the council said. "Instead, Southern officials haggle over whether '10 per cent is too much,' while continuing segregated patterns."

The education office's guidelines, which Southern Congressmen, Governors, and school officials have condemned roundly this year, have contributed to this gradualism, the council said.

"The guidelines still presuppose a dual system of schools, drawn as they are from the prevailing notion of allowing Negro children to attend white schools," it said.

It said some civil rights leaders had suggested countering that notion by requiring all schools in districts that have any Negro population to have half Negro teachers and half white. That might also stop whites from fleeing transitional neighborhoods to escape Negroes, the council said.

The guidelines have been nullified in some areas by harassment of Negro students and parents, the council said.

"In one rural Alabama county, Negro children, beaten by whites on the first day of school, refused to get off a school bus until school authorities granted them protection," the council related. "Denied this protection, they remained on the bus and were suspended for staging a sit-in demonstration."

In another rural district, it said, whites have used this scheme: The school has a rule that any person involved in a fight, regardless of who starts it, is suspended. Four suspensions constitute expulsion. Four white students agree to start fights with one Negro, taking their three-day suspensions in rotation. After the fourth fight, the Negro is expelled.

Lack of Money Noted

The council said that Congress had refused to provide enough money and staff for full enforcement of the guidelines. It said the education office itself had at times seemed to give in to political pressure from Southern officials.

"But even if they had been allowed to operate fully as planned," the council said, "the guidelines tolerate practices which are far short of the intent of the law."

It suggested tighter enforcement and tighter guidelines—"perhaps a single guideline, the abolishment of dual systems."

"If this should even ultimately bring the South to a political victory that overturns the law of the land—if the rest of the nation is that weak or that far-gone in its backlash versions of racism—then so be it," the council concluded. "Even that would be preferable to the continued flouting of the Constitution and the law in the schools where children learn their lessons of citizenship and contemporary history."

---

Burroughs to Build Center

DETROIT, Dec. 17 (AP)—Plans for an $18-million world eadquarters building center ere have been announced by he Burroughs Corporation. Construction is to begin early next year. The five-story center will have more than 600,000 square feet of floor space and house all of the Burroughs executive offices and administrative activities now in several buildings in the area.

---

REMEMBER THE NEEDIEST!

MOST DECLINE COMMENT

Southern Officials Waiting for Guides

SCHOOL DESEG.

AC 1/2/67

By The Associated Press

Southern officials, awaiting receipt of new federal school desegregation guidelines, generally were tight-lipped Sunday. But one governor challenged the validity of the regulations.

"We do not believe the so-called guidelines have the force and effect of law," said Gov. Robert E. McNair of South Carolina. "We have taken the position from the beginning that the school districts of this state not only are required to, but should attempt to, comply with the law.

"We are opposed to the setting of arbitrary quotas and percentages that are forbidden by the federal act itself."

Most officials contacted in an Associated Press survey were reluctant to comment until they had received the 1967 guidelines issued Saturday night by the U.S. Office of Education. The guidelines, designed to show local districts how to remain eligible for federal aid, are being mailed to school superintendents now to give them time to prepare for the next school term.

At a news conference, John W. Gardner, secretary of health, education and welfare, said Saturday night his agency considered its guidelines fully upheld by a Thursday decision of a federal appeals court.

In its 2-1 decision, the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals accepted the guidelines and ordered schools in the seven districts involved in the litigation to desegregate all grades including kindergarten by next fall.

Gov. Dan Moore of North Carolina said, "We still believe in the freedom of choice plan." Under this system, pupils are allowed to choose their schools, rather than the school authorities themselves planning steps for integration.

Dr. Harry M. Sparks, superintendent of Kentucky schools, said that while he has not seen the new guidelines, "I do not anticipate any problems in the state of Kentucky."

Sparks said his only complaint was the use of schools to compel desegregation. "They ought to use the Justice Department instead of the Office of Education," he said.

Georgia's school superintendent, Dr. Jack B. Nix, said he would withhold comment until he has read the new guidelines. But his top aide, Associate Supt. Dr. Allen Smith, said Thursday that most of the state's schools already were planning for desegregation of all grades next fall.

Still unavailable for comment on the court decision and the announced new guidelines was Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, who has long been opposed to federal control over schools and pushed to enactment last year a state anti-guidelines law.

Officials in several states, including Georgia and Florida, said after the court decision that the ruling was of no significant import. Gardner said the 1967 guidelines would be virtually the same as those issued last March.

Federal Programs Are Eyed

FED. POLICY

AC 1/2/67

Mansfield Seeks Legislation Review

By JOHN HERBERS

(Copyright 1966 by the New York Times Co.)

WASHINGTON—Mike Mansfield, the Senate majority leader, has urged the 17 committee chairmen in the Senate to initiate a "top-to-bottom" re-evaluation of the major federal programs, both new and old.

Mike Mansfield

President Johnson

He said this should be the preoccupation of the 90th Congress, which convenes Jan. 10.

In a letter to the chairmen, the Montana Democrat said, "The time seems to me to be very ripe" for "a concentrated re-examination of major legislative structures by which the federal government is enabled to play its role in the current life and affairs of the nation and the world."

ROUGH EDGES

Much of the great domestic legislation enacted during the last three or four years has "rough edges, over-extensions and overlaps and, perhaps, even significant gaps," he wrote.

Older programs such as agricultural subsidies, foreign aid, income taxes and the military draft have not had a "thorough-going, second look for many years," Mansfield added.

"A complete restudy by the Senate," he said, "could provide not only a basis for adjustments of legislation, as necessary to the current needs of the nation but also a check on the equity and efficacy of the administrative interpretations and practices which have developed."

SIMILAR SUGGESTION

Mansfield made a similar sug-

the world."

ROUGH EDGES

Much of the great domestic legislation enacted during the last three or four years has "rough edges, over-extensions and overlaps and, perhaps, even significant gaps," he wrote.

Older programs such as agricultural subsidies, foreign aid, income taxes and the military draft have not had a "thoroughgoing, second look for many years," Mansfield added.

"A complete restudy by the Senate," he said, "could provide not only a basis for adjustments of legislation, as necessary to the current needs of the nation but also a check on the equity and efficacy of the administrative interpretations and practices which have developed."

SIMILAR SUGGESTION

Mansfield made a similar suggestion a year ago for the second session of the 89th Congress. He said then that so many Great Society programs had been enacted so hurriedly in 1965 that Congress in 1966 could well spend its time refining and correcting those programs.

But President Lyndon B. Johnson continued to recommend major new legislation, which kept Congress preoccupied most of the year.

Now, however, both the membership of Congress and the political climate have changed. The Republicans gained 47 seats in the House of Representatives and in the process Johnson lost the margin of support by which much of his Great Society legislation was enacted.

CRITICISM MOUNTS

There has been mounting criticism of the administration of many new federal programs, by both liberals and conservatives. Administration leaders in Congress concede that much of the legislation was hastily and improperly drawn.

"It occurs to me," Mansfield said in his letter to chairmen, "that the next Congress will see the convergence of a unique opportunity with a great need for a concentrated Senate exercise of the oversight function."

Mansfield said he did not anticipate "requests for sweeping new legislative approaches in the 90th Congress."

HOPES TO SEE

"I would hope to see, in the first session of the 90th Congress, the beginning of a major re-examination of what we have done in legislation during the past few years," he said.

Mansfield listed as examples medical care for the aged, ex panded health research, civ rights, conservation and beaut fication, programs against ai and water pollution, renewal o urban and rural areas.

"In short, what is suggested i that the committee chairmen consult with members of thei committees to determine with respect to matters within their committee jurisdiction what, in their judgment, might be most usefully subjected to a thoroughgoing oversight at this time," Mansfield said.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

THE

RIGHTS UNIT PLANS NEW SCHOOL SUITS

NYT 1/3/67

Wants Courts to Adhere to Designation Guidelines

Civil rights lawyers are planning a broad campaign in the coming year to speed racial desegregation of schools in Southern communities that have been under court orders to integrate for as long as 12 years.

The legal effort will be made by the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc.

Jack Greenberg, director-counsel of the fund, said that a major goal in 1967 would be the reopening of most of the 175 school desegregation lawsuits in which the organization had been successful in winning court orders against Southern school districts.

Mr. Greenberg explained that while every major city in the South and many small towns and rural areas were under court orders to integrate their schools the orders were not strong enough to satisfy civil rights proponents.

Exemption Opposed

The court orders, he said, generally require less classroom integration than is prescribed by the guidelines of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. The guidelines must be followed by school districts that wish to obtain Federal aid to education.

But, Mr. Greenberg pointed out, the guidelines include a provision that no school board will be asked to integrate further than required by a court order entered against the board.

The Legal Defense Fund is urging an end to this exemption for school boards that have been ordered by a court to desegregate. But the fund also proposes to go back to most of the courts from which the orders were obtained and to ask that the orders be brought up to the standards of desegregation prescribed by the guidelines.

The legal wedge for this attack, Mr. Greenberg said, is a decision handed down last week in the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. The decision, in a series of seven lawsuits considered pivotal by the civil rights movement, held that desegregation plans ordered by lower Federal courts must measure up to the Department of Health Education and Welfare guidelines.

Death Penalty Opposed

Mr. Greenberg said that the Legal Defense Fund would be active in a number of other cases involving the securing of equal rights in such areas as hospital admissions, employment and housing. He said the fund would also continue a campaign to persuade the courts to outlaw capital punishment for rape in Southern states where the penalty had been applied exclusively or predominantly to Negroes.

The largest number of lawsuits initiated by the fund deal with school, hospital and employment issues, Mr. Greenberg said. But redress in cases in these areas will be sought first through administrative action —for example, by taking employment discrimination complaints to the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission.

As for housing discrimination, Mr. Greenberg said that the fund would go to court for the first time this year against local housing authorities found to discriminate against Negroes in connection with relocation for urban renewal projects.

The Legal Defense Fund hopes also to win a final decision this year on a suit that seeks anti-trust action against real estate brokers who refuse to sell to Negroes in a particular neighborhood. If successful, the suit would affirm that the real estate business is in interstate commerce. Civil-rights proponents believe this would remove a major obstacle to enactment of Federal fair housing legislation.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION

For 99 Years The South's Standard Newspaper

RALPH McGILL, Publisher

EUGENE PATTERSON, Editor

Established June 16, 1868
Issued daily except New Year's, July 4, Labor Day, Thanksgiving and Christmas. Second-class postage paid at Atlanta, Georgia.
The Atlanta Constitution (morning) and The Atlanta Constitution and The Atlanta Journal (Sunday), published by Atlanta Newspapers, Inc., 10 Forsyth St., N.W., Atlanta, Georgia 30302.
Home delivered subscription rates (including taxes): Morning and Sunday, 1 week, 65c. Morning daily only, 1 week, 45c. Subscription prices by mail on request. Single copies: Daily, 10c; Sunday, 20c.

Tokenism's Last Tick

There's life in those old school guidelines yet.

A few months ago it looked as though a conservative swing in the 1966 elections, combined with criticism in Congress, would cut the ground from under the guidelines. Federal court rulings were even cited as "proof" that the guidelines went further than the courts.

But a federal panel in New Orleans slammed the door on that argument. "The clock has ticked to the last 'tick' for tokenism and delay in the name of deliberate speed," Judge Minor Wisdom said in a 57-page opinion.

Within a week, the Office of Education published its 1967 guidelines, which retreat not a step, and special assistant Peter Libassi announced that "very substantial progress" would be expected in desegregation in the coming year.

The proposed guidelines had lain on President Johnson's desk for some weeks while he mulled over their political effects. Apparently the New Orleans decision convinced the President to approve the tough version.

Judge Wisdom's decision was far-ranging. It specifically reversed an earlier dictum that the 1954 decision for bade enforced segregation but did not require positive steps to ward integration.

Instead, the new ruling lays down strict standards: All grades, including kindergarten, must be open to all by next fall. School officials must move immediately to raise the quality of formerly all-Negro schools or else close them. Schools must take "affirmative action" to integrate students, faculties, facilities and activities. School systems must inform parents of transfer rights, guard the names of those who exercise those rights, and protect the children after they have transferred.

"HEW's standards are substantially the same as this court's . . .," the opinion stated. "We shall not permit the courts to be used to destroy or dilute the effectiveness of the congressional policy . . . There shall be no foot-dragging."

An entire school generation has passed since the U.S. Supreme Court illegalized segregation. It is indeed time for evasion to end and for schools to get down to the business of providing nondiscriminatory education for all children.

LEGISLATION

1967

McCormack Has 'Lost Touch,' Liberal House Democrats Say

They Blame Speaker, 75, for Party's Defeats Last Week by Conservative Coalition

By MARJORIE HUNTER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 15—Badly routed by a strong conservative coalition, liberal House Democrats have reviewed the opening week of Congress and come to two conclusions:

First, the conservative coalition is in firm control, not in any formal sense of the word, but because a majority of Republicans and Southern Democrats think alike and are thus fairly certain to vote alike.

And, second, the Democratic House leadership proved to be weak and ineffective when the going got rough.

The Democratic leadership suffered four humiliating defeats on the floor that many Congressional strategists think could have been avoided by astute backstage negotiations.

Four Defeats Listed

The informal coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats first succeeded in heading off a leadership move to seat Representative Adam Clayton Powell, the controversial Democrat from Manhattan. Then, with its muscle still showing, the coalition succeeded in stripping Mr. Powell of his seat pending an investigation.

The same coalition, on two succeeding votes, also killed the 21-day rule, used by the leadership in the past to keep the Rules Committee from blocking Administration bills.

By nightfall on opening day last Tuesday, Administration Democrats were in disarray, and the Democratic leadership looked shaken.

Critics of the performance of the Democratic leadership place the blame squarely at the door of House Speaker John W. McCormack, the still spry but aging gentleman from Massachusetts.

Out of Touch

Now 75 years old, Mr. McCormack is one of just a handful of Congressmen who were born in the last century. The average age of House members is slightly over 50. Many are in their 30s and mid-40s. A few are in theirs 20s.

"The speaker is out of touch with this younger crowd," one Democrat observed. "He's still smart, but he's lost touch."

Another Democrat complained that the Speaker had misread the mood of the country and the House on the Powell issue.

"We tried to tell him things were serious, but he brushed us off at first," the Democrat said.

The New York Times

House Speaker John W. McCormack is blamed by liberal Democrats for what they call party weakness in first week of Congress.

last fall and has not regained his full strength. Doctors have advised him to slow down for at least a year.

The Democratic whip, Hale Boggs of Louisiana, has been suffering severe gall bladder attacks and plans to enter the hospital for an operation within a week or so. This will keep him out of commission for a month or more.

The chief deputy Democratic whip, John E. Moss of California, also has been ordered by his doctors to slow down his pace to avoid heart strain.

The general feeling on Capitol Hill is that, barring some unforeseen change, Administration forces will continue to be in complete disarray in the months ahead.

Some Administration stalwarts of previous years strayed from the leadership fold last week and joined, at least temporarily, the conservative coali-

CUTS PREDICTED IN GREAT SOCIETY

Drive in Congress Signaled by Ford, Long and Dirksen

By NEIL SHEEHAN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 15—Congressional leaders from both parties indicated today that President Johnson's Great Society programs were likely to encounter more effective opposition this year from Southern Democrats and conservative Republicans.

Senator Russell B. Long of Louisiana, the Senate Democratic whip, who is chairman of the influential Finance Committee, said in a television appearance this afternoon that Mr. Johnson faced definite reductions in his Great Society proposals for the 90th Congress.

The House minority leader, Gerald R. Ford, Republican of Michigan, served notice on another television program that the conservative Republican leadership in the House would renew its efforts this year to cut back Mr. Johnson's programs.

Mr. Ford was relatively unsuccessful in opposing the President's Great Society legislation in the 89th Congress.

Opposition Gains

However, two factors are expected to make his opposition more significant this year: A gain of 47 House seats by the Republicans in the November elections and the likelihood that many of the Southern Democrats in the House and in the Senate will behave as fiscal conservatives in a time of economic difficulties.

Senator Long's remarks on the Columbia Broadcasting System's "Face the Nation" program were cited by Congressional observers as evidence of this prospect.

Both Mr. Long and Mr. Ford predicted that the President would probably find it difficult to obtain Congressional approval of his proposal for a 6 per cent surcharge on income tax payments.

Senator Long asserted that "there are going to be reductions, no matter what the President recommends, with regard to domestic spending."

Dirksen Asks Space Cuts

Meanwhile, Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen, Republican of Illinois, suggested a reduction in the space effort.

The Senate minority leader, who appeared on the American Broadcasting Company's "Issues and Answers" program, said he thought such a reduction could be achieved by a "stretch-out" in the space program, which would in effect abandon the United States goal of landing a man on the moon by 1970.

"Does it really make a great

United Press International

OPPOSES PRESIDENT: Representative Gerald R. Ford, Michigan Republican, the House minority leader.

spending by pressing for a reduction in the number of United States troops in Europe.

The United States now has six divisions and support elements totaling about 225,000 men in Europe.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield has said repeatedly that this force should be reduced, and Senator Long asserted today that "the unanimous majority of the Democrats and the leadership in the Senate" believed the number of American troops in Europe was "excessive."

Only after it has first sought to reduce foreign and domestic spending as much as possible, Mr. Long said, will Congress consider a tax increase.

Even after such cutbacks have been made, he said. "My guess is that the Congress is not going to look favorably upon a tax increase."

In his appearance on WTTG, a Washington television station, Mr. Ford said he thought that, among other items, the antipoverty program should be "redirected."

"It can be tightened up and money can be saved," he said.

Highway Plan Attacked

Mr. Ford said cutbacks in spending could also be made in the program to beautify the nation's highways and parks and in public works projects of the Bureau of Reclamation.

He did not make it clear exactly what he meant in regard to the highway beautification program.

He contended that spending under the program would total about $100-million, but other Congressional observers said they believed that the program did not amout to that much money.

"I think we should adopt what is called a 'no new start program,'" Mr. Ford said. He explained that this would mean seat pending an investigation.

The same coalition, on two succeeding votes, also killed the 21-day rule, used by the leadership in the past to keep the Rules Committee from blocking Administration bills.

By nightfall on opening day last Tuesday, Administration Democrats were in disarray, and the Democratic leadership looked shaken.

Critics of the performance of the Democratic leadership place the blame squarely at the door of House Speaker John W. McCormack, the still spry but aging gentleman from Massachusetts.

Out of Touch

Now 75 years old, Mr. McCormack is one of just a handful of Congressmen who were born in the last century. The average age of House members is slightly over 50. Many are in their 30s and mid-40s. A few are in theirs 20s.

"The speaker is out of touch with this younger crowd," one Democrat observed. "He's still smart, but he's lost touch."

Another Democrat complained that the Speaker had misread the mood of the country and the House on the Powell issue.

"We tried to tell him things were serious, but he brushed us off at first," the Democrat said.

Only when the lines had already hardened and a majority of members on both sides of the aisle had determined to bar Mr. Powell from his seat did Speaker McCormack attempt to hammer out a compromise to allow the seating and then investigate.

"He should have done that weeks before," one Democrat said. "That's what leadership means, sniffing out how things are shaping up and then heading off a bruising showdown with some good footwork behind the scenes."

Another Democrat said:

"It was incredible to all of us that the Speaker would show up in Washington, scarcely days before the session, without any real plans on this Powell issue."

"If we only had Mr. Sam back, you can bet this wouldn't happen," said another, referring to the late Sam Rayburn of Texas. The former Speaker's uncanny skill for leadership and for sensing when to give and when not to give made him a legend in his time.

Another young Democrat, a leader of liberal forces, scoffed at the suggestion that Mr. Rayburn could have salvaged key Administration programs in the months ahead.

"Even if we had Mr. Sam back, we'd still be in trouble," he said. "The only thing he could have done was keep our defeats from being so damn apparent, as they were the other day."

The effectiveness of the Democratic leadership that so successfully steered through President Johnson's major Great Society programs in the last two years has also been impaired by illness.

The usually peppy majority leader, Carl Albert of Oklahoma, suffered a heart attack last fall and has not regained his full strength. Doctors have advised him to slow down for at least a year.

The New York Times

House Speaker John W. McCormack is blamed by liberal Democrats for what they call party weakness in first week of Congress.

The Democratic whip, Hale Boggs of Louisiana, has been suffering severe gall bladder attacks and plans to enter the hospital for an operation within a week or so. This will keep him out of commission for a month or more.

The chief deputy Democratic whip, John E. Moss of California, also has been ordered by his doctors to slow down his pace to avoid heart strain.

The general feeling on Capitol Hill is that, barring some unforeseen change, Administration forces will continue to be in complete disarray in the months ahead.

Some Administration stalwarts of previous years strayed from the leadership fold last week and joined, at least temporarily, the conservative coalition on those early crucial votes.

The outlook, as of now, is that Administration programs will be severely curtailed this year. Some programs are considered in danger of extinction.

One Congressional strategist views the Democratic leadership job in the months ahead as one of carefully devised compromises, behind the scenes, to salvage as much of the Administration programs as possible.

"It's going to be ticklish, and I'm wondering if the leadership is up to the job," the strategist said.

Despite the dismay of some Democrats, there is no talk, not even in the privacy of the Democratic cloakroom — the somewhat shabby room where Democrats go to exchange gossip or sneak a quick nap — of ousting the Democratic leadership.

As one Democrat put it: "McCormack is too well liked, personally, to even think of trying to dump him. When he is good, he is very, very good. I think he's up to it."

U.S. to Help Adults Obtain Eighth-Grade Education

WASHINGTON, Jan. 14 (UPI) — The Office of Education announced Saturday $26-million in grants to the states for programs to give all adults a chance to reach an eighth-grade educational level.

The grants support basic education classes to help people overcome English-language limitations and prepare for occupational training.

Each state's share is based on the estimated number of persons over 18 years old who have not completed six years of school.

New York received the largest amount, $2,415,744, followed by Texas with $2,041,667.

pected to make his opposition more significant this year: A gain of 47 House seats by the Republicans in the November elections and the likelihood that many of the Southern Democrats in the House and in the Senate will behave as fiscal conservatives in a time of economic difficulties.

Senator Long's remarks on the Columbia Broadcasting System's "Face the Nation" program were cited by Congressional observers as evidence of this prospect.

Both Mr. Long and Mr. Ford predicted that the President would probably find it difficult to obtain Congressional approval of his proposal for a 6 per cent surcharge on income tax payments.

Senator Long asserted that "there are going to be reductions, no matter what the President recommends, with regard to domestic spending."

Dirksen Asks Space Cuts

Meanwhile, Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen, Republican of Illinois, suggested a reduction in the space effort.

The Senate minority leader, who appeared on the American Broadcasting Company's "Issues and Answers" program, said he thought such a reduction could be achieved by a "stretch-out" in the space program, which would in effect abandon the United States goal of landing a man on the moon by 1970.

"Does it really make a great deal of difference whether we get to the moon this year or next year, or the following year?" Mr. Dirksen asked.

"I doubt very much whether it makes a great deal of difference," he said. "And if we reconcile ourselves to that thesis, then, of course, there is the place where we can made a very substantial cut."

Senator Long said he foresaw reductions in the rent supplement program and "certain parts of the poverty program." He did not elaborate.

He said he felt Congress would also seek to cut military mous majority of the Democrats and the leadership in the Senate" believed the number of American troops in Europe was "excessive."

Only after it has first sought to reduce foreign and domestic spending as much as possible, Mr. Long said, will Congress consider a tax increase.

Even after such cutbacks have been made, he said. "My guess is that the Congress is not going to look favorably upon a tax increase."

In his appearance on WTTG, a Washington television station, Mr. Ford said he thought that, among other items, the antipoverty program should be "redirected."

"It can be tightened up and money can be saved," he said.

Highway Plan Attacked

Mr. Ford said cutbacks in spending could also be made in the program to beautify the nation's highways and parks and in public works projects of the Bureau of Reclamation.

He did not make it clear exactly what he meant in regard to the highway beautification program.

He contended that spending under the program would total about $100-million, but other Congressional observers said they believed that the program did not amout to that much money.

"I think we should adopt what is called a 'no new start program,'" Mr. Ford said. He explained that this would mean a freeze on Federal projects that had been authorized but were not yet under way.

Mr. Ford reiterated his opposition to a tax increase and said Mr. Johnson's surcharge proposal, made in his State of the Union Message, might fail to receive Congressional approval.

"I have grave doubts," Mr. Ford said, "that the Congress is going to pass this new Johnson income tax."

He said he felt that the President's proposal, if enacted, "could be a depressant which could trigger a very serious economic recession."

AC - 1/18/67

State School Aides Map Guides Appeal

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON—Georgia school board officials, apparently encouraged Tuesday after a luncheon meeting with the state's congressional delegation, have decided to ask the prestigious National School Board Association to support their stand on desegregation guidelines.

Sixteen members of the Georgia School Board Association aired their complaints about the guidelines before the congressmen and talked over suggestions the state group plans to present before an upcoming NSBA convention.

Included among the suggestions was a plea to preserve the so-called "freedom of choice" plans for desegregation. The U.S. Office of Education has hinted it may discontinue them next year.

The officials also want federal officials to apply the guidelines uniformly both to Northern and Southern school systems and to urge compliance officers to adhere strictly to Washington policy.

Many Southern superintendents have complained that temporary compliance officers sent to their states have exceeded Washington policies.

Ninth District Rep. Phil M. Landrum, dean of the delegation, said the luncheon meeting was "candid and constructive." He said it involved a full discussion of compliance efforts.

Landrum said the board members, led by GSBA President Jack Acree, asked for no action from the delegation, but simply to discuss the issues.

The congressmen gave "no commitments" to Acree's group, Landrum said.

Tuesday's meeting was attended by all members of the Georfgia delegation except Reps. Robret G. Stephens and John W. Davis, who were ill at home.

Sen. Herman E. Talmadge, D.-Ga., also participated in the meeting. Sen. Russell did not. He sent word that he sympathized with the schoolmen's problems.

WIFE OF WALLACE SWORN INTO OFFICE

ALABAMA

Governor Pledges to Push Husband's Fight Against 'Federal Bureaucracy'

By GENE ROBERTS

Special to The New York Times

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Jan. 16 —Mrs. George C. Wallace became Alabama's first woman Governor today and immediately announced that she would carry on her husband's fight against racial integration and "Federal bureaucracy" while he sought the Presidency.

"The principles of self-government," she said after a six-hour, 10-mile-long inaugural parade, "will not be suppressed by force—force from China, from Russia, from Cuba or from Washington, D.C."

[In nearby Tuskegee, Lucius D. Amerson, a Negro, was sworn in as sheriff in a quiet ceremony. He is the first Negro to hold the office in a Southern county in this century.]

Mr. Wallace, the outgoing Governor, stood by her side as she took the oath of office at the same spot where Jefferson Davis assumed the presidency of the Confederate States of America.

The symbolism was not lost on the thousands who crowded onto the Capitol grounds. They waved Confederate flags and cheered as she accused Federal judges and the Johnson Administration of undermining the United States Constitution.

"Even now," she said, "a Federal agency attempts to tell us the schools our children shall attend, to regulate the contents of their textbooks, who shall teach them, and with whom our children shall associate.

"This is an effort to gain control of the hearts and minds of our children. I resent it. As your Governor and as a mother, I shall resist it."

Continued on Page 17, Column 1

WIFE OF WALLACE TAKES HER OATH

Continued From Page 1, Col. 4

Estimates of the size of the crowd that lined Montgomery streets to watch the parade ranged as high as 100,000. About a quarter of the throng moved onto the Capitol grounds to witness the syearing in.

Midway in her speech, Mrs. Wallace, a blonde, 40-year-old a word for her husband, who is planning to seek the Presidency in 1968, possibly as a third-party candidate.

"I entered the race for Governor," she said, "for the purpose of permitting my husband to take our fight to the final court of appeal — the people of the United States in whom rest the ultimate sovereign power of this nation."

Mr. Wallace, in an address that immediately preceded his wife's, also touched on his Presidential aspirations.

"We see no reason," he said, "why a man from Alabama would not make just as good a President as a man from New York or California — or maybe even from Texas."

Barred by Alabama's Constitution from succeeding himself as Governor, Mr. Wallace entered his wife, Lurleen, as a stand-in candidate in the Democratic gubernatorial primary last spring. She won easily over nine Democratic opponents and then went on, under her husband's slogan — "Stand up for Alabama"—to defeat a Republican and an independent in the November general election.

Today, blue and white pennants with the legend "Stand up for Alabama" fluttered from dozens of light poles along Dexter Avenue, Montgomery's principal thoroughfare.

Among those present for the ceremonies were some of the South's leading segregationists: Leander Perez, the Democratic leader of Plaquemines Parish in Louisiana; United States Representative John Rarrick of Louisiana and former Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi.

Gov. Paul B. Johnson Jr., of Mississippi, who ran as a segregationist and later moderated his stance on race, and former Gov. Haydon Burns of Florida were also seated on the inaugural stand.

Although the day officially belonged to Mrs. Wallace, it was dominated by her husband. Wearing a black cashmere suit and pillbox hat, she stood quietly and waved at the parade units while Mr. Wallace blew kisses to drum majorettes and beauty queens and shouted his thanks to county political leaders who marched past the reviewing stand.

"You're doing a good job," Mr. Wallace shouted as one float and former Gov. Ross Bar-of Mississippi.

v. Paul B. Johnson Jr., of ssippi, who ran as a segrenist and later moderated
tance on race, and former Haydon Burns of Florida also seated on the inaugstand.
hough the day officially ged to Mrs. Wallace, it dominated by her husband.
ing a black cashmere suit billbox hat, she stood quiet-nd waved at the parade while Mr. Wallace blew s to drum majorettes and y queens and shouted his s to county political lead-who marched past the re-ng stand.
ou're doing a good job,"
Wallace shouted as one float passed with a Wallace for President banner.

There were floats that praised "Alabama's beautiful women," floats that compared Mr. Wallace with George Washington and Mrs. Wallace with the Statue of Liberty and one proclaimed:

"Uncle Sam is sick. The Wallace program will cure Uncle Sam."

Another float, sponsored by the Daughters of the Confederacy, bore the huge legend "Lest We Forget."

There was no need for the Daughters to have worried. No fewer than 21 bands played "Dixie" as they strode past the inaugural stand, and a group of boys 9 or 10 years old, all of them dressed in Confederate gray, marched up to the Governor's stand, saluted and knelt before the new Governor and her husband.

But gray uniforms and "Dixie" were shunned today by Negro bands—which were not allowed to participate in Mr. Wallace's inaugural parade in 1963 or the parade for his predecessor, Gov. John Patterson.

Most of the Negro bands played patriotic tunes such as "Stars and Stripes Forever." But one—a small high school band from Butler County—played "Batman" as it passed Mr. Wallace.

However, the greatest contrast from the inauguration of four years ago—when Mr. Wallace shouted "Segregation forever"—was supplied by two drill teams from a high school in Huntsville. Both groups—one of boys and one of girls—were racially integrated.

Hucksters passed through the inaugural crowd selling "Wallace for President" hats and buttons that said, "Alabama's Own Lurleen Our Governor—Let's Make George President."

At the city's hotels and motels, which had sold out their rooms long in advance, a long-playing recording of speeches by the husband-wife political team was selling briskly at up to $5 a copy.

And when the moment came for Mrs. Wallace to step on the bronze star that marks the spot on the Capitol steps where Jefferson Davis formally became the President of the Confederacy, state troopers had to fight to keep the crowds back.

In taking the oath, Mrs. Wallace became the third woman to become a state Governor. Miriam (Ma) Ferguson of Texas and Nellie Taylor Ross of Wyoming were both inaugurated as Governors in 1924.

Mrs. Wallace's speech emphasized again and again that her administration would be a continuation of that of her husband, who built his reputation in Alabama by his militant opposition to Federal desegregation orders.

However, she indicated that she plans to bring a woman's touch into the Capitol.

"As a wife and mother, as well as your Governor," she said, "I shall be inclined to examine programs of each of our departments from the standpoint of how they affect the family."

Johnson Will Adapt Program to Court South's Democrats

By MARJORIE HUNTER
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22—Administration strategy in the months ahead is likely to rest heavily on tailoring legislation to fit the Southern Democratic bloc in the House.

Southern Democrats hold the balance of power in Congress, and no one is more aware of this than a man who grew up in that lively school of politics, Lyndon Baines Johnson.

Without Southern Democratic votes, the Administration cannot hope to salvage many Great Society programs. Without Southern Democratic votes, too, Republican efforts to block or alter drastically Administration programs will be futile.

It is all a matter of arithmetic.

There are 246 Democrats and

Continued on Page 25, Column 1

JOHNSON TO ADAPT PROGRAM TO SOUTH

Continued From Page 1, Col. 5

187 Republicans in the House. The Administration can count solidly on from 140 to 170 Democratic votes, depending on the issue. It might also win 10 to 35 liberal or moderate Republican votes, again depending on the issue.

In either case, without substantial Southern Democratic support, the Administration will fall short of the necessary 216 majority, if all members are present and voting.

Republicans, too, cannot act alone. Some liberal Republicans have voted more often with the Democrats than with their own party. But even assuming there are no Republican defections, at least 30 Democratic votes will be needed to trim or alter Administration programs.

Until recent days, it was generally assumed that most of the 83 Southern Democrats, more in tune with the thinking of Republicans than with liberals of their own party, would automatically vote with the Republicans on most domestic issues.

But many Southern Democrats are showing signs of growing resentment over repeated statements by Republican leaders that they will not actively court Southern Democratic votes in the House.

The reasoning of Republican leaders is that they want to carve a picture of their own on the national level, particularly in the South, where they have picked up Congressional seats and other political offices in recent years.

Hoping to make further inroads in the South, Republican leaders say they would be giving Southern Democrats a "free ride" by forming an open coalition with them.

As one Republican leader put it:

"Southern Democrats could keep right on saying, 'Why elect a Republican? I vote just as conservatively as any Republican.'"

Most Southern Democrats are conservative, some far more so than many Northern and Western Republicans. Too, there is general hostility to President Johnson and his Great Society throughout much of the South.

But the Southern Democrats are an independent lot, unwilling to be taken for granted by Republicans, and are casting around for the best bargaining position.

"There will be times when the Administration and the Republicans will be damn glad to have votes from us," said Representative Joe D. Waggoner Jr. of Louisiana, one of the most conservative of the Southern Democrats.

There is no consensus yet among the Southerners as to how best to make their influence felt.

There has been talk of creating a loosely knit organization, with staff and researchers, patterned somewhat along the lines of the Democratic Study Group, composed of about 140 House Democratic liberals.

"We need a readily available group of like-minded people, but not too organized," Mr. Waggoner said. "We'd have to be flexible and operate on a basis of issue by issue."

Representative Alton Lennon, Democrat of North Carolina, favors an even more organized conservative organization, open not only to Southern Democrats but also to other Democratic conservatives, largely from Border states.

Little Favor So Far

So far, the idea of setting up an organization, either formally or loosely, has met with little favor among Southern Democrats.

"I don't want anybody telling me how to vote," said Representative Basil L. Whitener, Democrat of North Carolina, also extremely conservative.

Representative Omar Burleson, Democrat of Texas, one of the most popular of the Southern conservatives, is also opposed to such an organization.

"This might tend to lock us in," he said. "I'm not for that."

Other influential Southern Democrats are also opposed to organizing. Some say they have not even been approached on the idea.

Educators Seeking Guideline Equality

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 1/22/67

By the Associated Press

Educators in 12 Southern states are seeking support of national educators in efforts to get school desegregation policies applied equally throughout the nation, a Georgia educator said Saturday.

The Georgia School Board Association at its convention beginning Sunday will be the first of 12 state associations to be asked to act on a resolution directed at the National Association of School Boards.

"We hope the national association will take some initiative in systematizing school desegregation policies," Jack Acree, executive secretary of the Georgia association said.

ACREE, who attended a meeting with the state's congressional delegation in Washington earlier this week, said a major problem is that the U.S. Office of Education's guidelines are being administered by unqualified people.

"The School Board Association has a positive, constructive position," Acree said in an interview. "We will not tolerate any evasiveness of the Civil Rights Act. School desegregation is the law of the land and it must be accomplished."

He said, however, that unqualified administrators of the Health, Education and Welfare Deepartment policies are costing Georgia in bond issues, public confidence, teachers and citizens who are refusing to serve on local school boards.

"It is resulting in the downgrading of our school systems, which is exactly the opposite of what Congress intended," he declared.

He said representatives of school board associations in the 12 states already have considered the resolution to go before the Georgia association at its convention Monday. Other state associations will be asked to vote on it later.

Acree said the resolution would ask the national association to take the initiative in trying to get all school desegregation policies administered equally by qualified people.

OTHER ASSOCIATIONS to consider the resolution are from Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Florida.

"The HEW people are not talking defacto segregation," he said. "We contend that defacto segregation is just as much segregation as that which we have in the South. We feel that when the Supreme Court says desegregate, it means desegregate.

"The key word with us, when we talk about desegregation outside of the South, is 'local control'," he added. "We feel that HEW is encroaching on local control, but that desegregation policies should be carried out in the same manner everywhere."

Acree emphasized that his association stands behind the Civil Rights Act, but that provisions of the law are not applied the same everywhere.

"These interpretation should be spelled out in policies, statements, guidelines, or other means to all school systems," he said.

School Officials Query U.S. Aides

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

AC 1/24/67

By FRANK WELLS

School board officials from all over Georgia put U.S. Office of Education officials on the spot Monday with face-to-face questions about school guidelines.

The confrontation took place at the second general session of the 15th annual Georgia School Boards Association meeting at the Biltmore Hotel.

Answering the sometimes rather angry questions were David Seeley, Deputy U.C. commissioner of education, and Dr. J. C. Martin, John R. Hodgdon and Dr. Hugh Brimm, all of the U.S. Office of Education.

MOST OF TIME

One question took more time than nearly all the others put together. The school board members wanted to know if guidelines were going to be enforced in Northern communities where there is de facto segregation as well as in the South where the segregation formely was a question of law.

Seeley answered this by saying that so far the guidelines had been designed to "help" those school systems desegregate that were formerly "dual" systems—with one set of schools for whites and another for Negroes. He said the guidelines had not so far been applied to schools with a unitary system—even if there were de facto segregation there.

"It is our constitutional duty to dis-establish the dual system," Seeley said. "That is the job we have been given to do by Congress."

GRADUAL COMPLIANCE

He said in answer to later questions that the guidelines were an effort to effect gradual compliance of Southern school systems with Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and that forced compliance — advocated by some congressmen—could be immediate and complete under the law.

Gov. Lester Maddox later spoke to the school board members at a banquet at the Biltmore.

He said that during his campaign he visited practically every county and individual school district.

"The people have told me what they want," the governor said.

"They want a public school system equal to or better than any in the nation . . . and they want every child regardless of his station or where he lives to be prepared to take his or her place on an equal basis with every other child in the country."

Continued on Page 10, Column 1

Educators, U.S. Aides Toss Barbs

Continued from Page 1

Gov. Maddox told of the budget plans of his administration for $1 billion for public and higher education in the state over the next two years.

In the panel discussion, the school board members were not satisfied with some of Seeley's answers, and asked the same questions again and again in trying to get clarification. These questions concerned the "freedom of choice" plan and reconciliation of this plan with guidelines percentages of Negro attendance at formerly all-white schools.

A CHOICE

Seeley said that he considered "freedom of choice" plans as compliance with the law. At this answer, one of the school board members asked him to reconcile that answer with the definite instructions his board had received to get a higher percentage of Negroes into formerly all-white schools.

The panel of questioners included E. Jean Wise of the Americus City Board of Education; Ed Cole of the Newnan City Board of Education; W. L. Robinson of the Fulton County Board of Education; and A. D. Clifton of the Candler County Schools.

FED. POLICY

Senators to Help Wallace Fight $95 Million Cutoff

AC 1/26/69

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — A sympathetic Senate Finance committee volunteered Wednesday to pressure federal officials not to cut off $95.8 million in Alabama welfare funds Feb. 28 as scheduled.

Chairman Russell B. Long, D.-La., said he thought Alabama had a "strong case" in the controversy after hearing testimony from former Gov. George C. Wallace and other state spokesmen.

Long said he would send a record of the testimony to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and ask Secretary John W. Gardner to defend his decision to approve the cutoff.

Wallace, speaking as "special assistant" to the present governor, his wife Lurleen, told the committee Wednesday that Gardner's action was "arbitrary and beyond the law."

Wallace spoke before four sympathetic southerners including Georgia Sen. Herman E. Talmadge, who helped him occasionally with pointed questions.

"Alabama is in full compliance with the law," Wallace insisted at the hearing. "All we have refused to do is to sign a little piece of paper which we think is beyond the law."

The paper is a promise to comply with the 1964 Civil Rights Act, required of all southern states seeking HEW funds. Alabama is the only state which has not signed the pledge.

Wallace contented that the compliance promise, as well as federal desegregation guidelines for welfare facilities, are not authorized by the civil rights act.

"We'll abide by any regulations which the courts say are legal," Wallace told the commit-

Continued on Page 10, Column 5

Senators to Help Wallace on Funds

Continued from Page 1

tee. "We say these regulations are illegal."

During questioning, Talmadge said he thought the cutoff would have the most drastic effect on "the sick, lame and blind persons" who normally depend on Alabama's welfare services.

"I can't understand how anyone can feel he ought to punish 200,000 people simply because some state officials didn't sign a piece of paper," Talmadge said.

"It doesn't relate to discrimination in any way, shape or form."

Earlier, Wallace had made a similar plea: "If someone violates the law," he said, "punish him, punish me but don't punish all those poor people."

DENIES CHARGES

Wallace told the committee that contrary to Gardner's charges, there is no racial discrimination in Alabama's welfare facilities.

"We wouldn't want to discriminate even if there wasn't any law," Wallace said, "and we have not discriminated."

He said HEW officials were trying to force the state to be a "third party" in compelling private physicians to desegregate their waiting rooms and forcing nursing homes to admit everyone.

"We don't think that any state agency should be required to tell a doctor what kind of waiting room he should have," Wallace said.

Asked later why only seven per cent of the state's nursing home patients are Negro, Wallace said: "I think it's a credit to the Negro race that when their people get old they want to keep them at home with them instead of sending them off somewhere."

The only challenge to Wallace and the string of Alabama congressmen appearing with him came from Sen. Vance Hartke, D-Ind., who charged Alabama was trying to get away with as little compliance as possible.

Wallace admitted that there was still some segregation in Alabama, but told Hartke, "there's just as much in Indiana."

Federal compliance officers are expected to appear Thursday at a second session of hearings. The Finance Committee has no actual power to reverse HEW's decision.

MARVIN CAPLAN

SCHOOL DESEG.

MINUTES OF THE MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE ON COMPLIANCE AND ENFORCEMENT AND REPRESENTATIVES OF THE SOUTHERN INTERAGENCY CONFERENCE

Tuesday, February 7, 1967

Present: Charles Wittenstein (American Jewish Committee), Connie Curry (American Friends), Charles Morgan (ACLU), Samuel Ethridge (NEA), Rev. L.A. Harper (United Church of Christ), Arnold Aronson (Secretary, LCCR), Joseph L. Rauh (LCCR), David Brody (ADL), David Cohen (ADA), Frank Pohlhaus (NAACP-LCCR), Olga Corey (LCCR), Marvin Caplan (LCCR).

With attendance reduced by the blizzard, those present directed their discussion principally to one issue: whether the school desegregation guidelines should be abolished or strengthened and if strengthened, how.

There was general agreement that responsibilities under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 call for abolition of the dual school system. There was recognition of the need for some sort of standard to measure the extent to which progress was being made toward this objective and the following criteria were agreed upon:

1. The burden for compliance must be placed on the local school boards, not on HEW or the parents. The local boards must show through affirmative action that they are attempting to desegregate their schools and abolish the dual system.

2. Assignment of pupils should be made on a geographic basis and freedom of choice should operate only within a framework of geographic assignments for the purpose of accelerating progress toward the elimination of dual school systems.

3. Within a given school district the presence of all-Negro or all-white schools would require the board to justify the situation or be held in non-compliance.

4. Where, under a geographic assignment policy, there is a substantial variation from a percentage (yet to be determined) in the ratio of Negro to white students in a school or Negro to white teachers on a faculty, the school board would, again, have to justify this or be held in non-compliance.

5. Site selection for new schools must be carried on with a view to seeing that it furthers desegregation and the abolition of the dual school system.

6. In selecting school districts to proceed against, the Office of Education should not confine itself to the most flagrant violators. It should consider moving also against larger areas where education is highly valued, such as De Kalb County, Georgia, areas that are looked up to as leaders in education within a state. Although these districts may violate the law less openly than other areas of the South, they violate it nevertheless and when they get away with it, smaller districts take heart and follow their example.

7. Attempts should be made to require desegregation in athletics, particularly at the university level. The children of the South need heroes and oustanding performances by Negro athlates in integrated athletics would go far toward creating a better climate for desegregation.

8. The Attorney General should be urged to eliminate exemptions for districts under court order; such districts should be required to meet the highest standards of compliance set by the guidelines.

9. We should push for a statement of public policy by Secretary Gardner or the President that would demonstrate to the nation that the federal government means to enforce compliance with the law.

10. The guidelines should be amended now to at least conform to the standards set by the Fifth Circuit Court decision.

11. It was also generally agreed that a document showing how the government perpetuates segregated schools might be helpful in fighting the attacks on the school guidelines.

It was suggested that James Hamilton, Chairman of the Committee, be asked to convene a meeting at some later date to discuss the school guidelines and Northern schools.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

NYT 2/10/67

COURT WILL REVIEW RULING ON SCHOOLS

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 9 (AP)—The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit agreed today to review its controversial decision ordering public schools to desegregate all grades this fall.

The review by the full 12-judge court has been sought by school boards in Louisiana and Alabama.

The appeals court's ruling last Dec. 29 was a sweeping decision that, if allowed to stand, will affect public schools throughout the South. The review was sought by four school boards in Louisiana and three in Alabama.

The 2-to-1 decision was by a three-judge panel of the 12-judge court. In asking for a review, the defendant school boards argued that the decision setting such far-ranging legal precedent should be made by the full 12-judge court.

"In view of the importance of these cases the petitions for a rehearing en blanc are granted," the appeals court said "The cases will be submitted in briefs only."

Three of the judges said oral arguments should be allowed, but the majority voted to limit the hearing to briefs.

The court directed the school boards to submit their briefs within two weeks. Plaintiffs in the case were given an additional seven days to file their answers.

Chronic Backaches Laid To the Strain of Standing

NEW ORLEANS (UPI)—As if still being penalized by nature for daring to get up off all fours, mankind's most common chronic ailments are backaches and neck pains caused by constant strain on vertebral ligaments.

This is the view of an expert on spinal problems, Dr. Richard S. Koch of Olympia, Wash.

Addressing the American Osteopathic College of Sclerotherapy here, Dr. Koch attributed most recurrent neck and back pains to poor posture and and skeletal defects.

He said the way many people habitually sit, stand and walk often puts undue stress on spinal ligaments that eventually weaken and, in turn, produce pain.

SCHOOL DESEG

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1967.

New Approach to de Facto Segregation in North Is Tested

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11—The Federal Government is making a quiet but potentially significant effort to ease the hitherto intractable problem of de facto segregation in the North.

The effort is modest in dollar terms, involving only $20-million, less than 1 per cent of the expenditures during the first two years of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

But some Federal officials—including those at the Office of Education—believe that the new approach is capable of expansion, and they are actively promoting it in school districts across the nation.

The thrust of the effort is to get local communities to attack de facto segregation — caused not by official policy but by residential patterns—with funds from Title I and Title III of the act.

Title I provides school aid for disadvantaged children. Title III provides grants to help establish supplementary education centers and encourages other innovative techniques.

Other approaches to de facto segregation in the North have not been successful. Efforts to invoke Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits discrimination in federally assisted programs, have failed because Title VI outlaws only segregation through separate school systems for whites and Negroes.

The Government has found it very difficult to show conclusively that segregated schools in the North have been caused by anything other than residential patterns.

The use of Title I and Title III funds to overcome de facto segregation is set forth in some detail in supplementary testimony submitted by the Commissioner of Education, Harold Howe 2d, to the civil rights subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee.

Mr. Howe appeared before the subcommittee in December and, at the subcommittee's request, later submitted data listing the local educational projects in the North that used Federal funds to combat segregated schools.

The testimony shows that under Title I, 17 localities are receiving about $16,340,000 to provide education help for mixed groups of white and Negro children. Most of this is funneled to New York, where $14,559,839 is being used to "promote quality integrated education" for 289,419 impoverished children.

According to the testimony, the New York program is aimed at providing transportation of children from predominantly Negro or Puerto Rican schools to other schools. Mr. Howe insisted however, that the Office of Education funds were used not primarily for busing of students, but for improved instruction and administrative expenses.

Under Title III, 28 school districts—including four receiving Title I funds—are receiving $3,013,925 for a wide variety of experimental programs, including special language centers for Spanish-speaking children and innovative curriculum planning for minority group children.

The largest single grant under Title III was awarded last week to Los Angeles. With $474,488 in Federal funds, Los Angeles will begin a program aimed at improving five high schools and four junior high schools in and near the Watts ghetto to the point where they will become attractive to students, including whites, from other parts of the city.

Upgrading Schools

The Los Angeles project provides perhaps the most dramatic example of the potential uses of title III funds to overcome de facto segregation, but other communities have also seized upon the idea of upgrading existing schools, or creating whole new "educational parks" to attract both white and Negro students.

Planning grants to study the feasibility of educational parks have been awarded to Berkeley, Calif., San Jose, Calif., Syracuse, N.Y., East Orange, N.J., and Baltimore, New York and Philadelphia.

Mr. Howe emphasized that the uses to which Federal funds were put were not controlled from Washington. He said that all the Title I and III programs used to promote racial balance in Northern schools were provided in response to "local option, without requirement and because these communities wished to do this kind of thing."

He acknowledged, however, that the Office of Education was "trying very hard to persuade school districts which have problems of de facto segregation to make use of our various programs to have some useful influence on these problems."

2 Named to Academy Board

WASHINGTON, Feb. 11 (AP)—President Johnson announced today the appointment of Jess Larson, president of the Air Force Association, as a member of the board of visitors to the United States Air Force Academy at Colorado Springs. Mr. Johnson also reappointed Houston H. Harte, president of the Express Publishing Company, San Antonio, Tex.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

NEW YORK TIMES, MONDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1967.

Suit Seeks to Widen Basic Racial Law

By BEN A. FRANKLIN

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12—An aggressive legal attack on de facto discrimination against Negroes and the poor in the public schools of the District of Columbia is nearing a conclusion here. Its effect could be felt in every large city and suburb in the land.

Seven months of argument ended last week in the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. A ruling is expected soon, and the appeal—considered a certainty no matter what the outcome—will then go to the United States Supreme Court.

The decision there, lawyers here believe, could greatly enlarge the current law against racial discrimination in cities, particularly in large Northern cities with growing Negro populations.

The long and complex case—it has already accumulated 7,000 pages of transcript and 500 exhibits—is an attempt to break through the settled boundaries of the basic ruling on school desegregation handed down 13 years ago by the Supreme Court.

The objective of the Negro plaintiffs is to bring de facto segregation—that is, discrimination through economic and social behavior, such as the flight of middle class white families to the suburbs—under the same constitutional prohibitions as those placed on de jure segregation, or discrimination by law.

Economics a Factor

An element of economic class in the suit was believed to be unusual. For the first time in such a civil rights suit, according to lawyers here, poor families of all races are also the plaintiffs. The suit contends that de facto discrimination is directed at low-income neighborhood schools generally, regardless of race.

The case is regarded as important because it seeks a sweeping extension of judicial authority.

Julius Hobson, a militant Negro civil rights spokesman here who is the chief plaintiff in the suit, has sought to limit the scope of the case to the District of Columbia alone.

He wants the court to enjoin further use of Washington's controversial track system, which groups students according to ability, and he wants a court order requiring an equal distribution to all schools of funds, teachers and equipment.

'You Can't Do It'

Mr. Hobson insisted in an interview yesterday that he was interested in "quality education for Negroes, not in racial balance in a city where 93 per cent of the students are Negroes, because I do not believe that is possible."

For the court to try to enforce racial balance under these circumstances, Mr. Hobson said, "would be throwing the baby out with the bath—you can't do it."

But the issues and circumstances of the suit are nonetheless controversial because, should the plaintiffs win a favorable decision, the judicial remedies proposed by their attorneys are regarded as novel, if not drastic.

In final briefs, filed this week with Judge J. Skelly Wright of the Federal Appeals Court here, the plaintiffs propose that the court appoint a receiver or special administrator for the city school system to carry out the reforms the court may order.

The plaintiffs' brief suggests that the court could direct the imposition of additional tax support for the city schools, including a city payroll tax that would hit hardest at suburban commuters.

It also raises anew a controversial suggestion, that Judge Wright could conceivably order a merger, under a Federal receiver's direction, of the city and suburban school systems.

Judge's Views Recalled

All the suburban school systems have more money, better teachers, newer buildings, and only a small number of Negro students. In the Washington area, the suburban schools are in two separate state jurisdictions, those of Maryland and Virginia.

The significance of this proposal has been heightened by the fact that in February, 1965, Judge Wright delivered a lecture at the New York University Law School in which he declared that the Federal courts would ultimately require urban-suburban school mergers to achieve an area-wide racial balance in metropolitan centers.

"In his lecture, Judge Wright called it "inconceivable that the Supreme Court will long sit idly by watching Negro children crowded into inferior slum schools while whites flee to the suburbs to place their children in vastly superior, predominantly white schools."

Judge Wright's views on this question were regarded as so clear that lawyers for the city moved early in the trial to disqualify him, a motion he denied.

This week Judge Wright made another statement which, it is believed, further clarified his views. In a vigorous dissent from the majority opinion of Judges Charles Fahy and Wilbur K. Miller, Judge Wright upheld Mr. Hobson's contention in a separate part of the same suit, that the school board here is acting unconstitutionally because it is appointed by the judges of the United States District Court rather than elected.

Thus, although the Negro plaintiffs lost that point of their suit, they obtained strong support from Judge Wright, who is hearing the de facto discrimination issues of the suit separately and alone.

2/15/67

The Atlanta Journal

"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"

SCHOOL DESEG.

Fire Guideline Aide, Rep. Landrum Urges

U.S. Civil Rights Officer Called Unfit by Georgian

By WAYNE KELLEY
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15—Rep. Phil Landrum, D-Ga., Wednesday called for dismissal of the U.S. Office of Education's top civil rights compliance officer in the wake of a bitter dispute involving Georgia school officials.

Rep. Landrum, dean of the Georgia delegation in the U.S. House of Representatives, charged that David S. Seeley, assistant commissioner for equal educational opportunities, "is not fit for the post he holds."

The 9th District congressman made his blunt statement after Mr. Seeley released the text of a scathing letter he had written to Jack Acree, executive director of the Georgia School Boards Association (GSBA).

The GSBA has been feuding with Mr. Seeley for more than a year over federal enforcement of public desegregation guidelines.

IN HIS LETTER, dated Feb. 8, Mr. Seeley repeated a charge he made at a GSBA convention in Atlanta on Jan. 23 that there is "a major campaign in Georgia to dissuade school systems from complying with the guidelines."

The GSBA passed a resolution denying the charge, expressing its resentment of the allegation, and calling upon Mr. Seeley "to either retract his statement or to support same with irrefutable evidence."

Mr. Seeley's reply last week blasted the "actions and statements" of some Georgia educational and political leaders concerning the desegregation issue.

The Office of Education official wrote that in 100 of Georgia's 196 school districts there is still "complete segregation of their regular classroom teaching staffs."

He added that "more than 50 districts have 98 per cent or more of their Negro students still attending segregated all-Negro schools.

"IN TALKING with school superintendents and school board members throughout Georgia, there is no question in our minds but that one of the major reasons why so little action has been taken to desegregate the schools is that local resistance to

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

HE CAUGHT 40 RATTLERS IN ROUNDUP

MOULTRIE, Ga., Feb. 15 (AP) — One man caught 40 rattlesnakes, more than anyone else, in the fourth annual rattlesnake roundup here last weekend.

He was Q. L. Bridges, whose catch was almost one-third of the total 121 snakes caught. Largest captured was a 10-pound rattler, snared by Jack Adams of the Berlin community.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

ing staffs.

He added that "more than 50 districts have 98 per cent or more of their Negro students still attending segregated all-Negro schools.

"IN TALKING with school superintendents and school board members throughout Georgia, there is no question in our minds but that one of the major reasons why so little action has been taken to desegregate the schools is that local resistance to desegregation has received strong support from the various actions and statements of educational and other leaders in the state," Mr. Seeley said.

The Office of Education official cited newspaper accounts of statements and actions by various state and educational officials to back up his charges.

Mr. Seeley did not name individuals, but claimed published accounts showed:

—The president of the GSBA and a member of the state Board of Education joined a committee to fight the guidelines.

—"A high state school official charged publicly . . . that the Office of Education was violating the law."

—Several "Georgia lawmakers" accused the federal government of exercising "unjustified and tyrannical use of power."

—A "high Georgia legal official" advised school superintendents not to file assurances of compliance required of districts operating under desegregation plans.

MR. ACREE and the GSBA have been openly critical of the guidelines and of the activities of compliance officers in Georgia.

An elected official close to Georgia educators said Wednesday that the GSBA had done little to ease the desegregation situation in the state.

"Jack Acree and some of those people are just inflexible," the official stated.

But if Mr. Acree was "inflexible," the actions of Mr. Seeley struck Rep. Landrum as "intolerable."

The congressman is a highly respected Southern moderate. President Johnson even stopped off in Rep. Landrum's home district in 1964 to put in a plug for his re-election.

The Georgia congressman has been privately critical for some time of Mr. Seeley's attitude on guideline compliance. The Seeley letter released Tuesday afternoon was apparently the last straw.

"SEELEY is just wholly unreasonable," Rep. Landrum asserted. "He and his kind (compliance lawyers) don't give a darn for education. They are interested in integration and not schools."

The congressman said he felt John W. Gardner, secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, and Education Commissioner Harold Howe II should replace Mr. Seeley and other compliance officers with experienced educators.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

U.S. Compliance Chief Turns Fire on Georgia Educators

AC 2/15/67

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Georgia's educators have done more to stir up resentment and mislead the public over the federal school guidelines than those in any other Southern state, a U.S. Office of Education official has charged.

Assistant commissioner David S. Seeley said the Georgians' statements have had the effect of "arousing hostility . . . misleading the public . . . and discouraging assumption of local responsibility" for desegregation.

Seeley, the nation's chief school compliance officer, made the statement in a Feb. 8 letter to Jack Acree, president of the Georgia School Boards Association. (GSBA)

The letter, released Tuesday by the Office of Education, was a direct reply to last month's GSBA resolution demanding that Seeley either prove or retract an earlier attack on Georgia school compliance.

In a speech at GSBA's annual convention Jan. 23, Seeley had charged there is "a major campaign in Georgia to dissuade school systems from complying with the guidelines."

The two-and-a-half page letter, latest in a series of clashes between Seeley and the GSBA, was a sharply worded answer to the organization's demand that Seeley support his Jan. 23 statement "with irrefutable evidence."

The assistant commissioner listed five separate incidents and statements to document his earlier charges—including some by officers of the GSBA.

Seeley pointed out that GSBA officers were directly involved in a committee formed in March, 1966, expressly "to fight" the just-issued federal desegregation guidelines.

Three months later, Seeley said, "a high state school official charged publicly . . . that the Office of Education was violating the law, and indicated that local school superintendents should not comply . . ."

Continued on Page 14, Column 2

U.S. Compliance Chief Hits Georgia Educators

Continued from Page 1

Seeley said these and other public statements appeared to be "clearly part of the campaign to encourage resistance to compliance throughout the state.

"In fact, in our experience," Seeley said, "leading educational officials in Georgia have been more active in this kind of activity than those in other states, including Alabama and Mississippi . . ."

The Office of Education official said that after talking with school administrators throughout Georgia he was convinced that local educators were responsible for the large number of school districts not in compliance.

"There is no question in our minds but that one of the major reasons why so little action has been taken . . . is that local resistance to desegregation has received strong support from the various actions and statements of educational and other leaders in the state," he said.

Seeley said that next to Alabama and Mississippi, Georgia has more school districts which have been cited for non-compliance than any other state.

Almost 100 Georgia districts —more than half the total number — still maintain segregated faculties, Seeley said, and more than 50 districts have 98 per cent of Negro pupils attending separate schools.

Seeley said his earlier remarks "were not intended to offend anyone" but that he made the statements only "because I believe Georgians interested in education would want to think about it."

The letter was the first such sharp attack Seeley has made against a state school board association.

An Office of Education spokesman said the assistant commissioner had felt it necessary to reply to this one, "because he has never been nailed to the wall this badly before."

Howe Backs Aide's Blast At Georgia Educators

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

By ART PINE

Constitution Washington Bureau AC 2/17/67

WASHINGTON — U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe Thursday fully endorsed an assistant's charge that Georgia educators have stirred up hostility over federal school guidelines.

However, he emphasized that the remarks contained in a letter written by Assistant Commission David S. Seeley were not meant to apply to every educator in Georgia.

Harold Howe

Howe said he thought Seeley made "relatively a valid judgment" when he charged that Georgia educators had done more than those in other states to support resistance to school desegregation.

"But," he said, "if I had written the letter, I might have added that we're not trying to say that there has been no cooperation at all."

The letter, which Seeley sent to Jack Acree, president of the Georgia School Board's Association, to back up his earlier criticisms, drew sharp reaction this week from several of the state's congressmen.

Howe cited Georgia State Superintendent Jack Nix as an example of a "public official who has shown willingness to cooperate constructively in trying to work out a solution to compliance problems."

Just the same, the commissioner said, "I would have to agree there has been considerable public criticism of the guidelines on the part of some Georgia educators and officials.

"A voluntary leadership plan can't operate without positive spirit on the part of public officials," Howe said.

DAY

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

February 21, 1967

Mr. Joshua B. Zatman, Director
Resources & Materials Center
Equal Educational Opportunities Program, OEO
Washington, D. C. 20202

Dear Mr. Zatman:

Thank you for the thoughtfulness and sending the material on the 16th. It is being passed on to our Research Department.

With best wishes.

Sincerely,

Paul Anthony
Executive Director

PA/km

2/16/67

TO Paul Anthony

from the desk of Joshua B. Zatman Director
Resources & Materials Center
Equal Educational Opportunities Program, OE
Washington, D.C. 20202

Area Code: 202 - 962-6281
Gov't Code: 13 - 26281

Arkansas

The Searcy Independent School District, approximately 50 miles North of Little Rock, has achieved complete desegregation. The school system has absorbed all its 168 Negro students into schools attended by 2,000 white students. In the 1965-66 school year, Searcy had less than a third of its Negro students in school on a desegregated basis. In the 1964-65 school year, Searcy was fully segregated. Superintendent, James W. Ahlf.

The Jonesboro Independent School District has desegregated 64 percent of the Negro students in the current school year, up from 6.7 percent the previous year, involving some massive changes in historical enrollment patterns. Superintendent, C. H. Geis.

Georgia

On August, 29, 1966, the Baker County School District was notified that a Federal hearing examiner had recommended termination of its Federal assistance because of racial discrimination. The school administration then moved to admit 99 Negro students into predominantly white schools, immediately creating serious tension in the white and Negro communities.

The Atlanta Daily World published a news article on October 6, 1966, which stated that Negro parents were threatending to boycott all Baker County School "if nothing is done to halt harassment and inequities directed at Negro students."

The article said the sheriff had done nothing about white youths who pointed pistols at Negro students. Several Negro students said they had been attacked at school, and subjected to insults by teachers, principals, and bus drivers.

On November 1, the Baker County Board of Education passed a forcefully-worded resolution which was distributed to all students, teachers, and school staff, and which brought an end to much of the mistreatment. Three weeks later the Federal assistance was restored for Baker County. The positive and well-publicized commitment of the school board to desegregation is credited by NSOF staff for the relative success accomplished in Baker in the face of fierce community opposition. Superintendent, H. E. Hall.

In Floyd County, Ga., the school district abandoned a freedom of choice plan in favor of geographic zoning, and full desegregated its student body. This year, the Floyd County schools have 618 Negro students in formerly all white schools, ending a harsh discriminatory system that had involved transportation of almost all of the Negro children in the county system to Negro schools in Rome, Ga. In addition, Floyd County made a better beginning in faculty desegregation than many other Georgia district. Superintendent, H. A. Lindsey.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Florida

Okeechobee County is a rural area which had operated a dual school system prior to the 1965-66 school year. The usual dire predictions of racial violence preceded efforts of the school district to desegregate successfully under a freedom of choice plan. At the beginning of the 1965-66 school year, all but about eight Negro high school students elected to enter the white high school. As a result, the former Negro high school was closed and all students assigned to other schools. Okeechobee is perhaps most noteworthy because freedom of choice worked. After it desegregated, the community went about its business in relative peace. The school system this year is almost fully desegregated. Superintendent, Carl T. Durrance.

Osceola County, Fla., moved from 21.3 percent desegregation of its Negro students in 1965-66 to 60 percent in the current school year. About 640 of the 4300 students in Osceola are Negro. Superintendent, William D. Stephens.

Manatee County, Fla., provides an excellent example of success under capable school leadership. Manatee has enrolled 500 of its 3800 Negro students in school with white children (approximately 15 percent). Partly responsible for Manatee's progress is a newsletter issued by the school superintendent, which said:

"We believe we are dealing with more than the force of the Federal government. We are facing the consciences of a public which increasingly believes that the racial injustices of the past century must at long last be corrected. The pressures of the times--not the rioting on the streets, but the convictions of decent and thoughtful people across the country--demand that we no longer maintain a first and second class of citizenship."

The newsletter, issued February 1, 1967, is signed by J. Hartley Blackburn, Manatee superintendent. (See copy of front page, attached). In addition to student desegregation, Manatee has assigned 25 fulltime teachers "across racial lines."

North Carolina

Moore County, N.C., attributes part of its success in desegregation to a project funded by Title IV of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, preparing school personnel for problems growing out of desegregation. The school system has desegregated 62.5 percent of its Negro students. Thirteen of its 15 schools are desegregated, and 16 Negro teachers are in schools attended predominantly by white students. Superintendent, R. E. Lee.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

North Carolina

Cabarrus County, N.C., with a total of 9,200 students, has assigned all its 1100 Negro students to school on a desegregated basis by switching from freedom of choice plan to geographic attendance areas. Cabarrus, which had achieved 18.5 percent desegregation of its schools under freedom of choice in 1965-66, no longer has an all-Negro school. In addition, desegregated faculty and bus transportation. The county formerly bussed Negro to a city school while white students attended school in their neighborhood. Superintendent, J. H. Robinson.

Texas

Sherman Independent School District, said to be the locale of the last Negro lynching in Texas 30 years ago, is in the Eastern part of the State with the same population makeup that is found in Northern Louisiana. The school districtchas 710 Negro students, 3,918 white students. It has enrolled 589 Negro students in schools on a desegregated basis. In addition, considerable progress is being accomplished in other East Texas areas--Paris and Tyler among them. Superintendent, Byron Davis. Excellent source and contact to open doors in the area is C. P. (Cap) Landolt, former Sherman school superintendent who is now a regional compliance officer for Equal Educational Opportunities Program. Landolt is in the Dallas regional office.

Virginia

Amherst County exemplifies a rural county's dual-personality approach to ending the dual school system. The school district has approximately 5100 students, of which about one-third are Negro. Some 10 percent of the Negro students are now in formerly white schools, largely because of leadership of the school superintendent, Tyler Fulcher. While the school district is making progress in desegregation, it is also the locale of a newly-established private school which serves as an escape hatch for white students running from segregation. (See clipping of news story by Peter A. Janssen of Newhouse Newspapers).

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Wallace Sketches Plan To Defy U.S. Court Order

AC 3/22/67

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP)—Former Gov. George Wallace outlined to Alabama legislators Tuesday a bold new plan to defy a federal court order for statewide school desegregation.

It is based on the contention that the state's police power is greater than the authority of a three-judge court which handed down the school decision last week.

Wallace, speaking for his wife, Gov. Lurleen Wallace, called the legislators in groups and discussed with them what Mrs. Wallace might say in her speech to the House and Senate Thursday night.

The address will be broadcast statewide by radio and television.

One legislator said the plan outlined by the former governor seeks to put the schools under control of the chief executive and say to the federal court, in effect, that it has violated state law.

Details are still being worked out, the legislator said, but it could lead to another major federal-state showdown and perhaps a challenge to the courts to put a woman governor in jail for contempt.

Each member of the legislature was given a copy of the bulky federal court decree during the conference with Wallace and urged to study it carefully.

Wallace reportedly told the legislators there is no question of the state seizing control of the schools from the city and county boards. He was quoted as saying the federal court has already done that.

TO HEAR BETTER WITHOUT A DOUBT

SEE THE MAN FROM

Acousticon®

OF DECATUR

CLYDE W. CRAWFORD

235 E. Ponce de Leon Ave.
Room 318—Decatur, Ga.
PHONE 378-3431

Speed Desegregation, HEW Official Warns

SCHOOL DESEG.

3/30/67 AJ

Maddox Attacks Court Ruling Affecting Schools in 6 States

By WAYNE KELLEY and JOHN ASKINS

A majority of some 200 Southern school districts operating under federal court orders must do more to desegregate under a 5th Circuit Court of Appeals decision, an official of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) said Thursday.

But Peter Libassi, special assistant to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare for civil rights matters, warned school officials not to interpret the 5th Circuit ruling as an order covering every district in six Southern states.

"The decision says that districts in the 5th Circuit operating under court orders must now be brought up to the standards of the ruling," Mr. Libassi stated.

These "standards" set forth by the 5th Circuit are essentially the same as the controversial HEW guidelines which require faculty desegregation and substantial progress in student integration.

GEORGIA CURRENTLY has 11 school districts which are operating under federal court orders. They are the Atlanta city schools, Moultrie city schools, and the county systems of Bibb, Colquitt, Dougherty, Glynn, Houston, Muscogee, Chatham, Richmond and Taliaferro.

An informed source in Washington said that some of the Georgia districts under court orders were actually doing more to desegregate than was required by the 5th Circuit ruling.

No information was immedi-

Turn to Page 10, Column 2

INTEGRATE

Continued from Page 1

ately available on whether any of the Georgia districts would be required to do more.

The status of school districts not under a federal court order remains unchanged, Mr. Libassi said. The HEW official stated that local school officials would be "grossly misled" if they thought otherwise.

"Any district that does not want federal funds does not have to comply with the HEW guidelines," Mr. Libassi added.

HOWEVER, HE pointed out, the Justice Department, acting on the complaint of any resident of a school district, may initiate legal action resulting in court-ordered desegregation.

Gov. Lester Maddox called the court decision "sad and unbelievable . . . ungodly and criminal."

"This is another blow at local control of education and another blow at education," Gov. Maddox said.

"It's an insult to the children, both white and Negro, the parents and the faculty to have to conform to this encroachment on liberty. The federal government is placing integration ahead of education and the welfare of the people."

Maddox said the people indicated in the Nov. 8 general election that "they are sick of this federal encroachment striking at the heart and soul of liberty and freedom."

DR. SMITH said he didn't foresee much impact in Georgia of the ruling even when it applies to the state.

"All systems in Georgia now have on paper all grades desegregated," he said. "I don't know of any systems whose freedom of choice plans don't include all grades."

The 5th Circuit ruling applies only to the states within its jurisdiction — Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas.

Approximately 200 school systems in the six southern states are currently under court order to desegregate their public schools.

"I WOULD say a majority of the existing court orders do not meet the letter of the 5th Circuit court decision," Mr. Libassi said.

Any southern school district faced with a loss of federal funds could qualify for approval "within a week," the HEW civil rights official commented.

In Atlanta, School Superintendent John Letson said the ruling will have little effect on his system.

"We have been fully desegregated for some time," he said. "At least, all grades have."

He conceded there are schools in the city attended by many more Negroes than whites, but he said the Negro students have an option to go to predominantly white schools.

REGARDING FACULTY assignments, he said, "We have made a beginning, even before we were required to do so. We are attempting to proceed in accordance with desirable personnel practices.

"There are many teachers of good will interested in taking a different assignment racially.

Negro Phase-Out In Teaching Seen

SCHOOL DESEG

AJ 3/30/67

By DON WINTER

Mergers between Southern white and Negro teacher groups should be carefully considered since they often mean "the phasing out of the Negro," the Georgia Teachers and Education Association has been warned.

Combining of white and Negro associations in border states has resulted in the disappearance of the Negro organization's name, buildings, assets, staff and program, said John Kermit Haynes, executive secretary of the Louisiana Education Association.

In short, Mr. Haynes said, "integration has been a unilateral process."

MR. HAYNES' Wednesday night speech to the opening banquet of the three-day GTEA convention was given a standing ovation. GTEA Executive Secretary H. E. Tate commended it to the local unit leaders, reminding them that merger between GTEA and the white Georgia Education Association is in the works.

Committees appointed by both groups last year will submit plans to the National Education Association in May. If the NEA approves, the plans will be voted on by GTEA and GEA conventions in 1968.

However, Mr. Haynes addressed himself to more than the fate of GTEA. He made it clear that the South has experienced a "good amount of desegregation, but no degree of integration."

Specifically, he said, Southern-style integration places "the burden on Negroes . . . And in nearly every case, the Negro administrator and teacher can expect to lose."

HE POINTED out that in Kentucky, where almost complete desegregation has been effected, the number of Negro principals has declined from a segregated 75 to an integrated three.

In another border state, he said, a friend of his had served as principal of a Negro high school for many years. Then, with integration, his school was changed to a junior high school, and the counselor of the formerly white high school was made principal. The Negro administrator was demoted to assistant principal at the integrated high school.

The final insult, Mr. Haynes said, was the changing of the former Negro school's name. In honor of long service, the building had been named for its Negro principal. "But they said it couldn't have that name if whites were to attend," Mr. Haynes said.

Mr. Haynes also noted that once "integration" comes, Negro students must transfer to white schools and Negro schools are sometimes closed down, or receive no new white pupils.

Even more "devastating," he said, was the treatment of Negro teachers. If the system is integrated, it relies heavily on white teachers. He pointed to Charlotte, N.C., which hired 600 teachers last year, 14 of them Negroes.

HE URGED GTEA members to protest against the trend. He said they must be active in the "Negro community" and try to recapture the "position of respectability we once occupied."

Teachers must be leaders, he said, even in the civil rights movement. "I must say with Adam Clayton Powell, 'Keep the faith, baby!' " Mr. Haynes admonished his audience.

Mr. Haynes tied his plea for leadership by teachers to his assessment of the public's opinion of Negro teachers.

A subtle current even in Negro communities seeks to discredit Negro teachers as inferior in training and performance, he said, yet, the evaluation is made by laymen, who "90 per cent of the time . . . would not know a well-run classroom from an outdoor privy."

Others who will speak during the GTEA convention include Georgia Lt. Gov. George T. Smith, 3 p.m. Thursday, and Dr. Martin Luther King at the closing Friday night session.

SCHOOL DESEGR.

Eugene Patterson

AC 3/3/67

One Child, One School

"Sad, unbelievable, unGodly, criminal." Such words have to be discounted, coming from Gov. Lester Maddox, because he has used them so much. He applies them this time to the federal court of appeals finding that the guidelines are legal. What a governor does is more important than what he says, however.

And Gov. Maddox is not interfering with efforts by Georgia school districts to comply with the school desegregation guidelines. Indeed, he feels the schools and the children could be hurt more by defiance than by compliance. By thus negatively reducing the issue to a lesser of two evils conclusion, the governor is enabled to back resolutely into the future while volleying words to the winds.

In the more positive act of stamping the Office of Education guidelines with court sanction, the 5th Circuit Court reminded the South that percentages and racial balances and freedom of choice options are not the goal; they are means to an end which the law requires—dismantling of two school systems based on race, and emergence of one school system in which race is not a factor.

This ultimately will save Georgians a lot of money, among other things, while they raise the level of education for all children, not just white ones.

* * *

The court specified that freedom of choice plans are not enough, if they are failing to move school systems progressively toward the conversion of dual systems into single systems.

This conversion was what the law of 1964 required. The Office of Education guidelines simply took the liberty of making the conversion gradual instead of demanding instant, total change. But the goal which the law requires remains the same—disestablishment of dual schools—and if freedom of choice plans alone cannot achieve progress toward that goal, the court made clear that it is up to the school systems to devise other means of getting there.

For instance, a large number of Georgia school districts where freedom of choice has failed are already making administrative decisions of their own volition to merge their two school systems by other means. Most prevalent is the practice of transferring entire grades.

Superintendents and boards are noting, for example, that it makes good sense, economically and educationally, to move an unusually small grade out of a Negro school entirely and merge it into a large class in the white school—an administrative assignment that makes freedom of choice beside the point. The relatively small number of Negroes being absorbed into a large white class under such conditions makes the level of integration incidental. And the progressive merging of such grades contributes materially to the disassembly of the dual system. This is the kind of action, thought out locally, that the guidelines encourage to achieve the goal that the law demands.

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION

For 99 Years The South's Standard Newspaper

RALPH McGILL, Publisher

EUGENE PATTERSON, Editor

Established June 16, 1868
Issued daily except New Year's, July 4, Labor Day, Thanksgiving and Christmas. Second-class postage paid at Atlanta, Georgia.
The Atlanta Constitution (morning) and The Atlanta Constitution and The Atlanta Journal (Sunday), published by Atlanta Newspapers, Inc., 10 Forsyth St., N.W., Atlanta, Georgia 30302.
Home delivered subscription rates (including taxes): Morning and Sunday, 1 week, 45c. Morning daily only, 1 week, 45c. Subscription prices by mail on request. Single copies: Daily, 10c; Sunday, 20c.

SCHOOL DESEG.

The Tortoise Race Is Over

School segregation was sentenced to death in 1954, but its execution has been a long and painful one.

The reason for its longevity was the "deliberate speed" doctrine of 1955. The year before, the court had only stated a principle. It then heard further arguments before deciding how to implement the ruling.

"Deliberate speed" was one of the fairly rare cases in which the court said that a right existed but might not necessarily be exercised right away. Some found it questionable law, but few could argue that the court and the nation faced an enormous practical problem of implementation.

Thirteen years have passed since the 1954 milestone and 12 since the "deliberate speed" ruling. Children not even in school when the first decision was rendered are graduating from high school this spring—many hundreds of thousands of them in segregated schools.

Congress, the most timid branch of government in this matter, finally acted on school segregation in 1964. The Civil Rights Act of that year forbade giving federal funds to school districts failing to make good-faith steps toward elimination of segregation.

The law left the Department of Health, Education and Welfare with its own implementation problem. As guides to what constituted good-faith compliance, it suggested certain minimum standards. These now call for ending the dual system this fall. Some Southern officials have fought HEW as bitterly as they once did the courts. Their favorite argument has been that HEW is asking more than Congress or the courts.

The full Fifth Circuit Federal Court of Appeals has laid that argument to rest. By an 8-4 vote, the appellate court in effect confirmed the general outline of the guidelines. It is not enough to give a child freedom of choice to transfer from a segregated school to an integrated one, the court said; the dual system itself must be abolished. Faculties and facilities as well as students must be integrated.

The Fifth Circuit's ruling technically applies only to some 200 school districts operating under federal court integration orders. But it clearly stands as precedent for any other.

Thus as far as HEW is concerned, a school system may ignore the guidelines if it is willing to give up its federal funds. But as far as the courts are concerned, evasion is at an end. So the dual system is legally dead now, whether a school takes federal funds or not.

The Fifth Circuit's ruling does not touch the difficult problem of de facto segregation resulting from city ghetto patterns, North and South. But it does declare an end to the tortoise race which "deliberate speed" had become.

ATLANTA, GA., 30302, FRIDAY, MARCH 31, 1967 64 PAGES, 3 SECTIONS ★★★★★ Ten Cents

Lurleen Requests Right To Seize Public Schools

Legislature Asked to Defy Court

By REX THOMAS

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (AP) — Gov. Lurleen Wallace asked the Legislature Wednesday night for power to take over Alabama's public schools to defy a federal court integration order.

And, referring to the court which handed down the mandate eight days ago, she said defiantly:

"They have made their decree. Now let them enforce it."

In a speech to the cheering legislators, broadcast throughout the state by radio and television, Mrs. Wallace sought to invoke the police power of the state government to override the court order.

She urged the legislature to "issue a cease and desist order" to the court which last week ordered statewide integration.

CONSIDER JOBS

And she asked the House and Senate to consider the employment of additional state troopers "in order that the children of our state be protected."

She told the legislators the court decree must be resisted "in every way possible." And promised solemnly:

"Whatever need be done will be done."

Mrs. Wallace told the jointly assembled House and Senate that the court order — which she said would force the closing of all Negro colleges as well as compel faculty as well as pupil integration of public schools — "is calculated to destroy the school system of Alabama."

Then she added, solemnly: "I am serving notice that whatever power I possess under the constitution of Alabama as governor shall be used to prevent the destruction of our public school system."

And, she added, "those who are responsible" for the court order "had better understand what the people of Alabama mean."

POLICE POWER

The governor said the state, by its police power, has the right to "take whatever action which may be necessary to protect the morals, health and welfare of its citizens — the peace and tranquility of its people."

And, she declared, that police power exceeds the authority of the three-judge federal court.

"We must if necessary invoke the police power of this state," she warned.

If a stay is not granted or if an appeal to the Supreme Court fails, Mrs. Wallace said the legislature should give her "all powers heretofore vested in the state superintendent of education, including, but not limited to, supervisory control with regard to our various local boards of education."

Continued on Page 8, Column 1

Gov. Wallace Asks Control of Schools

Continued from Page 1

She said the local boards and the state's higher institutions "were judged without their day in court," a reference to the fact that only one board, the one in Macon County, was a party to the suit which brought last week's ruling.

In that decision, the court ordered State Supt. Ernest Stone to assume the responsibility for seeing that the integration mandate is carried out.

"Alabama is not the battlefield," Mrs. Wallace declared. "The entire nation is the battlefield. Alabama must win this fight, for if she loses, America loses."

"This (court) order," the governor said, "forces white children to go to all-Negro schools and Negro students to go to predominantly white schools."

JAIL PARENTS

However, she continued, "the only way to force students to attend elementary and junior high school is to put their parents in jail."

And, she promised defiantly, "We in Alabama will not put parents in jail for this reason — and we cannot and will not deprive our Negro children and college students of an education by closing all Negro schools.

"If they are closed, the federal courts will close them."

She charged that the court order "was rendered in malice and animosity—malice against a free people who would exercise their sovereign power—animosity against a leadership expressed by Alabamians — through my husband — which begins to bring to this nation a moment of truth."

The governor, paraphrasing the words of President Andrew Jackson to Chief Justice John Marshall, threw down this challenge to the court:

"They have made their decree. Now let them enforce it."

Mrs. Wallace told the legislators that as the mother of four children, "my heart is filled with compassion for all the children of our state. As a mother, I can understand as do other mothers of theis state what they are attempting to do to our children."

"This," she declared, "is the final step toward a complete takeover of their hearts and minds. This is what Hitler did in Germany."

The governor's challenging words were reminiscent of those of her husband, former Gov. George C. Wallace, during his four years as Alabama's chief executive.

Wallace, whose term as governor ended last Jan. 16, the day his wife took office, is known as a symbol of segregationist resistance and a self-styled champion of states rights and what he calls constitutional government.

EYES WHITE HOUSE

And he is an almost certain candidate for president in next year's election. He ran in presidential primaries in Wisconsin, Indiana and Maryland in 1964 and received a surprisingly strong vote, then withdrew after former Sen. Barry Goldwater won the Republican presidential nomination.

A year earlier, Wallace had made a widely publicized stand in the doorway of the University of Alabama in an unsuccessful attempt to block the admittance of two Negro students and in an effort to dramatize the clash between state and federal authority.

The present governor's resistance, and that of her husband, was intensified on the eve of her appearance before the legislature when the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that six Southern states, including Alabama, must integrate their schools at the start of the fall term this year.

Georgians Urge House Halt Office of Education Funds

School Deseg

AC 4/17/67

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — In what appears to be a new twist, Georgia's 10 congressmen have asked the House to cut off appropriations to the U.S. Office of Education for violation of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

The Georgians contend the agency is violating the law by requiring school districts to reassign teachers and pupils to form integrated classes where free choice plans do not work out.

As "proof" they point to a clause in the act that specifies that desegregation shall not mean "assignment of students —so as to overcome racial imbalance."

And they have asked appropriations subcommittee Chairman Daniel Flood to see that his panel does not approve funds that the Office of Education will use "for continuation of such policies."

The request was contained in a letter to Flood circulated this week among a large number of Southerners and conservatives in the House.

All 10 Georgians signed the letter, it was reliably reported.

The group also asked Flood to make certain that school districts which did no more than assign students "without regard to race" as specified in the Civil Rights Act were given access to all federal aid.

In effect, the letter asked the House not to permit the Office of Education to require schools to go beyond their free choice plans in order to insure that Negroes and whites attend together.

A Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals decision earlier this month said school districts must take other steps to desegregate their facilities if Negro students do not take advantage of the freedom of choice plans.

The letter charged that Office of Education policies had "promoted the Atomic Energy Commission" to refuse to send educational films to schools which met the letter of the civil rights law.

Also, the letter charged, the agency had "caused the Department of Defense to threaten to deny research contracts to institutions which refused to recruit students and faculty based on race."

The letter charged the Office of Education with trying to "exercise direction, supervision and control over school personnel, including faculty assignments, in violation of the intent" of federal regulations.

BUNIONS?

Get fast relief! Dr. Scholl's Super-Soft Zino-pads cushion, ease painful areas, protect sore toe joints from shoe pressure.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

The Atlanta Journal

"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW" 4/24/67

43 School Units Facing Fund Loss

State's Stake $8.5 Million In U.S. Guideline Hassle

By WAYNE KELLEY
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, April 24—Forty-three Georgia school districts face a possible loss of more than $8.5 million in federal aid funds because of desegregation compliance problems, a survey shows.

The districts, all relatively small and many with pressing financial difficulties, have been cited by the U.S. Office of Education for failure to comply with federal desegregation guidelines.

Six Georgia school systems have already lost approximately $1 million as the result of final termination orders from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

THESE FIGURES are compiled from preliminary allocations of 1967 federal funds under two acts, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 and the National Defense Education Act.

The $8.5 million estimate for the 43 systems currently at odds with the federal guidelines is low since it does not include all sources of federal aid.

Federal funds for the school lunch and school milk programs, vocational education programs and aid to federally affected areas are not included.

Spokesmen for the U.S. Office of Education said they had no record of total federal aid received by each school system. Attorneys working with the HEW in compliance cases once asked for the information but never received it, a reliable source said.

ALLOCATIONS available to school systems under Title I and II of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, and Title III and V of the National Defense Education Act, provide

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

CASEY JONES COLLEAGUE DIES AT 93

MEMPHIS, April 24 (AP) — Avery Warner, engineer of the "Cannonball Express" that took Casey Jones on his death ride, has died here. He was 93.

Warner brought the Illinois Central train into the Memphis station 67 years ago and turned the throttle over to John Luther (Casey) Jones. Jones died that same night and became part of American folklore when his locomotive crashed into a freight train at Vaughan, Miss.

Warner started railroading as a fireman in 1895 and became an engineer three years later.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Suits on Guidelines Hinted by Maddox

Gov. Lester Maddox says federal decrees are threatening as a fireman in 1895 and became an engineer three years later.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Suits on Guidelines Hinted by Maddox

Gov. Lester Maddox says federal decrees are threatening to destroy Georgia's progress in education and he indicated he will fight federal desegregation guidelines in court.

In a speech delivered to the Dykes High School Parent-Teacher Association Sunday, the governor said he will do everything in his power "to assure that control of our schools remains in the hand of local officials."

Gov. Maddox recently returned from a governors' conference in Montgomery, where he joined Alabama Gov. Lurleen Wallace, Louisiana Gov. John McKeithen and Mississippi Gov. Paul B. Johnson in issuing a statement promising to fight federal guidelines in the courts.

He told the Dykes PTA Sunday that he advocates "what I believe is an orderly path—and that is through the courts.

"This is the American system. "None of us wants lawlessness and disorder in the streets."

THE GOVERNOR also had a good deal to say about the progress of education in Georgia.

"The State of Georgia must open the door of progress to all children and young people within its borders," he said. "We will do this only if we provide them the best possible education our state government can afford."

Gov. Maddox said his administration has shown its interest in education by passing the largest budget for education in the state's history and by providing record salary increases for teachers.

THESE FIGURES are compiled from preliminary allocations of 1967 federal funds under two acts, the Elementary and Spokesmen for the U.S. Office of Education said they had no record of total federal aid received by each school system. Attorneys working with the HEW in compliance cases once asked for the information but never received it, a reliable source said.

ALLOCATIONS available to school systems under Title I and II of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, and Title III and V of the National Defense Education Act, provide the bulk of the money which would be lost by most systems, however.

The six Georgia school districts which have lost all federal financial assistance would have drawn more than $981,030 under the two acts for 1967 and, it is assumed, a comparable amount next year.

The cutoff will mean as much as $78 per pupil for the 566 children in Glascock public schools and $55 per pupil for the 2,537 youngsters in the Toombs County System. Other systems losing all funds are Camden, Seminole, Randolph, and Terrell.

The Office of Education has initiated formal compliance proceedings against 31 other Georgia school systems. The federal money at stake here exceeds $6,198,210.

Deferrals of funds have been lifted from six other school districts, but the Office of Education may still institute proceedings against them. The money involved here totals more than $1,384,173.

IN ADDITION to the 43 Georgia systems listed in noncompliance by the Office of Education, others are expected to run into compliance trouble. Fulton County, with approximately $750,000 in federal aid at stake, is negotiating with federal compliance officials.

Furthermore, some Office of Education officials point out that "freedom of choice" plans used by a number of Georgia counties are producing fewer Negro transfers to desegregated classrooms than last year.

SCHOOL SYSTEMS currently listed as failing to comply with the OE guidelines include: Americus, Appling, Atkinson, Ben Hill, Brooks, Burke, Calhoun, Decatur, Dooly, Early, Elbert, Echols, Effingham, Evans, Hart, Jenkins, Johnson, Jones, Lamar, Lee, McDuffie, Miller, Montgomery, Morgan, Newnan, Oglethorpe, Screven, Stewart, Sumter, Tattnall, and Vidalia.

Deferrals have been listed, but proceedings continued, against Jefferson, Mitchell, Newton, Taylor, Turner, and Warren.

Dolive Heads Funds Drive On Arthritis

Earl Dolive, executive vice president of Genuine Parts Co. in Atlanta, will head the 1967 fund - raising campaign of the Georgia chapter of the Arthritis Foundation, which opens here on May 1.

Earl Dolive

A special kickoff luncheon for campaign workers is scheduled at 12:15 Thursday at the Biltmore Hotel.

Mr. Dolive, who said the goal for 1967 is $75,000, pointed out that "the Arthritis Foundation does not conduct house-to-house solicitations, but depends largely on contacts with business firms and individuals to provide the vital research work."

Serving in this year's campaign with Mr. Dolive are Brannon Morris, vice chairman; P. T. McCutchen, Cody Laird and David Stallings, business and industry; James V. Carmichael, special gifts; Lamar B. Peacock, M.D., physicians; Robert McMartin, dentists; McIver Evans, Realtors; James E. Thomas, attorneys; Beaty Smith, insurance; Barnard Murphy, stockbrokers; Robert E. Harkrider, pharmacists; Ray Crim, accountants; John E. Smith II, automobile dealers; Hugh Inman, printing industry; Bob Watson, savings and loans; Dean George Griffin, schools and colleges; Mrs. Joe High Williams, women's special committee; David N. Meyer, distilled spirits dealers; Champney McNair, banking, and John B. Ellis, foundations.

Convicted Pilot Asks New Trial

A motion for a new trial for a College Park airline pilot convicted of involuntary manslaughter in the Oct. 23 slaying of his wife has been taken under advisement by Superior Court Judge Samuel Boykin.

Judge Boykin heard the motion Monday.

The pilot, Lawrence J. Stevens, was sentenced to a maximum of five years in prison. He has been free on $10,000 bond pending appeal since his Jan. 12 conviction.

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Many Negroes Seek Return To Segregated Classrooms

AC 4/24/67

By ART PINE
Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Scores of Negro pupils who transferred to white schools under "freedom-of-choice" plans in 1966 are asking to be returned to segregated schools schools next September, reports here show.

Dixie enrollment figures filed with the U.S. Office of Education indicate there will be a startling number of "free-choice" districts with less desegregation next fall than they had in 1966.

In five of 30 Georgia districts tabulated so far, local officials said they expect fewer Negroes in white schools next fall because so many are asking for transfer back to Negro schools.

And although it's still to early to predict percentages, statisticians here point out, reports from other states show the same trends is becoming apparent throughout the Deep South.

To Southern school officials, the figures are likely to come as sure proof of what they have been insisting all along: That Negro pupils themselves "don't want to" go to school with white children.

They will be able to say that the Negro pupils requesting the re-transfers have had a year's experience in desegregated classrooms and apparently—for one reason or another—didn't like it.

But to federal compliance officers, who still have hold of the government purse-strings, the statistics tell a different story: Local officials aren't doing enough to make free-choice plans work.

Compliance officers who have interviewed some of the pupils requesting re-transfer say there are two reasons so many Negro youngsters "just didn't

Continued on Page 8, Column 4

Negroes Seek Return to Segregated Schools

Continued from Page 1

like it" in white classrooms last year:

1. In many newly desegregated districts, Negro pupils have suffered considerable harassment from other students, teachers and parents, they have told federal officials.

2. Transferring from traditionally inferior schools, the Negro pupils have found the new desegregated classes much harder academically — and white teachers have done little to help them adjust.

NOT EASY

"It hasn't been easy for many of these kids," says regional compliance officer Richard Fairley. "Often, they've been hit with erasers, spat upon or beaten. Other times, they've been ignored."

Testimony from witnesses at recent official compliance hearings would seem to back up Fairley's contention. A few samples:

—In Georgia, a Negro pupil was beaten by white classmates and left unconscious outside a classroom. But the principal of the newly-desegregated school said there was nothing he could do to help.

—In South Carolina, a Negro couple's home was shot at and finally burned to the ground after their child enrolled in a previously all-white school.

—In one Deep South district, Negro pupils reported they could not get white teachers to help them with problems after school—or even answer their questions in class.

TOTAL TO DROP

Whatever the causes, however, the overall number of Negroes attending previously white schools will be lower this September than in fall 1966.

And the result is that for the first time schoolmen may find themselves worrying more over how Negro pupils are reacting to desegregation than how white pupils are—if they want to keep federal funds.

"Under the guidelines, some progress is expected from local districts every year," says compliance chief David L. Seeley, commenting on the re-transfers. "This is just backsliding."

The consensus here is that the Office of Education may soon press backsliding districts to take more "positive steps" to make sure their free-choice plans produce integrated classrooms.

Federal courts already have upheld requirements that school officials help clamp down on pupil harassment and also institute remedial programs to help Negro youngsters catch up academically.

But the real thrust as far as free-choice districts are concerned may be in faculty desegregation—especially in assigning Negro teachers to formerly white schools.

"We've found that Negro children are more ilkely to feel at home in schools with desegregated faculties," says Fairley, who has talked at length with many pupils.

In fact, he points out, almost all the requests for re-transfer have been from Negro pupils attending schools in which all the teachers are white.

SRC SCHOOL DESEG.

REPORT OF THE SPRING WORKSHOP OF THE EDUCATIONAL COMMITTEE OF THE FLORIDA COUNCIL ON HUMAN RELATIONS, HELD AT WINTER PARK ON MAY 6th, 1967.

PERSONS PARTICIPATING:

(Resource) Miss Nancy Adams - NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund, Miami.
(Resource) Mr. Dewey Dodds - Equal Education Opportunities Program, Office of Education, HEW, Washington, D. C.

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Mrs. F. Layton Berquist | - | Lakeland Council |
| Mr. Carl Sangree | - | Winter Park |
| Mr. David Eddy | - | Winter Park |
| Mrs. James Olson | - | Lakeland |
| Miss Nettie Y. Jones | - | Cocoa |
| Miss Marjorie Fowler | - | Winter Park |
| Mr. W. G. WWhite | - | Zephyr Hills |
| Mrs. W. G. White | - | Zephyr Hills |
| Miss Barbara Gantt | - | Daytona Beach |
| Mr. George H. Bost | - | Stuart |
| Dr. H. F. Williams | - | Miami |
| Mr. James Alfred | - | Gainesville |
| Mrs. Kate Brewington | - | Winter Park |

Summary of Morning Session of Workshop

Mr. Dewey Dodds opened the Workshop with a presentation of equal educational progress in Florida since 1954. He noted that little progress was made from 1954 to 1964 and that practically all progress came from the force of the U. S. Civil Rights Act of that year. He stated that Florida was leading the old South in school desegragation despite being well below the U. S. Guidelines requirements, generally. That the greatest progress was achieved in South Florida counties such as Dade, Hamilton, Gaston, Hillsborough, and a few others. Mr. Dodds, as chief compliance officer for the State of Florida, explained the roles his office of the Federal Government plays, and stated that dual school systems should be eliminated by the Fall of 1967. He concluded his talk with recommendation of the steps that local Councils should take to expedite and assist their school systems towards the national goal of complete desegregation:

a. Urge county school boards to take the initiative in preparing their communities for school desegregation. This action is vital and where it has been taken (Dade, Hamilton, Gaston, etc.) the transition was easily and quietly successful.
b. Support the superintendent and school board publicly (letters, press releases, resolutions, etc.) where they show willingness and initiative.
c. Counsel with law enforcement officers and urge them to give protection of the law to students, parents, teachers involved in school desegregation.
d. Counsel with parents, teachers and students and assure them they will not lose jobs, or be molested when they cross educational lines. Advise them that law enforcement agencies, at all levels, your Council, NAACP and the Federal Government stand behind them.

Miss Nancy Adams then spoke to the Workshop group regarding the NAACP Legal Defense Fund and the general picture of education in Florida. She noted the increasing estrangement of Negroes discouraged over their inability to exercise their civil educational rights despite the Civil Rights Act. She felt that the U.S. Guidelines were inadequate for school desegregation and that the percentages of school integration were unrealistic because of the way they were arrived at (Example: 5 Negroes in a school with 500 whites integrated 555 students). Believed the only way to get a correct indicate was to total number of Negro students of the total of all Negro students who were in an integrated educational situation. Miss Adams also stated that another true indicate was whether the dual system of schools existed or not. She then made the following telling observations:

a. Free choice method is not working because it places the responsibility solely on the Negro. It could be successful if 100% of the Negroes exercised free choice, but it works out to only tokenism in Florida. She ruefully noted that at the present time this is all there is, and that somehow we have to make it work.

b. Negroes do not apply for admission to white schools because:

(1) They are fearful of pressure on parents (job loss, etc.) and they are reluctant to change to a school that requires a harder scholastic effort for them; obvious lack of acceptance and loss of some earned credits.

(2) Negro teachers will lose their jobs. For years these undertrained, overloaded teachers in the inferior Negro schools could not, and cannot now meet teaching standards of white schools. They oppose desegregation on that score because of the jeopardy of personal situations. This fact splits Negro leadership with some against - some for - free choice. Solution is to somehow make it work.

(3) Urban situations have created de-facto segregation, by and large. Inner circle or level of cities highly segregated by housing patterns. Second circle or level going through re-segregation processes while the third (semi--suburbia) is mostly white. The fourth, or suburban level is all white.

(4) State Board of Education controls the de-segregation process through suggesting new school sites to local school systems. If local system does not follow their suggestions they will withhold state funds for the new schools. Officially, they are color-blind; however, they create de-facto situations, as in the case of Hillsborough County where they proposed a large high and vocational school in the fourth (all-white suburbia) level.

Miss Adams, in a question and answer period noted that the "nearest school" guideline precept continues to segregate ghetto schools. That a vast remedial program is necessary in most areas to bring Negro children up. Federal programs for remedial work should be encouraged and supported locally. The question-answer period finished, the Workshop adjourned for lunch.

Summary of Afternoon Session of Workshop

After some general discussion it was decided that the group seek ways and means to set up local programs for councils to put into effect for the purpose of assisting and expediting the desegregation of the schools in their areas or counties. The chairman proposed the following basic actions in order to have an effective and active program. Each action was discussed after presentation.

a. Form a local committee on education. Become fully knowledgeable of the present and future status of educational desegregation in your school system.

b. Obtain a copy of the "Assurance of Compliance" plan submitted by the school system to the Federal Government (1967-68 school year). Same can be obtained from School Board or HEW if not available. In counties under court ordered decree, obtain their plan of compliance from School Board or Federal Court concerned.

c. Study plan - compare with guidelines or court requirements. Accept facts and figures only after verification - where they are suspect. If plan is distorted, untrue, erroneous or not adhered to, make known and protest through Council resolution, letters, etc., to School Board. Send copy of same to State Council Office for information (and action where indicated).

d. Take follow-up action after start of school year in Fall of '67 to see plan is being carried out. Take remedial actions where necessary.

e. Co-ordinate council educational activities with other sympathetic and interested agencies or groups in your locale; i.e., NAACP, YWCA, League of Women Voters, Ministerial groups-alliances, Urban League, FEA and local teachers associations. Enlist their aid and support.

f. Inquire into egual educational opportunities admission policies of the private or denominational schools in your community. If not open for all students regardless of race, creed or color, try to counsel or conciliate and effect an open door admission policy.

g. In all of the above, write letters of encouragement, suggestion, protest or praise (as case may be) to School Board members, school superintendent, Mayor, councils, commissioners, ministerial groups, etc., supporting progressive attitudes-actions, and pointing out errors, omissions and improprieties where they are known. Encourage local law-enforcement agency to extend protection of the law in tight situations. Use the resolution method of the Council to make known Council position on equal education at all times. The power of a single letter of concern or protest has been demonstrated to be invaluable. When in doubt as to what to do, write a letter!

The workshop adjourned at approximately 3:45 p.m. and the undersigned summarized the above to the general membership.

Respectfully submitted

John E. Shelley

John E. Shelley
Chairman
State Educational Committee

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1967

Guidelines at Stake

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

Mechanism for Integrating Schools Faces a Serious Test in Congress

By ROBERT B. SEMPLE Jr.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 12 — At stake in the struggle over the school desegregation guidelines is the fate of the Government's most effective mechanism for carrying out the desegregation of Southern schools that was ordered 13 years ago by the Supreme Court. Since the Court outlawed the dual school system in 1954, the percentage of Negroes attending classes with whites in the 11 Southern states has jumped from about zero to 12.5 per cent. But almost all of this has been accomplished since the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which forbids discrimination in Federally assisted programs and which gave birth to the guidelines.

News Analysis

The central role of the guidelines helps explain much of the behavior in recent days among the lawmakers on Capitol Hill and the policymakers in the Administration.

In Congress, the Southerners are using every parliamentary tactic at their command to remove the teeth from the guidelines—rules that require annual percentage increases in the number of Negroes at formerly all-white schools. The elimination of this requirement would seriously cripple the Administration's desegregation strategy.

The Administration, meanwhile, has given the appearance of retreating. Yet, it is a tactical retreat, composed of a series of minor and essentially symbolic concessions designed to divert Southern ire from the main target: the guidelines themselves.

A Case in Point

A case in point was the decision announced Wednesday by Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare John W. Gardner to remove civil rights enforcement powers from his constituent agencies — including the Office of Education, which enforced the guidelines—and centralize them in his own office.

Nobody in Mr. Gardner's agency was happy about the move, on the grounds that enforcement is weakened when it is separated from the agencies that distribute the money and know how the programs work.

But the step was necessary, in part, because Congress had asked Mr. Gardner to centralize enforcement powers a year ago, and in part, because any further delay would simply have irritated the Southerners and complicated the larger strategy of saving the guidelines and acquiring more money and personnel to enforce them.

The Administration has requested $5.4-million for enforcement, up $2-million from last year, and 131 additional enforcement personnel.

Two other recent events may be explained in similar terms. One was the announcement this week that the cabinet department would hire Southern educators with demonstrated skill in desegregating schools to help carry out compliance in hard-core school districts. The other was the resignation two weeks ago of David Seeley, the Office of Education's chief compliance officer, who accepted a high education post under Mayor Lindsay in New York.

Neither the announcement nor Mr. Seeley's resignation came as a surprise. Mr. Seeley, whose tough interpretation of the guidelines angered the South but won admiration in the North, had, in fact, been seeking a change for three months.

Outcome Is in Doubt

But both events have given the Southerners in Congress further opportunities to say that they are forcing the Administration to back down. To the extent that this helps insulate the guidelines and other programs, the Administration is perfectly willing to let them do so.

Whether the strategy will succeed is, at the moment, an open question. One beneficiary may be the Administration's school aid bill, which the Republicans are trying to re-write by eliminating specific aid programs and replacing them with so-called "block grants," which the states could use as they saw fit.

To woo Southern support away from the Republican bill—and the Republicans have acknowledged that they cannot succeed without it—would be an important victory in Administration terms. But there is no similar assurance that the Southerners can also be diverted from their long-range effort to destroy the effectiveness of the guidelines.

For the fact remains that Congress represents the South's last hope to repeal the guidelines and, in effect, Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Southern efforts to persuade the President and Mr. Gardner to soften enforcement of the guidelines by executive action have failed. Attempts to have the rules overturned in the courts have likewise been frustrated.

Seriousness of the Struggle

The seriousness of the present struggle is not lost on the Administration either. Abolition of the percentage requirements —under which school districts are expected, if possible, to place between 15 to 18 per cent of their Negro children in white schools by next fall—would remove the one yardstick available for judging whether a school district is making genuine efforts to abolish the dual school system and, thus, qualify for Federal aid.

It would, in effect, make the guidelines meaningless. It would remove real authority for desegregation from the executive branch and give it back to the courts, where plaintiffs would have to rely for redress on the laborous process of individual suits.

And it was precisely the failure of this process to achieve substantial desegregation that forced the Congress, in 1964, to bring the guidelines into being.

---

$24,040 in Jewelry Stolen

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Larkin of the King Ranch in Kingsville, Tex., have reported the loss of three pieces of jewelry valued at $24,040 from a suite in the St. Regis-Sheraton Hotel, 2 East 55th Street. They told the police that they had left their two-room suite on the 16th floor at 6 P.M. Tuesday for dinner. Upon returning at 9:30 P.M. they discovered the loss.

...ing dropped into the river where it will be ... salvage. This picture was taken the instant the two charges went off.

Dixie Solons Back Guide Changes

SCHOOL DESEG

AS 5/17/67

By WAYNE KELLEY
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON—Southern strategists in the House education bill battle have decided to back school guidelines amendments drafted by Rep. Edith Green, D-Ore., it was learned Wednesday.

Rep. Green, ranking Democrat on the House Education and Labor Committee and a staunch civil rights supporter, will offer her amendments next week when the Elementary and Secondary Education Act comes to the House floor.

Her package of proposals would have the effect of restricting the use of desegregation quotas for schools and applying the controversial federal guidelines to all 50 states.

Rep. Green was chairman of a special House education subcommittee which held hearings on the guidelines in Atlanta last December. She said at the time that she felt the U.S. Office of Education was going beyond the law in some of its desegregation requirements.

THE AMENDMENTS to the administration bill to be offered or supported by Rep. Green include:

—Enforcement of the guidelines uniformly among the 50 states rather than only in the South.

—Citation of statutory authority for every desegregation demand in the guidelines before it is enforced.

—Deletion from the act of authority for the commissioner of education to fix courses to be taught by members of the teacher corps.

—Assurances that school desegregation guidelines will not amount to assignment of pupils so as to correct racial imbalance in school districts.

THE REQUIREMENT that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare cite statutory authority for all guideline requirements is seen as an attack on the quotas used in negotiating with Southern school districts.

Application of the guidelines to all states would press the argument advanced by Southerners that de facto segregation in Northern states is just as vulnerable to the 1964 Civil Rights Act as the de jure segregation which existed in the South.

"These amendments are going to have a profound effect on politics throughout the country," said one Southern congressman.

The Green amendments reportedly will have no opposition from Rep. Carl Perkins, D-Ky., chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee. The majority of the committee is expected to oppose them.

House Republicans are backing amendments offered by Rep. Albert Quie, R - Minn., which provide block grants to states with a minimum of federal controls.

The fate of the amendments drafted by Rep. Green could well depend on how Republicans choose to vote when the administration school aid bill hits the floor next week.

Henry Gets Post With Paper Firm

RICEBORO, Ga. (AP)—Grady W. Henry has been named Interstate Paper Corporation's area wood procurement superintendent for Southeast Georgia.

ech Probl

SCHOOL DESEG.

IMES, THURSDAY, MAY 18, 1967

NYT 5/18/67

In The Nation: A Guide to the Guidelines

By TOM WICKER

WASHINGTON, May 17—There is an old story about the American tourist who was taken by a smiling Soviet guide to see a station of the antiseptically clean, beautifully decorated, brilliantly lighted new Moscow subway. The American noticed only one thing wrong.

"Where are the trains?" he asked.

The smiling guide, as the story goes, stopped smiling and snarled: "Well, what about Little Rock?"

•

This technique of avoiding an answer by raising another subject is not unknown in American politics. It is being seen right now in the House of Representatives, where Southern members are making two powerful arguments against the school desegregation guidelines of the Office of Education.

The only trouble with these arguments is that they are directed against aims and effects of the guidelines that do not really exist.

The first of these Southern arguments is that the guidelines only reach segregation in the South and are not aimed at the massive de facto segregation in the Northern cities. This is true enough but also irrelevant.

Neither the guidelines nor any other official Government policy is directed at de facto school segregation—that form of all-Negro or all-white schools which results from residential patterns. Busing students from one part of town to another is much discussed and is even being tried here and there; but it is strongly resisted by many parents and students of both races and it is of dubious educational and social validity in any case.

The only way ultimately to break down this kind of de facto segregation is to break down the residential patterns that produce it—to break up both the ghetto and the all-white neighborhood, and no one opposes this more consistently than Southern members of Congress.

•

The other pseudo-argument against the existing guidelines is that, although based on the Civil Rights Act of 1964, they actually violate that act. It states clearly that its provisions "shall not mean the assignment of students to public schools to overcome racial imbalance." Yet the guidelines establish on a percentage basis the extent of desegregation Southern school systems are expected to achieve in a given year; the required percentages increase annually.

Again the Southern argument sounds persuasive and means little. The guidelines are not designed to overcome "racial imbalance" and they are not aimed at producing any real racial "balance" in the schools of the South or anywhere else.

The guidelines, in fact, are aimed like an arrow at dual school systems—the old scheme of so-called "separate but equal" systems, one for Negroes and one for whites. Since most such dual systems were and are in the South, the guidelines do have their primary practical effect there.

It is because of the existence of dual school systems, moreover, that the percentage of yardstick is necessary. Most if not all Southern school districts have sought to proclaim the end of dual schools by putting a few Negroes into formerly all-white schools. This tokenism obviously does not eleminate the dual system.

•

Even the so-called "freedom of choice" plan, permitting any student to choose his school, is not sufficient if a lack of effort by school officials or discriminatory pressures in a community result in only a few Negroes choosing formerly white schools. The reality is still a dual system, and a dual system is precisely what the Supreme Court has ruled discriminatory and therefore unconstitutional. And discrimination is what Title VI of the Civil Rights Act says cannot be supported by Federal funds.

De facto segregation, deplorable as it is, is another matter, since it does not result from discrimination in pupil assignment. In fact, in one Mississippi case, the Office of Education did not enforce its own guidelines because it found that de facto segregation and not deliberate discrimination was the problem (a large railroad yard lay between the school in question and the homes of most Negro children, making access impractical.

•

On the other hand, when Cairo, Illinois, was found to be operating, in effect, a dual system, the Office of Education forced in two years a reorganization that has required a new consolidated high school to be built. Few Southern communities have been pushed that hard.

The percentage yardstick of the guidelines does create practical problems for the South, which now seeks to eliminate or soften this provision. This is not because the guidelines seek racial balance or ignore de facto segregation but because they are aimed at the dual school systems many in the South still hope to preserve.

HOUSE BACKS SHIFT ON DESEGREGATION

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

School Guidelines Plan for All States Stirs Dispute on Intent and Effect

5/24/67

By JOHN HERBERS

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 23 — The House tentatively approved today a proposal that the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare said would invite "evasion and delay" in school desegregation.

The proposal, adopted by a voice vote, was in the form of an amendment to the Administration's bill authorizing $3.5-billion for elementary and secondary education for the school year beginning July 1.

The amendment, offered by Representative Edith Green, Democrat of Oregon, would require that Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and guidelines prescribed under it, be enforced uniformly throughout the nation.

Title VI is intended to prohibit racial discrimination in any federally assisted program. The Office of Education has been applying it to schools only in the South and border states, where there is a history of a dual school system.

Representatives also approved 116 to 62, an amendment by L. H. Fountain, Democrat of North Carolina, that would prevent deferral of school funds to any district that practices segregation until after the district has been given a public hearing. This action, by standing vote, was interpreted as further erosion of enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The House then took up the Republican amendment to the bill, offered by Albert H. Quie of Minnesota, which would sub-

Continued on Page 27, Column 1

GUIDELINES SHIFT BACKED IN HOUSE

Continued From Page 1, Col. 2

titute block grants to the tates for education in place of grants for specific programs, as provided in the present law. The controversial Quie amendment was designed to remove some of the Federal controls over Federal funds for education.

A vote on the Quie amendment is expected tomorrow after protracted debate. Votes on all amendments are being taken in the committee of the whole House and are thus subject to change on final passage.

The House was in an unroar most of the afternoon over the intent of the amendment offered by Mrs. Green, a civil rights supporter who in recen months has spent considerabe time scolding the Office of Education for what she called excessive interference with local school affairs.

Shortly before the vote, the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, John W. Gardner, sent a letter to House Speaker John W. McCormack, Massachusetts Democrat, saying that the danger in Mrs. Green's amendment was its vagueness. It would, Mr. Gardner said, "invite evasion and delay."

"Indeed," he continued, "I fear that the civil rights amendments would encourage some districts to ignore the Constitution of the United States and the Congressional mandate of the Civil Rights Act of 1964."

The Civil Rights Leadership Conference, an affiliation of more than 100 organizations that support Civil Rights legislation, has also said the amendment would weaken the 1964 act.

But after three hours of debate, highlighted by contradictory statements as to the intent of the amendment, Mr. Gardner's chief civil rights enforcement officer, F. Peter Libassi, said he believed the "legislative history" made on the floor would leave the department's Southern desegragation campaign intact.

Fears Other Amendment

He referred to the fact that several Northern liberals who at first opposed the amendment later supported it in the belief that it required the department to start attacking de facto segregation in the North.

Mr. Libissi said he was much more concerned about the effect of the Fountain amendment on the department's desegregation efforts in the South.

He said the immediate effect of the Fountain amendment would be to require the department to release funds immediately to 60 school districts that the department believes to be in violation of Title VI and that have been denied funds pending hearings.

The furor stirred up by Mrs. Green's amendment could be understood only against the background of controversy that has swirled around the Office of Education since it began desegregation of Southern schools in 1965.

Although Title VI is directed against discrimination generally, the Office of Education has made no serious attempt to apply it anywhere except in 17 Southern and border states that in the recent past had laws requiring segregated schools.

The Office of Education issued guidelines that were designed to permit these school districts to come into compliance gradually. The office achieved at least token desegregation in most districts.

But Southern officials have charged that the office exceeded the law by arbitrary regulations and by requiring districts to increase their percentage of Negroes in former white schools.

In the meantime, a number of Northern schools remained segregated under neighborhood school patterns, and the Administration said that Title VI did not give it authority to move against discrimination found to exist in predominantly Negro schools that had no history of dualism.

Portland Bias Opposed

Mrs. Green, who has made a study of the situation, has expressed sympathy with Southern officials, and she came onto the floor today with the backing of Southerners and conservatives. She said the office had been applying "a different set of standards against the South and when discrimination occurs in Portland, Ore., I want that ended just as much as in Richmond, Va."

But a number of liberal Democrats opposed the amendment out of belief that if the office were required to use the same standards everywhere it would drop its Southern campaign rather than extend its efforts to all 50 states.

Mrs. Green, sitting demurely in a green dress with a pained expression on her face, was bombarded by questions from all sides on what she was trying to accomplish. Her answers were important because in interpreting a law the administrative agencies and the courts rely heavily on what its sponsors say it means.

She stuck by her contention that her amendment would not weaken enforcement in the South and that standards adopted under the law would have to apply nationally. But she would not say that the Office of Education would be required to move against defacto segregation in the North.

Some Change Minds

Carl D. Perkins, Democrat of Kentucky, who is chairman of the Education and Labor Committee and was managing the bill on the floor, accepted the amendment as innocuous.

"This amendment has nothing to do with guidelines as such," he said.

James G. O'Hara, Democrat o Michigan, said the amendment was "either meaningless or mischievous."

John Conyers Jr., Democrat of Detroit, a Negro, decided it was mischievous and spoke against it. But after listening to further debate he returned to the microphone and said he had decided to support it after all because he thought it might force the Administration to mov against segregation outside the South.

Other liberals did the same. After the debate Mr. O'Hara co cluded that "different things now seem to be clear" to different members.

Paul C. Jones, Democrat of Missouri, said, "Those who changed their minds are trying to befuddle the issue."

Mr. Libassi, who witnessed t debate, concluded that liberals had seized the advantage and possibly succeeded in changing the meaning of the amendment.

The Fountain amendment, to stop deferral of funds without a hearing, was passed by the House last year but the Senate succeeded in changing it to permit deferral for 90 days before a hearing is required.

The pending bill is still subject to Senate approval, but the amendment is considered much more likely to survive this year. The Office of Education does not allocate new funds to a Southern or border state district that it believes is violating the civil rights law.

The office withholds the funds until the district meets the requirements set down in the guidelines or until noncompliance is established in a hearing held within 90 days of the deferral date.

Under the Fountain amendment, the office would be required to disperse all new funds immediately after they become available and cutoff would come only after noncompliance was established in a hearing.

Mr. Labissi said he believed the amendment would be "very damaging" to the department's desegregation efforts.

Fulton's Compliance Needs Are Minor, Thompson Feels

SCHOOL DESEG.

Constitution Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Rep. Fletcher Thompson, R-Ga., said Monday he is convinced that federal compliance officers will approve Fulton County's proposed 1967-68 school desegregation plan if local officials agree to make "minor modifications."

Thompson made his statement after meeting with compliance chief F. Peter Libassi to discuss the apparent deadlock that has developed between Fulton school men and officials of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

"I think HEW has a desire to work out some kind of agreement," Thompson said after the conference. "I don't feel that Mr. Libassi will be so adamant that he would not accept the Fulton plan with some small modifications."

The U.S. Office of Education already has indicated it thinks the Fulton plan is inadequate. A HEW field team is scheduled to meet with officials in Fulton County on July 5 to talk over their differences.

Thompson said that Fulton school officials seemed eager to negotiate an agreement when he talked with them by telephone late Monday, but there were indications that some school board members wanted to make the district a test case.

MEETS WITH LIBASSI
Rep. Thompson

The Atlanta congressman said the school board members, whom he declined to name, wanted to challenge HEW's contention that the county's "freedom of choice" transfer plan is not valid unless it results in actual desegregation.

"I just don't think it would be a good idea to try to make it a test case," Thompson continued.

The HEW contention already has been upheld by the Fifth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Thompson also conceded he might have erred early last week when he accused HEW's Libassi of requiring more from Fulton schools than he has from other districts.

At that time, Thompson cited testimony Libassi gave before a House Appropriations subcommittee saying that HEW was only taking legal action against districts with less than 2 or 3 per cent desegregation.

Fulton County, the congressman said, now has 4.4 per cent of its 12 per cent Negro population desegregated—just slightly above Libassi's figures.

Monday, however, Thompson said Libassi told him his testimony referred to HEW's policy during 1966, and that this year the agency would require more from all school districts.

"I don't think he is guilty, as I construed him to be, of telling two different stories," Thompson said of Libassi.

303 D
S J E OW
246 I FE
ATLANTA

NYT 7/5/67

uspension Enrollment ...pted Quietly

SCHOOL DESEG

By M. A. FARBER

The suspension next fall of most of the Board of Education's Open Enrollment program, the board's key effort at integration since 1960, has brought no protest from civil rights organizations or the Negro and Puerto Rican communities.

Substantial curtailment of the program, and the passive reaction to the move, illustrate both the difficulties in achieving improved racial balance and the growing emphasis by the board and minority groups on "quality," rather than integrated, education.

The program, in which 40,000 Negro and Puerto Rican students have voluntarily transferred to schools having a majority of white pupils, has been halted, with some exceptions, for September at all city high schools and at the elementary and junior high schools in Manhattan and the Bronx.

The purpose of Open En-

Continued on Page 9, Column 1

City's Suspension of Open Enrollment Accepted Qui...

Continued From Page 1, Col. 2

rollment, as originally stated by the board, was to provide "greater opportunity" for minority group students "to join educationally with the rest of our population" by switching from schools with Negro and Puerto Rican registrations of more than 85 per cent.

However, fewer than 5 per cent of the eligible students have sought transfers under the program—a process that they and their parents have had to initiate. And, since the program began, the proportion of minority group pupils in the school system has risen from 37 to 51 per cent.

Assessments Vary

Assessments of the program's worth after seven years vary. Students who have taken part generally express approval and discount the inconvenience of long subway and bus rides, while their parents seem more divided over the relative merits of a neighborhood vs. a distant school, whatever the change in integration.

Most teachers and administrators who have participated in the program appear to favor its continuation, although many are concerned over heightened disciplinary problems and inadequate remedial and guidance services to aid Open Enrollment students.

The immediate impetus for the program was a threatened school boycott in 1960 led by the Rev. Milton A. Galamison of Siloam Presbyterian Church in Brooklyn.

Mr. Galamison, who headed citywide demonstrations in 1964 and a sit-in at board headquarters last December, attributed the "lack of outcry" over the Open Enrollment cutback to "nationalistic voices in the black community" that "have more or less prevailed."

The principal of Riverdale Junior High School, Saul Sigelschiffer, feels the Open Enrollment youngster who attends the Riverdale school for several years "is entirely different when he comes out than when he came in," the principal said.

The youths gain "substantially" in reading, he said, and their "attention in class, work habits, quality of notebooks and attitudes improve—for example the kids used to wear hats in the halls and cafeteria but they don't do that anymore."

Mr. Sigelschiffer, whose highly regarded school in an upper middle-class section of the West Bronx had an almost completely white register before Open Enrollment, said that the achievement of his white students had not declined "at all" as the proportion of Negroes at Riverdale rose to its current 15 per cent.

"When you have a small percentage of Open Enrollment pupils," he pointed out, "they will fall into the pattern of the school and the program presents no serious problem. However the character of the school would change if the proportion grew to 25 to 40 per cent or more."

The principal said that the program was "a fraud" if it encouraged the idea that minority group children could not do as well "wherever they went to school." That, he said, "would be an injustice to the Negro people. The real secret is a good school administration, a fairly stable faculty and neighborhood support."

Cessation Lamented

The planned cessation of Open Enrollment at Riverdale, which has 1,576 students in a building rated for 1,400, was lamented by Mrs. Faye Fein, a guidance teacher who has worked closely with the Negro youngsters.

"Negro children will be missing out," the young, blond teacher said, "and so will white children. This area is too white and the white children should know the city they live in."

Greater skepticism of Open Enrollment was expressed by the mother of a 15-year-old Negro girl in the program at the school, which is on West 237th Street at Independence Avenue.

The mother, who asked not to be identified, said she had sent her daughter to Riverdale—a 45-minute ride from her home on the western edge of Harlem—on the advice of the girl's elementary school teacher.

"I firmly believe that we have just as good schools in our neighborhood," she remarked, asserting that "there's no real integration anyway" as a result of Open Enrollment.

"It doesn't do any good to push the Negro and white children together during the school day," she said. "My daughter leaves her neighborhood in the morning and returns in the afternoon and so do the white

d Quietly, Illustrating Shift in Goals of Rights Leaders

ye Fein, who has he Negro be miss- g, blond vill white oo white n should ve in."

of Open ssed by -year-old gram at on West pendence sked not she had Riverdale rom her edge of e of the l teacher. that we hools in she re- "there's way" as ment.

good to hite chil- he school daughter d in the the aft- he white kids. Only the neighborhoods aren't the same."

Far more enthusiastic about Open Enrollment was an East Bronx parent, Mrs. Lillian Henderson. "I love the idea of my son going out of the neighborhood and mixing with other children of all standards of life," she said.

"Going to Riverdale has changed his way of acting, thinking and speaking — it's changed him a lot for the better," she concluded.

Whatever the effects of Open Enrollment they will now be felt by considerably fewer than in the past.

When the school administration disclosed partial suspension of the program for next fall on May 22, it said there was "no space available to justify thousands" of students applying for new transfers to predominantly white city high schools and to similar elementary and junior high schools in Manhattan and the Bronx.

But it announced that students already in the Open Enrollment program could stay at the "receiving" schools they were attending and that, as long as they remained, their younger brothers and sisters could join them in the elementary and junior high schools.

The administration said, too, that where "a few seats" were vacant, individual variances "to improve integration" would be arranged.

Despite the stress on overcrowding, however, interviews with school officials reveal that curtailment of Open Enrollment was also related to two other factors: the increasing preponderance of Negroes and Puerto Ricans in the school system and the distance and traffic conditions between schools with large concentrations of white or minority group children.

In the last school year, 2,500 students destined to start predominantly Negro and Puerto Rican high schools—themselves overcrowded — transferred under Open Enrollment to 19 schools with large white enrollments in Brooklyn and Queens.

But of the 19 receiving high schools, 11 are operating at more than 130 per cent of capacity and the over-utilization is expected to jump next fall, even without Open Enrollment.

And in the least crowded of the 19 schools—such as John Jay H. S. (103 per cent utilization, 54 per cent white)—the proportion of minority group students cannot be increased very much without destroying the aim of Open Enrollment, according to school officials.

"It's a question of exercising judgment," said Frederick H. Williams, a Negro who is assistant superintendent in charge of the office of integration. "In the last few years the number of seats for Open Enrollment has been shrinking and, as the white population moves toward the fringes of the city, the distance between 'sending' and 'receiving' schools widens."

6,760 Switched Schools

At the elementary and junior high school levels in the last year, 6,760 students switched schools under Open Enrollment and the board provided buses for the elementary grade children.

Open enrollment in the elementary schools was evaluated last year by a research team led by Dr. David J. Fox, an associate professor at the City College School of Education. And a study of the junior highs was headed by Dr. Robert L. Thorndike, professor of psychology and education at Columbia University's Teachers College.

Both reports for the school board, financed by Federal funds, were made under contract to the Center for Urban Education here. And together they comprise the only completed formal analyses of the program.

6,000 Children Studied

Dr. Fox's 61-page study, which surveyed 6,000 white and minority group children in 38 schools, found that 90 per cent of the Negroes and Puerto Ricans in the program favored Open Enrollment as did two-thirds of the schools, teachers and administrators. But half of the teachers felt that the general achievement level at their schools had fallen since the introduction of the program and a majority of staff cited increased disciplinary problems.

The Fox study found, by matching 212 Open Enrollment students with 212 youngsters at the same previous reading level who remained in ghetto schools, that the transfer had yielded "no benefit in terms of reading achievement" over an eight-month period in 1966.

Schools Can Be Desegregated

CCR Clearinghouse Publication No. 8
June 1967

U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

John A. Hannah, Chairman
Eugene Patterson, Vice Chairman
Frankie M. Freeman
Erwin N. Griswold
Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, C.S.C.
Robert S. Rankin
William L. Taylor, Staff Director

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights is a temporary, independent, bipartisan agency established by Congress in 1957 and directed to:

- Investigate complaints alleging that citizens are being deprived of their right to vote by reason of their race, color, religion, or national origin, or by reason of fraudulent practices;
- Study and collect information concerning legal developments constituting a denial of equal protection of the laws under the Constitution;
- Appraise Federal laws and policies with respect to equal protection of the laws;
- Serve as a national clearinghouse for information in respect to denials of equal protection of the laws; and
- Submit reports, findings, and recommendations to the President and the Congress.

SCHOOLS CAN BE DESEGREGATED

For the first time in the history of American education, school desegregation is a matter of urgent concern in communities throughout the Nation. While some communities are still enmeshed in controversy over the issue, other communities are developing plans in an effort to desegregate their schools and improve the quality of education for all children.

This pamphlet identifies some of the elements of successful desegregation and explains some of the techniques communities have used or are planning to use to desegregate their schools.

The information in this pamphlet is based on a major study of Racial Isolation in the Public Schools which the Commission did at the request of President Johnson. The report was issued in February 1967.

In its study, the Commission found that remedies are available which will desegregate schools and provide a better education for all American children.

The major findings of fact which emerged from the study are:

- Racial isolation in the public schools is intense and is growing worse.
- Negro children suffer serious harm when they are educated in racially segregated schools, whatever the origin of that segregation. They do not achieve as well as other children; their aspirations are more restricted than those of other children; and they do not have as much confidence that they can influence their own futures.
- White children educated in all-white schools also are harmed and frequently are ill-prepared to live in a world of people from diverse social, economic, and cultural backgrounds.
- Compensatory efforts to improve education for children within racially and socially isolated schools have not been markedly successful.
- School desegregation remedies have been devised which will improve the quality of education for all children.

There is a definite need for remedial programs and other forms of academic assistance to improve the quality of American education for all students, the Commission found. The Commission's study suggests that remedial programs are most likely to be successful in schools which are not segregated by race and social class.

PLANNING SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

The techniques for desegregating schools vary, since they are contingent upon such factors as size of the city, the number of schools, the size of the Negro community, and the residential patterns of the city. Some cities have successfully desegregated their schools and others have developed promising plans for school desegregation. In those cities where there has been progress in school desegregation, the following elements generally have been present:

LEADERSHIP: School officials, at both the State and local levels, have been committed to the goal of desegregation. Their initiative in developing and implementing a feasible plan, and gaining community support for it has been essential to success.

COMMUNITY PARTICIPATION: The plan has affected the total community. Where many schools and children have been included in the desegregation plan, parents have felt that they shared equally the responsibility for school desegregation. The involvement of community groups has made desegregation a rewarding experience for white and Negro families.

QUALITY EDUCATION: A variety of efforts has been made to improve the quality of education for all children. In these instances school programs have provided for the needs of individual children, including those who require remedial assistance or special enrichment. Consolidated school facilities often have provided greater opportunity for sharing specialized staff and expensive equipment than has been possible in smaller schools.

MINIMIZING INTERRACIAL FRICTION: School administrators and teachers have created conditions under which Negro and white students can learn to understand and accept each other. Teachers, parents, and children have been prepared for the new experience so that racial tensions have not arisen or have been effectively resolved. Additional helpful steps have included the introduction of multiracial teaching materials into the curriculum and the assignment of Negro teachers to faculties of previously all-white schools.

CLASSROOM DESEGREGATION: Successful desegregation of schools has included desegregation of classrooms. Classes have been organized so that students can progress at their own speed at the same time as they work with and learn from children of different backgrounds.

ENLARGED ATTENDANCE AREAS: Attendance areas have been made large enough so that schools serve a balanced racial and social class population and can remain balanced even if residential patterns should change.

DESEGREGATION TECHNIQUES

The most frequently used plans for desegregating schools include: school pairing, central schools, school closing, magnet schools and supplementary centers, education complexes, and education parks. Each plan may have drawbacks as well as advantages, depending upon the particular situation. An essential element common to each plan, however, is the enlargement of attendance zones.

PAIRING — School desegregation by pairing is achieved when the attendance areas of two or more nearby schools are merged so that each school serves different grade levels for a new, larger attendance area. For example, the attendance zones of a predominantly white and a predominantly Negro school, each serving grades 1-6, would be merged so that all children in grades 1-3 in the new attendance area would attend one school, and all children in grades 4-6 in the new attendance area would attend the other school. In small cities, pairing might create one attendance zone for the entire city. In some cities, pairing might entail a reorganization of the grade structure of several schools. Thus, a system with four elementary schools (grades 1-6) and two junior high schools (grades 7-8) might convert three schools to accommodate grades 1-4 and the remaining three schools to intermediate schools, grades 5 - 8. Most appropriate for desegregating schools in small cities, pairing has been used successfully in such communities as Princeton, N.J., Greenburgh, N.Y., and Coatesville, Pa.

BEFORE PAIRING, STUDENTS ENROLL ACCORDING TO EACH SCHOOL'S ATTENDANCE AREA. AFTER PAIRING, STUDENTS OF BOTH ATTENDANCE AREAS ENROLL IN THE TWO SCHOOLS ACCORDING TO GRADE.

CENTRAL SCHOOLS–Some cities have desegregated schools by converting one or more schools into central facilities for a single grade to serve the entire city or a large part of the city. When a central school is created, attendance areas for the remaining schools can be enlarged. For example, a predominantly Negro elementary school could be converted into a school for all 6th grade children in the city. The remaining elementary schools, instead of serving six grades, would then serve only five grades, but would cover larger geographical areas. The central school plan is most effective in cities — or areas within cities — in which, because of residential patterns, existing small neighborhood schools can be used to achieve school desegregation. Cities which have used this type of plan include Englewood, N.J., Berkeley, Calif., and Teaneck, N.J.

CENTRAL SCHOOLS

SCHOOL CLOSING—The closing of a segregated or racially imbalanced school and assigning its students to other schools in the system is a technique similar to the establishment of central schools. Closed schools often have been utilized for other purposes such as a nursery school or a laboratory school. This was effectively done in Xenia, Ohio, where a formerly all-Negro school has been converted into a demonstration school which utilizes new educational techniques and is attended by a cross-section of students in the community. The superintendent of schools in Xenia said the plan would not fail because this previously all-Negro school "is the city's prestige school."

In addition to Xenia, the school closing technique has been used by Syracuse and White Plains, N.Y. and Evanston, Ill.

SCHOOL CLOSING

THE PREDOMINANTLY NEGRO JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOL IS CLOSED AND THE STUDENTS ARE BUSED TO OTHER SCHOOLS.

MAGNET SCHOOLS AND SUPPLEMENTARY CENTERS—Schools offering special curricula can attract children from a wide geographical area. This desegregation technique ranges from full-time schools with special academic programs to centers with programs which supplement the basic academic skills taught in the neighborhood school. For instance, a supplementary center might offer a special science or humanities program. Children from several schools would attend the center together for 8 to 10 hours a week. The magnet school and supplementary center technique frequently has been advanced as a means of achieving partial school desegregation in large cities with large Negro enrollments. Plans for such schools have been developed in Mt. Vernon, N.Y., Cleveland, Ohio, Philadelphia, Pa., and Los Angeles, Calif.

MAGNET SCHOOLS

PREDOMINANTLY NEGRO SCHOOLS

PREDOMINANTLY WHITE SCHOOLS

EDUCATION COMPLEXES—This technique broadens attendance areas by grouping existing schools and consolidating their attendance zones. For example, six elementary schools in one area of a city could be grouped and their students reassigned among the six schools. This would permit economies in operation and improvements in the academic program, such as the establishment of a library center to serve the entire complex or the provision of specialists on the faculty who would be available to larger numbers of students. Each school in the complex might develop a specialty in one curriculum area. All resources and facilities for that curriculum area would then be concentrated in one building which would serve all children in the complex. This type of plan, similar to school pairing in smaller communities, is most applicable to cities or to areas within cities with adjoining ethnic neighborhoods. Proposals for education complexes have been developed for New York City and Rochester, N. Y.

EDUCATION COMPLEXES

EDUCATION PARK—This proposed plan would create clusters of new school facilities large enough to serve thousands of children

NEW YORK EDUCATION PARK PLAN

PLAN FOR NEW YORK'S NEW EDUCATION PARK PROVIDES FOR PRIMARY SCHOOLS FOR 2,800 PUPILS, INTERMEDIATE SCHOOLS FOR 3,600, AND A COMPREHENSIVE HIGH SCHOOL FOR 4,000. STUDENTS WILL BE GROUPED IN UNITS OF 700 EACH IN THE PRIMARY SCHOOLS, 900 IN THE INTERMEDIATE SCHOOLS, AND 1,000 IN THE HIGH SCHOOL. THE CENTRAL UNIT WILL OFFER COMMON FACILITIES FOR ALL SCHOOLS IN THE COMPLEX.*

* DIAGRAM ADAPTED FROM SATURDAY REVIEW, NOVEMBER, 1966 AT 93.

EXPERIMENTAL

on a single site. The combined resources of an education park would afford greater opportunity for effective administration and meaningful community participation in school activities. An education park may provide innovations and facilities (such as laboratories and computer-assisted teaching) which are too costly for individual small schools. The facilities would be designed so that children could be grouped according to their differing needs and talents. A larger teaching staff would enable the education park to provide more specialists and teachers with diverse training and interests to meet the individual needs of children. Bringing together teachers with similar training might allow them more opportunity to develop specialized subject matter skills. The education park also could provide a laboratory where student teachers could observe a greater variety of teaching skills than is possible in smaller schools.

The education park technique can be adapted to almost any city. Proposals for education parks for small cities call for one facility to serve the entire city; proposals for larger cities suggest several parks, each serving a segment of the city or particular grade levels. Some educators believe that education parks are the most feasible means for desegregating school districts in metropolitan areas since they could be located to attract students from the city and adjacent suburban areas. Cities planning or considering education parks include Syracuse, N.Y., East Orange, N.J., Berkeley and Sausalito, Calif., New York, N.Y., Pittsburgh, Pa., St. Paul, Minn., Philadelphia, Pa., and Albuquerque, N.M.

EDUCATIONAL QUALITY

Parents often wonder how desegregation will affect the quality of education in their schools. Administrators of school systems which have desegregated report that the quality of education has been maintained and often improved for all students.

Practical experience in some communities demonstrates that desegregation has been accompanied by the maintenance of educational standards. In White Plains, N.Y., where some white parents feared that desegregation would cause their children to fall behind in their studies, Carroll Johnson, the superintendent, reported that there was no interruption in the academic progress of white students. Other school districts — Syracuse, N.Y. and Riverside, Calif. — which have desegregated also report continued progress in academic achievement.

What can communities do to assure that educational quality is maintained and improved when schools are desegregated? Neil Sullivan, Superintendent of Schools at Berkeley, has written: "Desegregation must be combined with a general program of educational improvement . . . [large] segments of our communities, unconvinced of the educational necessity for integration, must be shown that the new program is in the best interests of all children." Berkeley, Calif. desegregated three junior high schools and reduced the pupil-teacher ratio in each of them. Teaneck and Englewood, N.J. instituted tutoring programs, and Greenburgh and White Plains, N.Y. instituted extensive programs of compensatory education for white and Negro students.

Similar questions have been raised about the maintenance of educational standards in larger cities, where proposals for the education parks are in the planning stages. Will such large schools, with thousands of pupils in attendance, contribute to a lowering of academic standards?

Educators who are planning such schools, and those who have evaluated these plans, have concluded that larger, desegregated school facilities are likely to have just the opposite effect. Far from lowering educational standards, education parks would provide substantial improvements in the quality of education. These educators believe that the education parks would provide better quality facilities and school programs, and would permit teachers to give greater attention to the needs of individual children. Dr. John H. Fischer, President of Teachers College, Columbia University, has written: "The pupil population [in school parks] would be large enough to justify full-time staffs of specialists and the necessary physical facilities to furnish medical, psychological, and counseling services at a level of quality that is now rarely possible."

The experience of the Nova School in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. — the only education park presently in operation — supports these views. This school has consolidated attendance zones, and concentrated educational resources; it provides academic programs and facilities of a substantially higher quality than were previously offered, and school administrators there have reported that it has substantially improved students' learning.

Thus, the experience and judgment of educators suggest that American education will achieve new distinction when larger, desegregated schools make possible the specialization, flexibility, and utilization of resources which are now difficult to achieve in smaller schools.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

DESEGREGATION TECHNIQUES

The publications listed describe various techniques in use by city school systems or planned by them for future use to achieve desegregation.

DESEGREGATING CITY SCHOOLS. John H. Fischer. The PTA Magazine. Dec. 1964. 4 pp. Reprint available from Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, 315 Lexington Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10016. 10¢. Fischer discusses procedures which city school systems might follow to achieve school desegregation.

DESEGREGATION OF THE ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS: Special Report to the Board of Education. City School District, 13 Fitzhugh Street South, Rochester, N.Y. 14614. Feb. 1, 1967. 75 pp. This report presents four plans to achieve elementary school desegregation. One plan deals with construction of several education parks or city-owned parkgrounds. The other three plans deal with reorganization of existing school facilities.

EDUCATION PARK. James E. Mauch. The American School Board Journal. March 1965. 2 pp. The purposes and potential advantages of an education park which would serve thousands of children on one campus are discussed.

NEW CONCEPT IN SCHOOL ORGANIZATION: THE CHILDREN'S ACADEMY. Board of Education, Mt. Vernon, N.Y. 10550. 23 pp. This brochure describes Mt. Vernon's plan for a supplementary center which will provide a special education program to augment the regular curriculum. Elementary children will attend the center on a desegregated basis for a part of each day.

RACIAL ISOLATION IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS. U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. Washington, D. C. 20425, 1967. Chapter IV. 70 pp. Discusses various remedies for racial isolation adopted by school systems across the Nation.

THE CAMPUS SCHOOL. Syracuse Campus Site Planning Center, 515 Larned Building, 114 South Warren Street, Syracuse, N.Y. 13202. 10 pp. Describes a plan for four education parks to serve all public school students in Syracuse.

THE COMPUTER HELPS DESEGREGATE SCHOOLS. Ernest H. Wakefield. School District 65, 1314 Ridge Avenue, Evanston, Ill. 6 pp. The use of a computer in redistricting the Evanston schools to eliminate racial imbalance is described.

THE EAST ORANGE EDUCATION PLAZA. East Orange Board of Education, 21 Winans Street, East Orange, N.J. 12 pp. Describes a plan for an education park to serve children from kindergarten through junior college.

THE EDUCATIONAL COMPLEX STUDY PROJECT. Robert A. Dentler, et. al. Integrated Education. June-July 1965. 9 pp. The article discusses a plan for grouping several existing schools to achieve both school desegregation and improved quality education.

THE QUEST FOR RACIAL EQUALITY IN THE PITTSBURGH PUBLIC SCHOOLS. Board of Education, Pittsburgh, Pa., 15213, Sept. 1965. 52 pp. Includes a discussion of steps already taken by the Pittsburgh schools toward eliminating racial isolation and a discussion of the planned education park system.

THE WHITE PLAINS RACIAL BALANCE PLAN. White Plains Public Schools, 5 Homeside Lane, White Plains, N.Y. 10605 May 9, 1965. The desegregation plan of this New York community is described.

COMMUNITY ASPECTS OF SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

The publications listed describe ways in which community groups can gain support for school desegregation.

A PORTRAIT OF EXODUS. Dan Woods. Harvard Graduate School of Education. Exodus Research Staff. Cambridge, Mass. 02138. 10 pp. Describes the successful efforts of a group of parents from Boston's predominantly Negro Roxbury section to bus their children to predominantly white schools in the city.

DAY-TO-DAY PROBLEMS OF SCHOOL INTEGRATION. Aaron Lipton. Integrated Education, Vol. 3, No. 3. June-July 1965. 12 pp. The principal of a Hartsdale, N.Y. school discusses community support for desegregation and the role of civil rights groups in it.

HOW BERKELEY CAME TO GRIPS WITH DE FACTO SEGREGATION. Daniel K. Freudenthal. Phi Delta Kappa, Vol. 46, No. 4. Dec. 1964. 4 pp. An administrative assistant in the Berkeley schools describes community and school board movement toward recognition of de facto problems.

PHILADELPHIA WORKS FOR INTEGRATION. Sylvia Meek. Integrated Education, Vol. 2, No. 2 April-May, 1964. 5 pp. Recounts the role of the Coordinating Council on School Integration in coordinating the efforts of civil rights and community groups to move the Board of Education toward desegregation.

THE SCHOOLS AND THE CIVIL RIGHTS REVOLUTION. Dan W. Dodson. Second National NEA-PR&R Conference on Civil and Human Rights in Education, May 10-11, 1965. Washington, D.C. National Education Association, Commission on Professional Rights and Responsibilities, 1201 16th Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20220, 1965. 2 pp. Dodson identifies 10 crucial issues in the conflict between school boards and civil rights interests.

TOWARD EQUAL OPPORTUNITY. Civil Rights Committee of the American Federation of Teachers Executive Council, 716 North Rush Street, Chicago, Ill. 60611. 24 pp. Essential steps are outlined to move the community to desegregate its schools.

DESEGREGATION AND QUALITY EDUCATION

The publications listed discuss desegregation as a way to improve the quality of education for all children.

CLASSROOM GROUPING AND INTEGRATION. Aaron Lipton. Integrated Education. Feb.-March, 1964. 6 pp. A Hartsdale, N.Y. principal explains grouping procedures in his school system. Classroom groups reflect complete representation of the racial, ethnic, and socio-economic groups in the community.

EQUALITY THROUGH INTEGRATION. A REPORT ON GREENBURGH SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 8. Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, 315 Lexington Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10016. 1965. 70 pp. $1.50. The story of successful desegregation in Greenburgh School District No. 8, Hartsdale, N.Y. The report discusses changes in the educational program as well as the desegregation plan itself.

INTEGRATION: THE KEY TO QUALITY EDUCATION FOR ALL. Frank Riessman. School Integration. Proceedings of a Symposium on School Integration at Michigan State University. Bureau of Educational Research, Michigan State University, 252 Erickson Hall, East Lansing, Mich. 48824. 26 pp. This discussion centers on the role of education in the quest for human rights in light of the resistance found in both the community and the schools.

NORTH CAROLINA ADVANCEMENT SCHOOL. North Carolina Advancement School, Winston-Salem, N.C. 27101. 8 pp. Describes an integrated demonstration school established to serve underachieving junior high school students from all parts of the State.

SCHOOL OUTLOOK. School District 65, 1314 Ridge Avenue, Evanston, Ill. Aug. 1966. 4 pp. The Evanston Laboratory School is described and some of the educational innovations to be included in the program are outlined.

PERIODICALS

The two periodicals listed provide a continuing source of information about the status of school desegregation in the United States as well as articles on the various educational problems associated with school desegregation.

INTEGRATED EDUCATION. Integrated Education Association. 343 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill. 60604. $4 per year (bi-monthly).

JOURNAL OF NEGRO EDUCATION. Bureau of Educational Research, Howard University, Washington, D.C. 20201. $5 per year (quarterly).

LEGAL ASPECTS OF DESEGREGATION

Upon request, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Washington, D. C. 20425, will furnish information about the legal aspects of school desegregation as well as about existing State laws and regulations related to school desegregation.

---

For additional information about school desegregation techniques write:

Office of Staff Director
U.S. Commission on Civil Rights
Washington, D.C. 20425

Office for Civil Rights
U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare
Washington, D. C. 20201

☆ U.S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE : 1967 O—268-410

U. S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS
WASHINGTON, D. C. 20425
OFFICIAL BUSINESS

POSTAGE AND FEES PAID BY
U. S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

PAUL ANTHONY, EXECUTIVE DIR.
SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL
5 FORSYTH STREET
ATLANTA, GEORGIA

11

WRB

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

"OPERATION REVIEW"

Post Office Box 694
Atlanta, Georgia 30301

September 10, 1967

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL
5 Forsyth Street, NW
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Dear Sir:

It's kind National leaders like you that respond to special educational request letters, even in these busy days. This request has to do with a proposed "Legislative Action Project," for the U.S. Southern displaced, demoted, and disadvantaged teachers.

Would you be kind enough to read the enclosed project and send us your expert evaluative comments ? We are also sending this idea to a few selected U.S. Congressmen and Civic leaders.

Thank you so very much for any assistance, and we shall hope to hear from you as soon as possible.

Sincerely,
Malsenia Armstrong
(Miss) Malsenia Armstrong
and
The Southern Displaced Teachers

Enclosures

"Things don't happen. They are made to happen. And in the field of education, they are made to happen by you and your members."

– John Fitzgerald Kennedy

NEW PROJECT TITLE: "OPERATION REVIEW"

?

SUBMITTED TO: _____
(Funding Source)

SUBMITTED BY: The U.S. Southern Displaced, Demoted, & Disadvantaged Teachers From the Seventeen Southern States Covered by the "1965 NEA Task Force Committee" ..... ..... And those of 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969, etc.

SIGNATURE OF AUTHORIZED REPRESENTATIVE: Malzenia Armstrong

Address: P.O. Box 694, Atlanta, Georgia 30301

Home Telephone: 523-3381 - Area Code 404
University Plaza Apartments

AMOUNT OF FUNDS REQUESTED: $ 980.00 (A small amount for such a big task !)

MAJOR PROJECT OBJECTIVES: We hope to specifically encourage and assist our United States Congressmen in the following areas and or activities:

-To make a critical REVIEW of currently operating Federal Educational Improvement Programs, and the various Equal Educational Opportunity Programs with the specific aim of observing the unintended omission of "LAWFUL Program Support" for the U.S. Southern displaced and demoted educationally disadvantaged teachers.

For Example:

(1) We have "Head Start" for the U.S. PreSchool Youth-

(2) Public Law 89-10 for the Elementary & Secondary level disadvantaged youth-

(3) UPWARD BOUND for the College bound disadvantaged youth-

What about the different educationally disadvantaged professional youth over thirty ??????????

MAJOR PROJECT OBJECTIVES: (Continuing from page 1)

- To REVIEW the present direction of the "1967-68 School Desegregation Guidelines," with the specific aim of evaluating the following sections:

  181.15 Unequal Educational Program & Facilities
  (see enclosed Guide Sheet)

  181.13 Faculty and Staff
  a. Desegregation of Staff
  b. Dismissals

- To STRUCTURE and PROPOSE the appropriate (specific) Legislation, which would serve as a "positive step" in the direction of "closing the present deep seated educational gap" between the Southern displaced, demoted, and disadvantaged teachers and other Foreign and American educators. This program should also enable the Southern displaced teachers to "compete and perform" on an EQUAL LEVEL.
  For Example: A large percentage of our Southern displaced teachers lack the two invariable necessities of a good scholar.....(1) Quality Early Childhood Education, and (2) Equal Means of Educational Livelihood... permitting the proper motivation and time for scholarly study, etc.

ELIGIBILITY AND JUSTIFICATION FOR PROJECT:

Our Suggested "Legislative Action Project" will do for the U.S. Southern displaced, demoted, and disadvantaged school teachers what the FEDERAL GOVERNMENT has been doing for the displaced, unemployed, and poorly skilled workers of the Defense Department, the displaced & disadvantaged Cuban Refugee teachers and other professional groups, the Indians, and many other NEEDED groups for several years. Thus, we are not asking for SPECIAL or TOP treatment, only EQUAL TREATMENT.

SCHEDULE:

Since all of the work on this project will be done on a "voluntary" basis, the proposed tentative time schedule shall consist of the present U.S. Congressional Session.

EXPECTED OUTCOMES (EVALUATION): A number of expected gains are hoped for. They include the following:

1st- The "Appropriate U.S. Congressional Law," (originating from the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Education or the U.S. House Education and Labor Committee), with all or some of the following provisions:

- Specific Equal Educational Opportunity Grants, for the U.S. teachers - (inorder to improve their qualifications and assist them in meeting requirements to practice their profession anywhere in the United States, etc.)
- Financial Assistance in relocating Southern displaced school teachers from the South to jobs elsewhere in the United States.
- A National Defense Teacher (Southern) Loan Program

2nd- The Appointment of a "Special Southern Advisory Committee on Educational Affairs," (Created under the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare - Regional Office in Atlanta, Ga.). This Advisory Committee should consist of such outstanding and knowledgeable Southern Leaders as: (1) Dr. Benjamin E. Mays (2) Dr. Robert L. Cousins; (3) Dr. Horace Mann Bond, and (3) Mr. Ralph McGill. (there are many more, etc.)

TENTATIVE BUDGET: $ 980.00

a. Communications-including cost of mailing letters to each U.S. Congressman, paper, etc. which are directly necessary for the implementation of this project.
b. Travel - (to Washington, D.C., etc.)

A FEW IMPORTANT RESOURCES AND HELP:

a. 5th District Congressman Fletcher Thompson's Washington, D.C. "Hot Line" - (Also, Mr. Charles Clark & the Office Staff in Atlanta)
b. The Enclosed "Guide Sheets"
c. The Courage, Philosophy, and "Educational Attitude" of the Late President John F. Kennedy.
d. The Respectful, kind, & helpful attitude of Dr. Benjamin E. Mays President Emeritus - Morehouse College
e. The Danforth Chapel, Morehouse College Campus

HOW?

OE PROGRAM FACT SHEET

Legislation: P.L. 87-510, Migration and Refugee Assistance Act of 1962

Program: Cuban Teacher Training

Purpose: To assist Cuban refugee teachers, physicians, and other professional personnel in improving their qualifications and in meeting requirements to practice their profession in the United States.

| | | Allocations |
|---|---|---|
| FY 1965 | Funds transferred | $467,788 |
| 1966 | from Welfare | 220,142 |
| 1967 | Admin., HEW | |
| 1968 | | |
| 1969 | | |

Organizational Assignment: Division of Educational Personnel Training, Bureau of Elementary and Secondary Education

Program Officer: Dr. James Spillane, ext. 21926

Authority to Approve: Associate Commissioner for Elementary and Secondary Education

Basis for Award: Determination on a project basis

Federal Contribution: 100 %

Awards Made To: Institutions of higher education

Application Process: Institution of higher education submits proposal to Division which reviews and makes recommendation to Associate Commissioner.

Committee Involvement: None

SOURCE: "Fact Book: Office of Education Programs" - 1967
- Page 64 -

COMMENT: Please help us "structure" a Congressional Bill with the "scope" of this one.....

THE SOUTHERN DISPLACED
U.S. TEACHERS

WHY?

Operation For Fired Negro Teachers Starts

Opening ceremonies for the current school year's Operation Reclaim program for 43 displaced Negro teachers from the South were held on Thursday (September 29) in the library of the Board of Education, 110 Livingston Street, Brooklyn, Room 210, from 10 a. m. to noon. The ceremonies will be followed by a reception to be given by the Committee for United Negro Relief.

Operation Reclaim was initiated last year by Executive Deputy Superintendent Dr. John B. King to utilize in the New York City schools the talents of Southern teachers displaced as a result of desegregation of their schools. It is financed by a Federal grant, and is conducted by the New York City Board of Education with the cooperation of four local colleges — Long Island University, Yeshiva University, Fordham University and Bank Street College. They help prepare the Southern teachers for the New York City teachers' license examinations. Specialists from the New York City school staff cooperate in the venture.

The displaced teachers enrolled in the institute this fall are from Alabama Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia and Texas. South Carolina leads the states by having 17 participants.

Carl Erdberg Director of Operation Reclaim, said each participant is being assigned to observe a New York school.

At Thursday's ceremonies, teachers participating in the program will meet key figures in the City school system as well as community leaders. Invited guests will include:

Hon. Lloyd K. Garrison, President, Board of Education; Hon Alfred A. Giardino, Vice President, Board of Education; Dr. Clarence Senior, Member, Board of Education; Mrs. Rose Shapiro, Member, Board of Education; Dr. Bernard E. Donovan, Superintendent of Schools; Dr. John B. King, Executive Deputy Superintendent of Schools and originator of the Operation Reclaim Program; Prof. Mary Delcuve, Long Island University; Dr. Adelaide Jablonsky, Yeshiva University; Dr. Madelon Stent, City University; Albert Shanker, President, United Federation of Teachers; Assistant Superintendent Daniel Schreiber, Assistant Superintendens Frederick H. Williams; William Wessels, Director, Urban League of Greater New York Skills Bank and

NOTE: The funding source for "Operation Reclaim" was the Disadvantaged Youth Section of N.D.E.A., Title II.

COMMENT: Do you think we should "take" funds from our Youth, (Disadvantaged) inorder to fund programs for our U.S. Displaced and disadvantaged teachers ?

? ? ? ? ?

Source: "The Atlanta Daily World"

GUIDE SHEET # 1

WHY?

REVISED STATEMENT OF POLICIES FOR SCHOOL DESEGREGATION PLANS UNDER TITLE VI OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964

December 1966

As Amended for the School Year 1967–68

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
Office of Education

§ 181.15 Unequal Educational Programs and Facilities

In addition to the changes made in student assignment practices under its desegregation plan, each school system is responsible for removing all other forms of discrimination on the ground of race, color, or national origin. For example, some school systems still maintain small, inadequate schools that were originally established for students of a particular race and are still used primarily or exclusively for the education of students of such race. If the facilities, teaching materials, or educational program available to students in such a school are inferior to those generally available in the schools of the system, the school authorities will normally be required immediately to assign such students to other schools in order to discontinue the use of the inferior school. ***

 What about the TEACHERS ? Title I of The 1965 Elementary and Secondary Education Act will help the CHILDREN of these schools. MANY of the TEACHERS have been CONDITIONED by their INFERIOR school environment, etc.... Our present Federal NDEA and Higher Education Programs ARE NOT designed to meet their (teachers from inferior segregated schools) general and specific needs.

§ 181.13 Faculty and Staff

(a) Desegregation of Staff. The racial composition of the professional staff of a school system, and of the schools in the system, must be considered in determining whether students are subjected to discrimination in educational programs. Each school system is responsible for correcting the effects of all past discriminatory practices in the assignment of teachers and other professional staff.

(c) Dismissals. Teachers and other professional staff may not be dismissed, demoted, or passed over for retention, promotion, or rehiring, on the ground of race, color, or national origin. In any instance where one or more teachers or other professional staff members are to be displaced as a result of desegregation, no staff vacancy in the school system may be filled through recruitment from outside the system unless the school officials can show that no such displaced staff member is qualified to fill the vacancy. If as a result of desegregation, there is to be a reduction in the total professional staff of the school system, the qualifications of all staff members in the system must be evaluated in selecting the staff members to be released.

* Please check page 10 of our proposal, etc.

When? When?

? ? ? ? ? ? ?

Refresher Training And Employment Aid For Teachers Displaced By Integration

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, warning that the number of unemployed teachers may increase substantially as integration progresses, urged State Employment Agencies to make a maximum effort to provide employment assistance and refresher training opportunities for these teachers.

The Secretary said that those teachers displaced from their jobs because of school integration who wish to remain in the teaching profession may need to relocate to other areas which may have different standards for teacher certification. In many cases these teachers will not need employment assistance in finding new jobs, but may also require refresher training courses to enable them to qualify for teaching jobs in new area.

Mr. Wirtz said such refresher training can and should be provided under the Manpower Development and Training Act. He also advised public employment offices to investigate training opportunities available under other legislation. Specificially, he called attention to the High Education Act and the National Defense Education Act, both of which have programs available which are appropriate for the training of professional workers.

He pointed out that training under MDTA may not be established to obtain an academic degree, and that persons without the necessary degree requirements are not eligible for such training under MDTA. However, courses can be designed to offer refresher training to provide additional qualifications needed for certification.

State agencies wll consult wth State vocatonal education officials, boards of education, and college officials to determine training needs and select appropriate training courses. The States are also requested to explore employment opportunities in related fields which can be entered without additional training by those teachers who do not wish to continue teaching.

When?

When? "1980?"

WHY?

MAP OF DISPLACED AND DEMOTED U.S. TEACHERS IN 1965 - WHAT ABOUT 1967 ? ?

SOURCE: Report of The NEA Task Force Committee - December 1965... Sponsored by the U.S. Office of Education, etc.

SCHOOL DESEG.

The Atlanta Journal

"Covers Dixie Like the Dew"

Since 1883

Jack Tarver, President • Jack Spalding, Editor

This Is the End of 'All Deliberate Speed'

THE SCHOOL desegregation ruling on Wednesday by the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals probably is the most important event in this continuing story since the U.S. Supreme Court outlawed school segregation in 1954 and followed a year later with some specifics of how the transition must be accomplished.

The decision will be appealed to the Supreme Court. Few can doubt that it will be upheld.

It will deeply affect the six states, including Georgia, to which it directly applies, and will do so immediately, calling for top-to-bottom true elimination of segregation by next fall.

One import of the ruling is to more than back up the legality of the U.S. Office of Education's application of the desegregation guidelines. The court has swept aside political contentions that the office is going beyond the law and beyond what the federal courts themselves require.

In fact, the decision strongly supports those who have argued that the guidelines themselves have not been sufficiently demanding and that they have not been enforced with enough insistence.

* * *

THE GUIDELINES WERE, after all, fashioned in large part according to the Office of Education's study of past court decisions on school desegregation, many of them made by the Fifth Circuit Court.

That in itself built in a lag, because since 1954 the courts have generally made school desegregation a progressive process rather than an instant process. Thus an executive decision in the Office of Education based upon last year's court rulings is bound to be outdated; under the progressive approach, this year's court rulings logically would require more, and next year's more than that.

The Supreme Court's most quoted words during these years, "all deliberate speed," set the stage for this stage-by-stage progression.

WHAT THE FIFTH Circuit Court now affirms is that the time for "all deliberate speed" has passed and the time for mandatory completion of the task is at hand.

This means more than token desegregation, which was the first phase; and more than substantial desegregation, which was the next phase. It means we are through with phases, and there can be no more "Negro schools" and "white schools."

One of the most obvious ramifications for a city such as Atlanta is that white and Negro faculty members must be distributed throughout the city. There no longer can be merely assignment of a few Negro teachers to "white schools."

* * *

IN ANOTHER ASPECT, the decision upholds the Office of Education's contention that the "freedom of choice" of any local system is insufficient if it does not lead to the breakdown of the walls of school segregation built in the past. Even a quick glance reveals that separate white and Negro schools may exist almost side by side even with a freedom-of-choice plan.

Such separation was established unconstitutionally, the court says. The onus therefore is upon school officials—not Negro children and Negro parents—to eliminate an old unconstitutional practice.

* * *

THIS PART OF THE decision may not clearly settle questions about the elimination of de facto segregation in cities where segregated residential patterns prevail; some of those questions will continue to be adjudicated. Must Atlanta, for instance, not only assign faculty members but also draw school district lines in such a way that even its "inner city" "Negro schools" are integrated, and if so how?

But the decision will serve to eliminate many confusions about what pace of desegregation is acceptable. It will move us closer to the end of a tiresome and difficult transition.

Total School Integration Ordered by Appeals Court

SCHOOL DESEG

By WILLIAM K. CARNEY

NEW ORLEANS (UPI) — The U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals Wednesday ordered total, top-to-bottom desegregation of all public schools in the Deep South by next fall.

The ruling, if upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court, will put an end to the 13-year-old "deliberate speed" ruling handed down by the Supreme Court when it ruled segregated schools "inherently unequal" in 1954.

The district court ruling affects 1,760,900 Negro students in the states of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and Texas. Of these 283,000 are currently attending integrated schools.

The 12-judge court ordered by an 8 to 4 vote "a unitary school system in which there are no Negro schools and no white schools, but just schools.

"School segregation is 'inherently unequal' by any name and wherever located."

Lester Maddox, Georgia's governor, said he was "very disappointed," with the ruling.

"It's another attack on local control by local people of local education," Maddox said.

The ruling came on an appeal by four Louisiana and three Alabama school boards to a Dec. 29, 1966, decision handed down by a three-judge panel of the court.

Cases before the appeals court normally are decided by three-judge panels.

The 12 judges agreed to jointly reconsider the panel's 2 to 1 decision, and held a rare en banc (full court) sitting at Jacksonville, Fla., March 10. They heard arguments from the Justice department, Negro plaintiffs and from the seven school boards.

SCHOOL DESEG.

ES

THE "ONE GUIDELINE" APPROACH TO SCHOOL DESEGREGATION

The most appropriate position in 1967 for private civil right agencies is advocacy of the "one guideline" approach to school desegregation. The "one guideline" is this: dismantle the dual system by next September.

The present policy of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare gives lip-service to the goal of integrating all grades in the South during the school year of 1967-8. The prospect that the goal will be achieved using the existing approach is so small that, if it were expressed in terms of money, a beggar in Bombay would spurn it.

One of the major reasons for the lack of substantial progress in deep South states is that "freedom of choice" plans have, as both their purpose and effect, maintenance of the status-quo. Of these plans, Judge Wisdom of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit recently said, > "...(they are) better suited than any other to preserve the essentials of the dual system while giving paper compliance with the duty to desegregate." U.S. v Jefferson County Board of Education, et al.

"Freedom of choice" may be an adequate desegregation device in some border areas, but in the deep South subtle and not so subtle pressures keep people "in their place."

Under the "one guideline" approach it would be the duty of school officials to integrate their system. If this result could be achieved through the operation of a "freedom of choice" plan, well and good. If not, then other means must be devised by local educators. "The only school desegregation plan that meets constitutional standards is one that works" -- U.S. v Jefferson County Board of Education.

The implication of this is that HEW can get out of the business of reviewing desegregation plans. Don't send us your plans, the Department should say, just show us your performance. The effort currently expended examining paper plans would then be transferred to evaluating results.

Much criticism has been heaped on HEW for playing the numbers game and for trying to tell local school districts how to manage their affairs. Under this approach, those complaints would be eliminated. All HEW would say is we don't care what plan you use, and we don't want to know how you are going to do it -- just do it. (Of course, technical assistance would still be available on request.)

